Madam President, the essential first step in revitalizing relations with Turkey is to lift the political and symbolic burden which the embargo represents. This is of paramount importance for NATO and is, I believe, the correct step to take in working toward a solution to the Cyprus question.

The Turkish Government has shown that it has a positive attitude on the Cyprus question. I have commended the Turks for the signs of flexibility which they have shown, and have called on them to do still more in this regard. I have been extremely pleased to see evidence that they are doing more. I think this bodes well for the future if the embargo is lifted.

An example of the Turkish attitude which I find especially encouraging is in regard to the seaside city of Varosha. The Turkish Cypriots have agreed to the creation of an interim administration for the city—under the United Nations—as soon as the negotiations between the Greek and Turkish communities are resumed. The United Nations administration of Varosha, which has been under Turkish control since August 1974, would mean that one of the key issues holding up a Cyprus solution is closer to being resolved.

Turkish and Turkish Cypriot leaders have made other proposals which could serve as a basis for meaningful negotiations on Cyprus. These would include:

Significant territorial readjustments;

Further troop reductions on Cyprus by the Turkish Government as negotiations proceed;

Reopening of Nicosia International Airport to civilian traffic;

Joint economic ventures between both Cypriot communities.

I believe the basis for serious negotiations is there. Prime Minister Ecevit has stated that he regards a solution of the Cyprus problem as being in Turkey's own best interest and that the Turkish Government desires to work actively toward that goal.

In closing, Madam President, I want to make a few more comments about Greece and to reiterate what I said earlier—that approval of this amendment does not constitute in any way a repudiation of Greece or a choice between these two important friends and allies.

Greece and the United States have been partners in NATO for a quarter of a century and Greece, like Turkey, is an important element in the NATO defense structure.

Obviously we value Greece for reasons other than our mutual security interests. Greece also shares our commitment to democracy and freedom. The Greek contribution to our heritage is immeasurably great.

Of all peoples, the Greeks have best dreamed the dream of life, said Goethe.

It was Aristotle, one of those great Greek philosophers who had such an impact on Western thought, who noted that a man is a political animal and that everyone thinks chiefly of his own interest, hardly ever that of the public.

What we need to do here is rise above politics, to recognize the broader public interest.

In adopting this amendment and repealing the embargo on arms to Turkey, we are not choosing between Turkey and Greece, we are acting in the broader interests of those countries and our own. Our goal is to have two strong and friendly nations in the Eastern Mediterranean, to maintain the strength of NATO, and to make possible a just and lasting Cyprus settlement.

I am convinced that the amendment which I shall offer as an amendment to the amendment by Mr. SPARKMAN, on behalf of myself, Mr. MCGOVERN, Mr. BENTSEN, and Mr. CHAFEE, would serve that broader purpose, and I hope that the Senate will adopt it. I yield the floor.

Mr. BENTSEN. Will the Senator yield 15 minutes at this time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Permit me to have something referred to in the RECORD.

I believe, Madam President, this has already been left at the desk, but in the Washington Post of yesterday there was a very fine and forceful editorial entitled, "Lift the Turkish Embargo."

I simply call attention to the fact that I have already sent it to the desk.

I yield 15 minutes to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BENTSEN. Madam President, it is not easy for one who fought so hard to impose the Turkish embargo to now stand before this body and say, "Enough. Enough is enough. We have made our point. We have sustained the rule of law. We have proven to the Turks and to the people of the world that we expect the laws of the United States to be maintained in the use of our weaponry."

This, despite the fact that we have had some 26 other instances of questionable use of U.S. arms and possible violations of the law of limitations on that use. This Nation, in most instances, has chosen not to act on them.

But we have reached the point on this embargo where it is not only not productive, but counterproductive—counterproductive to Cyprus; to Greece; to Turkey; and most of all to the United States of America.

Despite some sharp and apparent differences over the future of the embargo, I think it is fair to assert, Madam President, that all participants in this debate share a profound sorrow for the problems of Cyprus and its people, and a common determination to bring an end to their suffering.

We share an awareness of the importance of both Greece and Turkey to the NATO Alliance and to our own national security. We all acknowledge that the problem of Cyprus is at the core of the complex trilateral relationship among our country, Greece, and Turkey, and the arms embargo is directly relevant to the problem of Cyprus.

It was initiated by Congress for two primary reasons. First, there was general agreement that the second stage, August 1974 Turkish offensive on Cyprus constituted a violation of our laws. Congress concluded that Turkey should be punished, and the embargo became our stick.

To this I respond that Turkey has been punished for over 3 years. The imposition of the embargo—its prolonged application despite its adverse effects on Turkish-American relations and our own security interests, provides concrete evidence of our commitment to the rule of law.

The second rationale for the embargo is the notion that it could be used to pressure the Turkish Government into making concessions on Cyprus that would eventually yield a settlement and the withdrawal of Turkish troops.

On this score, it has become abundantly clear that the embargo has not worked. It has been a major impediment, rather than a spur, to Turkish concessions. It has retarded the prospect of peace. It has punished the people of Cyprus as much as the Turkish Government.

Some would contend that the embargo has not worked as envisioned because it has not been fully or consistently applied.

Some would say that the reason the embargo has not worked is because we have not enforced it in its fullest, that we have not been tough enough; turn it another notch, twist it a little more.

This line of reasoning is vulnerable on two counts. If the embargo is not an embargo, if it is merely a bone that sticks in the craw of the Turks, and if it is generally conceded that it has not worked, why bother to maintain it? What good will it do? Can anyone seriously suggest that it will force the Government of Turkey to withdraw its troops?

More to the point, I submit that a rigidly enforced embargo would be equally ineffective in obtaining the desired result. We could go beyond the embargo, Mr. President. We could sever all diplomatic relations with Turkey. We could treat them as we treat Cuba or Uganda. I doubt very much that we could coerce the Government of Turkey to react positively to that kind of pressure.

If we have learned anything over the past 3½ years of this embargo, it is that the Government of Turkey and the Turkish people are not prepared to knuckle under to the pressure of the embargo.

I think the people of this country can understand that attitude. As I recall, we did not take kindly to expressions of international displeasure over our problems in Vietnam.

Patent ineffectiveness and counterproductive punishment are not the only characteristics of the embargo experience. More significant is the adverse impact it has had on our own national security; on the strength of NATO; and on the Cyprus negotiations.

I heard one of my colleagues say the other day, "I have counted the Turks in my State and I got up to 12." Whether you want to look on that as an expression of cynicism or political reality, I think we ought to take the measure of that kind of allegation. I think we ought to do things for other countries. I think we ought to be international in our outlook. But first and foremost, we ought to look to the best interests of the United States. They should be the determining factor in how we vote. Lifting this embargo, as proposed under the joint amendment of Senator ROBERT C. BYRD, Senator MCGOVERN, myself, and Senator CHAFEE, would accomplish that objective.

Madam President, we hear a great deal these days about the awesome buildup of Warsaw Pact conventional forces facing NATO. We are concerned, and we ought to be. We understand that the strongest possible NATO structure is in the best interests of this Nation's security.

Greece and Turkey are equally important to NATO. They are invaluable allies. The alliance needs them both. Our friendship with Greece is as important as our friendship with Turkey.

Those of us who support lifting the embargo fully appreciate the strategic and military significance of Greece, and we want them back in the alliance. Let me emphasize, Mr. President, that the importance of Greece is fully reflected in this amendment.

I sincerely believe that reintegration into NATO is in the best interests of Greece; clearly it is to the benefit of NATO. Lifting the arms embargo—an issue between the United States and Turkey—should not be interpreted as an unfriendly act toward Greece, because it is not intended as such.

We ought to treat both of these nations equally. Having an embargo on one is not equal treatment. This amendment has been carefully structured to increase the amount of foreign military sales from the $140 million that Greece got last year to $175 million, the same amount that will be available to Turkey.

Madam President, Turkey is also an important partner in NATO. With the exception of this country, the Turks have the largest standing army in the Alliance. Turkish forces dedicated to NATO tie down 25 Soviet divisions and some 800 Soviet aircraft that would otherwise be stationed on other fronts. With its control of the Dardanelles, Turkey can effectively blockade the Soviet Black Sea fleet in the event of hostilities.

The importance of Turey's geographic location, blocking Soviet access to the Middle East and Persian Gulf area while buffering Greece from an attack through Bulgaria, is self-evident and needs little elaboration.

Turkey is the anchor of the southern flank of NATO. Turkey is a nation of supreme strategic importance to this country and to our NATO allies, Greece included. If Turkey were ever to withdraw from NATO, Greece would stand terribly exposed.

The Turkish military is equipped almost entirely with U.S. weapons, many of them verging on obsolescence. It is a well-known fact that the combat readiness of the Turkish military has diminished markedly since 1974, due in part to the embargo. Some 50 percent of Turkish military equipment is nonoperational; perhaps only a quarter is combat-ready. A shortage of American spare parts has led to cannibalization of other weaponry, particularly in the air force.

This situation presents a clear and present danger to the security of the United States; of Greece; and of NATO. Our allies in the Alliance understand the problem. With the exception of Greece, there is no NATO support for the embargo. There is opposition by every other NATO partner.

I received word just a while ago that all nine members of the European community are requesting favorable consideration for lifting the embargo.

Madam President, I do not pretend that all Turkey's military problems are attributable to the embargo. Obviously they are not. Lifting the embargo, however, will help. It will help practically and it will help psychologically.

Absent the embargo, Turkey will be able to take delivery of some $69 million worth of desperately needed spare parts which have been locked up in warehouses since 1974. Lifting the embargo will also make Turkey eligible to receive third party transfers of U.S. equipment from NATO allies.

Some of the equipment, for example in West Germany, is no longer used. But those parts can be used to make some of the weaponry in Turkey effective.

More important, lifting the embargo will eliminate the current psychological barrier to joint planning and cooperation between Turkey and this country. It will enable us to sit down together and determine what we can do, as allies, to turn the situation around. With the embargo in place, the Turks are understandably reluctant to look on us as reliable partners with whom they should do long-term planning.

The question arises as to what the Turks might do if we fail to lift the embargo. Will they leave NATO? Will they opt for neutrality? Will they look increasingly to the Soviet Union?

No one can respond with any certainty, Madam President, but I think there is an excellent chance that continuation of this embargo will create new doubts in Turkey about the reliability of the United States as a long-term ally.

It could raise new doubts about the wisdom of the NATO alliance. It could precipitate a Turkish drift toward neutrality which would greatly please the Russians.

Prime Minister Ecevit is not blackmailing us; he is not threatening to walk out of the alliance over the embargo. But Ecevit is not going to be there forever. He can not necessarily control popular opinion in his country. The Turkish people who have been our staunch allies strongly resent being placed under embargo alongside Cuba.

At the very least, Madam President, continuing the embargo bill will produce further strains in the alliance and a deterioration in our bilateral relations with Turkey at a time we should be encouraging tendencies in the opposite direction. It would be a negative contribution to the security situation in the eastern Mediterranean. And it will almost certainly lead to the loss of important intelligence installations located on Turkish territory.

Madam President, I want to talk about Cyprus, because that is the genesis of this problem. If we can get a settlement on Cyprus, the embargo will cease to be an issue.

For 3½ years the embargo has stood as an obstacle to the sort of Turkish concessions on Cyprus that would encourage reciprocal concessions and lead to a settlement. Let us remove that impediment, and let us see how the Turks react.

We have got a new government—a new political situation—in Turkey. Between October 1974 and January of this year Turkey was ruled either by fragile coalition governments or by Prime Minister Demirel who needed the support of ultraconservative nationalist parties to remain in power. Turkey really could not move on Cyprus, and the embargo gave them a good reason not to move.

Today Prime Minister Ecevit has latitude on Cyprus that was denied to his predecessor. He has opened up new channels of communication with the Greeks. He has specifically broken the link between the embargo and Turkish policy on Cyprus. Together with the Turkish Cypriot community, he has placed an offer on the table.

The Turkish offers of April could have been better. We admit that. But the offer was not as bad as the Greek Cypriots contend and it was certainly a vast improvement over what the Turks had put on the table previously. Ecevit and the Turkish Cypriot community have emphasized that this is a first offer, an opening bid, that they are prepared to be flexible, to negotiate in good faith; that they are ready to listen to counter offers. To move forward from the April proposals. They have recently improved on their Varosha proposal.

That proposal was rejected out of hand 2 or 3 days ago, but as of last night I understand the Greek Cypriots have made a counter offer. The Turkish proposals helped to break the logjam.

I have heard it said time and time again the Turks should be more forthcoming. Well, they have been. But both sides must be forthcoming.

The Turks today occupy about 36 percent of the island. Their figures show that they occupied approximately 32 percent of the island before. They are the farmers of the area. The Greeks are the businessmen, the technicians, the more skilled, and they, in turn, occupy more of the urban spaces.

The Greeks have submitted an offer to let the Turks have 18 percent to 20 percent of the geographic area, when they were occupying some 32 percent before.

There is enough blame to go around on both sides on this issue. What we are trying to do is treat all parties evenhandedly.

Madam President, I cannot guarantee that lifting the embargo will provide the key to greater Turkish flexibility. I cannot guarantee that lifting the embargo will bring us a settlement on Cyprus. But I can state with some assurance that failure to lift the embargo will result in renewed intransigence on Cyprus that will doom any prospect for success. The best way to thwart the purpose of the embargo is to keep it in place.

The Turks broke our law in 1974, and the Turks have been punished. The only question that remains is the duration of the punishment and its purpose, if any.

Our 3-year attempt to punish Turkey has poisoned the well of Turksh-American friendship. It has strained the fabric of the NATO alliance. It has contributed to weakness in the southern flank of NATO, it has led to the sacrifice of important intelligence installations at a time we need every bit of intelligence we can muster. It has frozen the situation on Cyprus.

The requirements of the rule of law have been met. The embargo has not worked. It has frustrated, rather than fostered, progress on Cyprus. It has deepened, rather than relieved, the tragedy of the Cypriot people. It has robbed the NATO alliance of vitality and jeopardized our security situation in the eastern Mediterranean.

In conclusion, Madam President, let me make one more point. Lifting the embargo will not give the Turks carte blanche in the eastern Mediterranean. We are not undertaking any long-term commitments of the sort envisioned in the 4-year defense pact and vote them a billion dollars over 4 years. That is no longer an issue. From here on in, we are talking about 1 year at a time. We are removing an obstacle between us and Turkey, standing back, and watching how the Turks react to this gesture. We have no commitments, no promise, for future years. We know, and the Turks know, that progress on Cyprus is going to be an important consideration as we consider the future of our political and security relationship.

This amendment has been carefully drawn to require the President to report back every 60 days to the Congress as to the progress being made and about a Cypriot settlement.

Mr. President, I urge the adoption of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUMPERS). Who yields time?

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Rhode Island that I had previously promised his colleague from Rhode Island that I would yield 15 minutes to him, if I may do that at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. CHAFEE. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, the matter which we debate today is of extreme importance to the interests of the United States. The President last Wednesday labeled this issue "the most important foreign affairs subject that the Congress will consider the rest of this session."

All sorts of pressure and interests are involved: The attitudes of two major allies, Greece and Turkey, strong ethnic votes in most of our States, the well-being of NATO, U.S. military bases, our ability to gather intelligence of Soviet activity, SALT verification to some extent, the stability of not only the Aegean and Thrace area but also the Middle East and routes to the Persian Gulf. All these interests and others are affected by how we vote today.

Mr. President, little I believe is gained by reviewing history and assessing blame on this party or that. Suffice it to say that there is a long history of bitterness between Greece and Turkey with each nation being able to recount in detail why the other is at fault.

Let us take this situation as it now exists and try to determine what is best for the United States of America.

There are three major reasons that in my judgment make it compelling that we lift the arms embargo on Turkey.

The first point concerns the original reason for imposing the embargo; namely Cyprus. Since the arms embargo was placed on Turkey in February of 1975—over 3 years ago—there has been a virtual freeze on negotiations and progress toward a Cyprus solution. Both Turkey and Greece are inhibited from moving on Cyprus while an embargo is in effect. Any Turkish Government must buck strong domestic pressures if it chooses to be conciliatory regarding Cyprus. Such moves are looked upon as a buckling to foreign pressure. Thus, the embargo hinders, rather than fosters, progress. The annual battle that takes place in this Congress on the subject only serves to remind the Turks that they being uniquely singled out, as Senator BENTSEN previously mentioned and being uniquely punished. No other nation has been so punished.

No other nation has an arms embargo on Turkey. This is something only we do. Ill feelings between the two nations are inflamed by the realization that the Greeks are the principal supporters of the embargo. As for Greece, the embargo has shifted the focus away from the real issues on Cyprus to a concentration on keeping the embargo on Turkey as an end in itself.

The second major point that I would like to briefly touch on is the rule of law which Senator BENTSEN also mentioned. Congress originally imposed the embargo, on Turkey because of Turkish actions in 1974 responding to an attempted coup on Cyprus. While most of us agree with Turkey's point that the 1960 Treaty of Guaranty signed by Greece, Great Britain, and Turkey provided a legal basis for Turkey's initial reaction of sending troops to Cyprus, it was the second major troop movement that has caused Congress to find a violation of U.S. law and impose the arms embargo. One could debate all day long the merits of both Greece's and Turkey's actions back in 1974. The fact remains, however, that Congress found a significant violation on Turkey's part and imposed the sanction of a full arms embargo at that time.

Turkey has not only suffered materially from the embargo, it has also been humiliated. The sting of the punishment has caused the Turks' frustration and bitterness, which gradually is turning to alienation. Their attitude is readily understandable.

Just as in human relationships, so it is with international dealings: Humiliating the other party never leads to permanent harmony. The sanction imposed on Turkey over 3 years ago has outlived its usefulness. We have made our point. It is that apparent our best interests are being damaged. Little is gained by unblindingly justifying our current position as "principle," as if there was involved here some fundamental concept written in permanency, untouched by changing events or the challenges of a less than perfect world.

We will hear the word "principle" raised constantly, as though one side has a monopoly on principle.

Third, and most important of all, the continued existence of this embargo is damaging to the best interests of the United States. We belong to and support NATO because of our own national security. It is not some altruistic thing we are doing in support of NATO. We do it because it is best for us. The well-being of that alliance is a cornerstone of our foreign policy. Both Greece and Turkey are extremely important members of NATO. As Gen. David Jones, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, stated recently before the Foreign Relations Committee:

> Due to their unique geographic position, their control over sea and air exits from the Black Sea area, and defense arrangements with the United States and NATO, Greece and Turkey constitute a vital link in the western defense system.

Clearly, a strong and friendly Greece and a strong and friendly Turkey are matters of the utmost importance for the United States and NATO. Unfortunately, the events in 1974 have led to a situation where Greek forces are no longer specifically committed to NATO and the Greek military has withdrawn from the NATO-integrated military command structure.

Fortunately, the state of United States-Greece relations has improved to the point where we do have reason to hope that Greece will come back as a full military partner in NATO.

Turkey's military readiness, since the embargo was imposed, has suffered tremendously. The material state of the Turkish Armed Forces has plummeted to the point where very serious deficiencies could prevent Turkey from doing its job in NATO. The problems that Turkish Armed Forces face do, indeed, go well beyond what the arms embargo has caused. We recognize that. Lifting the arms embargo will not be a cure-all for the problems of Turkish military.

The proposal before us today does not increase the amount of military sales over what Turkey received last year—$175 million. However, the lifting of the embargo will have immediate salutary effects on the Turkish military situation: $70 million of aid that was in the pipeline in 1974 will be released. Once again, Turkish officers will attend U.S. military training academies and war colleges—a very important step that yields immeasurable, intangible benefits for both sides

But, most important of all, ending the embargo will start healing the bitterness, humiliation, and alienation that has occurred over the past 3 years. Once again, Turkey can feel that she is a welcomed member of NATO that enjoys the full support and friendship of the United States. She will feel we are dedicated to doing all we can to assist her military forces to become modernized so that she can defend herself and assist the alliance.

As has been mentioned, a friendly Turkey pins down 26 Warsaw Pact divisions that could otherwise go elsewhere and exert greater pressure on NATO. A friendly Turkey provides to the United States and NATO forward basing of U.S. tactical fighter aircraft, peacetime training facilities—particularly at Konya Range, which is of tremendous importance in giving pilots realistic training in air-to-ground activities, major support facilities for the U.S. 6th Fleet, including 20 percent of that fleet's fuel assets in the Mediterranean, important communication facilities, as well as storage sites for war reserve materials. Should the United States elect to continue this policy of humiliating and eventually alienating Turkey, the consequences can only be adverse regarding the very real and important support Turkey now gives the United States and NATO.

Already, as a result of the U.S. action of imposing the embargo, we are losing irreplaceable intelligence information from bases in Turkey that have been closed since 1974. These bases are needed to restore clarity to certain areas of our surveillance of Soviet military activity. I know that some say that these intelligence bases do not mean a whit of difference to the United States. They have nothing to do with SALT verification, some say. Well, let us see what those who are closest to the situation have to state in this regard.

As Adm. Stansfield Turner, Director of Central Intelligence, wrote last week regarding the importance of Turkey to our intelligence mission:

> Turkey's importance ranks very high because of the crucial areas in which its contribution is felt: treaty verification, support of NATO commitments, and indications, warning and crises management. Some of these contributions are unique and not replaceable.

Note that Admiral Turner refers to treaty verification. Some have suggested Turkey is unimportant as a base from which to monitor SALT. May I quote from a dialog that took place on June 28 of this year in the Senate Armed Services Committee hearing involving the lifting of this embargo. Secretary of Defense Brown was testifying. It will be recalled that long before Mr. Brown assumed his present position, he served as one of the SALT negotiators. There are few men in the United States who are more knowledgeable of SALT matters than Secretary Brown. Here is the dialog:

> Senator NUNN. How valuable are the U.S. intelligence gathering activities in Turkey?
> Secretary BROWN. They are particularly important both for monitoring Soviet military activity in the southwestern military districts of the USSR, in monitoring development of certain Soviet weapon systems, which are going on in the region of the Black Sea, and in monitoring development tests that are relevant to the strategic arms limitations agreements.
> Senator NUNN. How much damage has already been done in that regard?
> Secretary BROWN. A fair amount. In some cases we have been able to replace those techniques, the results of collections from those stations by using other methods, although not as effectively. In some cases we have not been able to replace them.
> Senator NUNN. You have some irreplaceable intelligence activities in Turkey, is that what you are saying?
> Secretary BROWN. Yes, sir.

It seems to me that, in this period of extreme difficulty with the Soviets not only with regard to SALT but all the other weapons problems that exist, this is not the time to cut off any intelligence activities where we might garner additional information from the Soviets.

Some ask "If we end the embargo on Turkey, won't we lose Greece as an ally? Won't the opposition come to power?" Nothing is certain in this world. We do know that Mr. Karamanlis, the Prime Minister of Greece, has the strongest majority—57 percent—of any government in Western Europe, we further know that, no elections in Greece will occur for 3 years.

We also know, as the majority leader pointed out, that we are not choosing Turkey over Greece. We are solely dealing with removing a thorn in our relations with Turkey. I do not believe it should be essential for our friendship with Greece that we have had relations with Turkey. That makes no sense.

If we lift the embargo it is Secretary Vance's opinion, which I share, that while there may be short-term strains in our relationship with Greece, nevertheless, putting behind us the complication of the embargo, which serves as a wedge between us and the countries in the area, will in the long run promote a reconciliation between Greece and Turkey.

It is entirely consistent—and historically true that we have both nations as close and trusted allies. In short, the United States needs a friendly Turkey to carry out extremely important national security functions in that part of the world. Indeed, Greece and Turkey are essential to each other. Turkey without Greece or Greece without Turkey stands to be under a greatly increased amount of Soviet and Warsaw Pact pressure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 15 minutes have expired.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, may I have 3 additional minutes yielded to me? Also it will come from that side.

Mr. PELL. This is on the opposition side, but in behalf of the proponents of the amendment I am glad to accede to the Senator's request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 3 additional minutes.

Mr. CHAFEE. Not only do Greece and Turkey need each other but the United States needs both of them.

For instance, with Greek and Turkish monitoring stations on land, the warning time for 6th Fleet ships is increased four fold in the event of Warsaw Pact air attack coming from land bases.

Again may I quote Secretary Brown, testifying before the Armed Services Committee, and this is what he said:

For Soviet aircraft overlying or flying near either Greece or Turkey—warning can be provided while these aircraft are over Bulgaria or the Black Sea. The critical warning time to our Sixth Fleet could be over an hour. Without the use of data from these radars, the warning time is cut to about 15 minutes.

In the case of a Middle East or Persian Gulf conflict—

And I stress that Persian Gulf problem.

Turkey can make a substantial difference should the Soviets choose to intervene. If the Soviets can airlift forces over Turkey and sealift them through the Turkish Straits, they would move a division of corps size force into the Mideast or Persian Gulf region in one to three weeks. Without such overflights, airlift equivalent forces would require about three times as long for the Soviets; without use of the Turkish Straits, Soviet sealift would arrive most rapidly from the Pacific, but this would take about five weeks.

In addition, Turkey's critical geographic position, as well as its ties to Iran that include membership in the CENTO Alliance, make it a key obstacle to Soviet attempts to bring military pressure to bear on Iran.

That Greece and Turkey need the protection of NATO and that NATO needs both those countries is the foundation of their 27 years of association with the Alliance. But equally important is that both countries need each other as well. Without Turkey in NATO, Greece would stand exposed practically on all sides.

This is the end of Secretary Brown's statement.

One has only to look at the public record to understand the importance that our professional military and diplomats assigned to the issue before us. For instance: Gen. Alexander Haig, supreme allied commander of NATO, stated:

From the perpsective of . . . vital security interests, the impact of the arms embargo has been grievous.

This position is supported by every living former NATO supreme allied commander.

Deputy Secretary of State, Warren Christopher stated:

We have concluded that continued maintenance of the embargo would be harmful to U.S. Security concern.

Ambassador Clark Clifford, who no one can accuse of being in the pay or being an agent of this administration says:

The current U.S. posture towards Turkey is subjecting our security relationship with this important NATO ally to an intolerable burden.

And, finally, referring to continuing the arms embargo on Turkey, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Jones:

The implications of such a posture would be grave, not only for Turkey, but for Greece, NATO, the United States, and for our friends in the Middle East as well.

Mr. President, it seems to me that a very clear message is coming through to us here in the Senate. For whatever reasons, the policy of maintaining an arms embargo on Turkey has failed and that policy while far from working toward an agreement on Cyprus, is driving an old and extremely important ally away from us and at the same time jeopardizing very serious American interests.

So let us act to accomplish what is best for our Nation by removing the embargo.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 3 minutes have expired. Who yields time?

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, on behalf of the chairman of the committee I yield 6 minutes to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I certainly thank the Senator from Rhode Island for his courtesy in yielding me this time on what I think is a highly important matter.

I am pleased with whatever good the imposition of the embargo may have done, but I opposed the imposition from the beginning.

However, it is very clear that we have in good faith tried the embargo, we have insisted on its application, and we have followed through. The embargo has largely failed its purpose. I think it is generally agreed that something else must be done.

I am impressed with the genuine concern here by every member of this internal matter to NATO. This is a matter of dissent, division, and contention among the members of NATO and those on the other side cannot be more pleased. But now it is up to us to move on a step further, to turn a page, or to try another remedy.

I am impressed with what all the witnesses here said, and all the members of the Foreign Relations Committee who have spoken on this side of the matter. They have stated that this embargo is counterproductive and by its continuation an even graver situation is created.

We held hearings in our Armed Services Committee after the Foreign Relations Committee completed their hearings, and after they had a chance to formulate their views and to file a report. The witnesses who appeared before the Armed Services Committees were those we thought to be the most vital and most knowledgeable on the military aspects of this matter. This is a year, remember, in which we are emphasizing the strengthening of NATO. If we can do anything within the family of NATO nations, we could take a step that would make what we are doing more effective in aiding NATO, more particularly, removing the impediments this embargo has caused.

This brings me down to the specific facts that are undenied and unchallenged to the effect of the ground forces we have in Europe. Certainly there are none superior to the NATO forces. There are none that are more effective and more responsive and ready to go than these Turkish troops.

We are not able and, I hope we will never make the mistake of trying, to furnish all the ground forces for NATO in Western Europe. It is impossible for us to match the manpower of Soviet Russia and her allies, and if we try, the whole matter could collapse.

So this relates to the continued effect on the alliance in cooperation with Turkey in this field of ground troops.

Greece is valuable in more than one way. Do not ever overlook the fact that we must have effective ground troops there far beyond our own.

But we are also dependent on Turkey. It is due to this ban now that we are letting their ground forces be run down and inadequately prepared due to lack of supplies, lack of spare parts, lack of the things that we are most able to supply. This situation is deteriorating day by day, month by month, and year by year. These Turkish ground forces already have had their effectiveness substantially reduced. They are having to cannibalize, it is called in military terms, the equipment that is complete. They are having to take parts from these complete units to repair other equipment in other words, take down the machinery of another vehicle to repair what is unable to go and unable to serve.

That fact of life speaks volumes for itself. It just must not be permitted to happen. The time has come when we must lift this embargo and start in the other direction.

The other highly important major point is that we have been denied for these years the full use of some of our most important and necessary intelligence collectors. This leaves us at a great disadvantage.

This is at a time when we are talking about SALT talks. The big item there in these talks is what kind of surveillance and what kind of disclosure, of just how effective are we and how effective can we be with reference to knowing what the other side is doing and how to detect what the other side is doing.

So we are limping now and we are on a crutch to some degree in this area, including the Black Sea area, which is so important. We are suspicious of the intelligence we gather because we are afraid it is not complete, not reliable and not worth acting on because we are hindered under this handicap due to the lack of use of these bases.

So without trying to assess blame, I think it is a must step for us to take. I believe it will lead to improved relations in getting the Cyprus matter adjusted. I feel it will greatly enhance our military preparedness, and it is in this field that we dare not wait. We cannot safely wait any longer.

I ask unanimous consent that my prepared statement be placed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JOHN C. STENNIS

Continuing or repealing the arms embargo against Turkey is an important decision with far-reaching implications for vital U.S. national security interests. The Committee on Armed Services held hearings on June 28, 1978, to get the facts on the military issues involved in the Turkish arms embargo. During my remarks on this issue, I will outline the key points raised in these hearings.

The arms embargo against Turkey enacted in 1974 has made no contribution to settling the Cyprus issue but has had a detrimental impact on the security of NATO's Southern Flank. The embargo was enacted by Congress to demonstrate U.S. concern over the misuse of U.S.-supplied arms in the invasion of Cyprus by Turkey. It was also the sense of Congress at that time that the ban might also help to settle the Cyprus problem in a manner fair to Cyprus, Turkey, and Greece.

On the first objective, the embargo has produced the desired result. The United States has clearly shown to the world our concern about the use of U.S. arms. The United States took decisive action against a key NATO ally whose geographic position made it important to vital U.S. strategic interests. I fully agree with the statement of Secretary Vance made during the Committee on Armed Services' hearings. He stated that the embargo "has demonstrated to Turkey and the world the seriousness with which we view any unauthorized use of U.S. arms. This point of principle has been made. I believe we should now turn a new page."

With respect to encouraging the settlement of the Cyprus problem, the embargo has been a total failure and has become, in fact, an impediment to progress on this issue. During the hearings, General Haig stated: "my personal view is that the failure to lift the embargo will make progress on Cyprus impossible, as it has for three and a half years, whereas lifting of it will enhance the prospect for such progress." Turkey will not yield to this form of pressure by the United States. It is time to recognize that continuing this pressure will serve no useful purpose but will merely further strain the relationship between Turkey and the United States. In this regard, General Haig stated that:

"The specific consequences, which could be anticipated late this summer if this embargo is not reversed, are some or all of the following:

First, the American military presence would be expelled from Turkey.

Second, there would be a dramatic change in Turkey's own defense orientation, characterized by a reduction in Turkish forces, a reorientation of those forces away from the Soviet threat, toward exclusive focus on perceived difficulties with Greece, and the reduction of Turkey's contributions to NATO by reducing the number of forces allocated to NATO, and a steady erosion of the relationship and influence that the NATO alliance has on the Turkish Government, with all of the attendant consequences.

Should these events occur, the impact on vital U.S. interests would be substantial. In the context of a NATO-Warsaw Pact war, the geographic position of Turkey is extremely important to the defense of both Greece and Turkey and to the outcome of the maritime battle in the Mediterranean. Without the participation of effective Turkish military forces, the defense of Thrace would be much more difficult. Strong Turkish forces are an integral part of Greek security.

Regarding the maritime battle, Turkey controls the Soviet Union's exit from the Black Sea thus constraining the ability of Soviet naval surface forces to engage NATO forces in the Mediterranean. Securing easy access to the Mediterranean would vastly improve Soviet warfighting capabilities in the Eastern Mediterranean and further threaten key sea lines of communication there. Turkey also can reduce the air threat to NATO naval forces operating in the Eastern Mediterranean by providing early warning of Soviet naval air attacks. Without this early warning, NATO naval forces, including the U.S. Sixth Fleet, would be considerably more vulnerable.

There would also be a Soviet threat in Eastern Turkey involving significant Soviet forces. In total, it is estimated that more than 50 Warsaw Pact divisions would be deployed against Turkey in wartime. Should the Soviet Union be able to shift these forces to other conflict areas, the impact on defending NATO would be substantial.

In addition to its importance to defense of NATO's Southern Flank, Turkey is of critical importance to U.S. interests in the Middle East and Persian Gulf. By denying the Soviet Union direct access to Arab lands, Turkey is a vital buffer to Soviet expansionism in these areas. Through control of the most direct air, overland, and naval routes between the Soviet Union and these areas, Turkey constrains Soviet influence and power projection capabilities. The importance to the Western world of the Middle East and Persian Gulf is well understood; we shoud now recognize the important geographic role of Turkey regarding these areas.

The arms embargo has already had a serious impact on the military situation in Turkey. The readiness and effectiveness of Turkish forces has suffered due to maintenance and training problems directly related to the embargo. The ability of Turkish forces to meet their commitments is now being questioned. In addition, the suspension of U.S. activities at five major installations in Turkey in response to the embargo has resulted in the loss of some intelligence and information not available from other sources. But most importantly, the strains in United States-Turkey relations, which have almost reached the breaking point, have lessened the ties and commitment of Turkey to the United States, NATO, and the West.

Our NATO allies have been very concerned about U.S. policy towards NATO. General Haig reported that the arms embargo has "been a source of deep concern to the military authorities of the entire alliance. Their concern increasingly registered to me personally is that a continuation of this embargo would represent for the United States a self-defeating course." These strongly held views of our allies cannot be ignored in making a decision on the Turkish arms embargo.

The importance that I have attached to improving our relations with Turkey in no way diminishes the value of Greece to the United States and NATO. Greece is also a valuable ally with a vital role in the defense of NATO. As Secretary Brown stated during the hearings: "That Greece and Turkey need the protection of NATO and that NATO needs both those countries is the foundation of their 27-year association with the alliance. But equally important is that both countries need each other as well." Our efforts should be directed toward improving relations with both Greece and Turkey.

In conclusion, Turkey is a vital ally of the United States and plays a significant role on the Southern Flank and in the Middle East and Persian Gulf. The arms embargo has clearly weakened Turkish military capability and has substantially reduced Turkish ties to the United States and NATO. Continuation of the embargo could do even greater damage to U.S. security interests. At the same time, the arms embargo has not aided settlement of the Cyprus issue and is now viewed as an obstacle to progress. Secretary Vance stated: "The embargo has become a counter-productive symbol throughout the area, making it impossible for the two sides to get together in a spirit of flexibility and compromise." On the basis, it is in the interest of the United States to lift the arms embargo against Turkey.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator again for yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PELL. I would like to speak in opposition to the amendment, upholding the committee's position.

Mr. CASE. I understand that, and I was just about to suggest that I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

I would like to inquire of the Chair how much, if any, time has been used thus far in opposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BIDEN). Seventy-one minutes by the proponents have been used, and no time in opposition.

Mr. CASE. No time in opposition.

Since I have the time in opposition, I am happy to yield to the Senator from Rhode Island such time as he may require.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I thank my colleague for yielding to me the time, and I am glad to speak.

I have long been interested in the eastern end of the Mediterranean, Greece, Cyprus, Turkey, and Israel; and I have had the experience of visiting in Cyprus both sides of the frontier there, the Greek and Turkish sides.

I wrote a report for my colleagues on the Committee on Foreign Relations in 1975. Also, earlier than that I introduced at various times different amendments suggesting that there be an embargo on arms to Greece during the years Greece was under the junta, and my own view was that it was incorrect policy on our part, adverse to our interests, to make arms available, and I was able to research three different resolutions I introduced in those years.

One of these resolutions was cosponsored by Senator JACKSON, and finally passed. So my thought with regard to the importance of the use of the embargo as a means of carrying out foreign policy objectives is not new, and I have sought to practice it in a very even-handed way. I have supported or introduced just about as many resolutions or more, in fact, bearing down on the Greek junta when it was in charge, as on Turkey.

With that introduction, I would like to express my strong opposition to this amendment. The amendment was considered in the Committee on Foreign Relations, was discussed at some length and was defeated by a vote of 8 to 4.

It can be said that if all members had been there maybe the result would have been different. But that is not correct. The vote would have been different but not the result because even if ther had been a full turnout, and the other four members had voted for the amendment, there would have been an 8 to 8 vote; and that would not have been sufficient to carry the motion to lift the embargo.

In its report, the committee stated:

In recognizing the need to maintain close relationships with two key NATO allies, Turkey and Greece, the Committee nevertheless regrets the lack of any substantial progress in the Cyprus question.

The lack of any such progress continues to be the key issue in judging whether the embargo should be lifted or retained. My own view is that certainly the embargo will be lifted eventually, circumstances will change, but now is not the time to lift the arms embargo against Turkey.

To lift the embargo without requiring a substantially complete withdrawal of Turkish occupation forces from northern Cyprus would undermine the rule of law, would call into question our commitment to human rights, would make a Cyprus settlement more difficult, and would strengthen the anti-U.S. and anti-NATO forces in Greece. My reasons for reaching these conclusions are as follows:

First of all, the Arms Export Control Act limits the transfer of U.S. military equipment solely to "internal security," "legitimate self-defense," and other nonaggressive purposes, and provides that a country violating these provisions shall be ineligible for military aid until the President determines that a "violation has ceased" and "will not recur." The Congress imposed the embargo only after President Ford refused to enforce this law in response to the Turkish invasion of Cyprus in 1974. To lift the embargo while the violation of American law continues and the requirements for restoring military aid have not been met would be a repudiation of our law and would communicate to the world that we are not serious about controlling the use of U.S. arms.

The arguments that the law has been upheld by our having imposed the embargo for 3½ years and that the embargo should be lifted because it has failed to promote a Cyprus settlement do not wash. The embargo has never been rigorously applied or used by any administration as leverage with Turkey. The Ford administration opposed the embargo from the beginning, tried to overturn it after it was enacted, and when all else failed, got congressional approval for sizable exemptions from the embargo based on assurances that they would promote Turkish flexibility on Cyprus. The Ford administration also used a little-known NATO agency to send Turkey over $30 million in military supplies beyond the congressionally approved exemptions.

This was NAMSA, the NATO Maintenance and Supply Agency in Luxembourg—the so-called Luxembourg boutique.

While the Carter administration initially endorsed the embargo, it too has sought exemptions bringing the total to a whopping $600 million since the embargo was imposed.

Moreover, for fiscal year 1979 the Carter administration is asking for more in combined military and economic aid for Turkey than was provided just prior to the embargo. Even before President Carter decided to oppose the embargo, his Ambassador in Turkey, Ronald Spiers, undercut the embargo by stating in an interview in Ankara on January 24, 1978, that "the embargo doesn't serve any American interest," and expressing his "hope that it will be removed." It is no wonder that Turkey has not taken the embargo seriously. It is not the embargo that has failed, but rather the policy of increasingly relaxing it and thereby rewarding Turkish intransigence on Cyprus.

The charge that the embargo has been selectively applied to Turkey rings hollow. Even Secretary of State Vance would not support such a charge when he testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee on June 28. The Congress did nothing when Turkey initially invaded Cyprus in July 20, 1974 and brought about the restoration of the legitimate Cypriot Government that had been overthrown earlier that month by advocates of union with Greece. The Congress acted only after the "second invasion" of Cyprus on August 14, 1974 when Turkey expanded its area of control from less than 10 percent to almost 40 percent of Cyprus. Furthermore, the Congress did not make the embargo effective for another 6 months, by which time it was clear that Turkey would not withdraw even after it achieved its purported objective of protecting Turkish Cypriots. No other case of an actual or suspected misuse of American arms has been as flagrant as Turkey's on any criterion of justification, duration, or extent of use of American arms. A 4-year occupation, with the use of American arms, in violation of the treaty, simply cannot be condoned. I cannot tell you what the psychological effect is when you walk through the Turkish area and see Turkish soldiers occupying, in defiance of law, northern Cyprus, with the use of American weapons. To lift the embargo and say, "Go to it, boys," it seems to me, would be very much in opposition to everything for which we stand.

The second reason for not lifting the embargo relates to human rights. The prestigious European Commission on Human Rights last year found Turkey guilty of violating six articles of the European Convention on Human Rights and cited these violations: systematic killings of civilians, rape, torture, extensive looting, and refusal to allow refugees to return to their homes. Amnesty International and ASME Humanitas of West Germany documented similar violations. While it may be difficult to obtain an ironclad indictment of Turkey, the evidence so far is at least sufficient to warrant the continuation of what has turned out to be a very limited embargo. Also, how could we retain our credibility regarding the sanctions we have imposed in Latin America on human rights grounds, or the Soviet Union through the Jackson-Vanik amendment, if we did not uphold the law with respect to Turkey? Should we tell the world that if violators only hang tough, we will eventually relent?

Third, lifting the embargo now would remove any incentive for Turkey to negotiate seriously regarding Cyprus. If Turkey has not responded to the annual relaxation of the embargo, why should it change if the final vestige of America's tangible expression of interest in a Cyprus settlement is removed? Much is made of Turkey's April settlement proposal, but it is so unresponsive to Greek Cypriot concerns and so damaging in its effort to create, in effect, two separate Cypriot states, that it can only be characterized as a crude propaganda ploy. The offer to reduce from about 40 percent to 39 percent the amount of territory for the Turkish Cypriots, who compromise only 18 percent of the island's population, is particularly outrageous. The Turkish Cypriot's recent offer to allow 35,000 Greek Cypriots to return to Varosha, a suburb of the formerly Greek Cypriot but now abandoned city of Famagusta, is also worth little, as Varosha's ultimate status is unclear, and the basic constitutional and territorial issues separating Greek and Turkish Cypriots have not been addressed in any reasonable manner.

Turkey has already succeeded in insuring that a Cyprus settlement will involve some kind of bizonal arrangement, but the continued presence of its troops can only cause the Greek Cypriots to resist negotiating the terms of this new reality. This idea of a bizonal arrangement is not new. This is what I suggested in 1975, in the body of the Foreign Relations Committee report.

In this connection, why is it wrong for the United States to apply pressure on Turkey through the embargo, but all right for Turkey, through its occupation, to apply much greater pressure on the Greek Cypriots? The sooner Turkish troops are removed, the sooner serious negotiations will take place; but as long as the troops remain, the embargo is ncessary to insure that Cyprus is not bargaining from weakness.

Finally, lifting the embargo would be perceived in Greece as giving Turkey carte blanche for the use of American arms in the Eastern Mediterranean. Greece and Turkey are long-time antagonists, and tensions between the two countries are high because of their dispute over the division of the continental shelf in the Aegean. Greece would, therefore, be understandably disturbed if we lifted the embargo now. Anti-United States and anti-NATO sentiment is already strong in Greece, and lifting the embargo would increase the prospect that the Caramanlis government will be succeeded by an anti-Western one.

In the rush to mollify Turkey and prevent it from breaking with NATO—a possibility that Turkish Premier Ecevit flatly ruled out during his recent visit to the United States—it should be borne in mind that Greece has already severed its military ties with NATO because of the Cyprus invasion. Lifting the embargo would derail the effort to restore those ties.

We ought to bear in mind, also, in connection with the point that was earlier cited concerning the importance of Turkey to Greece and to NATO, that, as Secretary Brown said in the Senate hearings of June 28:

> Without Greek participation in NATO, Turkey would be physically isolated from its nearest NATO ally by 700 miles, and its early warning communications links with NATO, which now pass through Greece, would be weakened. Warsaw Pact forces could assail the Turkish Straits unimpeded by threat of a Greek flank attack. Greek naval forces would not be available to help counter Soviet forces moving in from the Black Sea. A nonalined Greece would complicate allied operations in the Aegean both in peace and wartime.

Both Greece and Turkey are essential to NATO, but what might be gained with Turkey by lifting the embargo is likely to be more than offset by the deterioration of relations with Greece.

In this connection, the recovery of the use of our four intelligence collection bases in Turkey is no longer as important as it was once thought to be, as we have been able to develop alternative sources for most of the information previously collected in Turkey. Former Defense Secretary Laird put it bluntly when he said as long ago as August 1975, that "we don't need Turkey to verify a SALT agreement."

Since the embargo has not significantly slowed the flow of arms to Turkey, it has become largely symbolic; but that symbolism is important as a sign of America's disapproval of Turkey's actions in Cyprus, as a sign of America's seriousness with regard to making sure that the weapons which we make available to other nations are used only for defensive purposes and not used for the occupation of peace loving nations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an article from the Washington Post of July 18, 1978, written by me, and also an editorial from the New York Times of July 22, 1978.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CYPRUS AND THE SENATE

The Senate is about to vote on whether to continue the limitations on arms sales to Turkey. They were imposed after Ankara used American-supplied weapons to occupy two-fifths of Cyprus in 1974, in violation of a Congressional prohibition. We have argued in the past that the limits should be kept until Turkey indicates it will withdraw its forces. We still think so.

Few controversies are as vexing as the fued between the half million Greek Cypriots and the 120,000 Turkish Cypriots over how they will coexist on their island. Their centuries-old quarrel has reached into American politics. The Turks and Turkish Cypriots and their American sympathizers contend that national pride forbids concessions on Cyprus so long as the "embargo" stands. Direfully, they predict that maintaining last year's $175-million limit on arms sales will drive Turkey out of NATO, perhaps even into Moscow's arms. But it would be no gain for the West to purchase Turkish good will at the price of Greek resentment.

When Jimmy Carter was a candidate for President he held that the restriction on arms sales should stand until Ankara withdrew the force that enables Turkish Cypriots, with 20 percent of the island's population, to ocupy roughly 40 percent of its territory. This spring, however, he urged that the embargo be lifted. Administration spokesmen maintain that once it is lifted, Ankara will make generous diplomatic proposals. But the Government of Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit has so far given no sign that it is prepared to risk the domestic consequences of offering the concessions needed to reach an accommodation. The vague proposal put forward by the Turkish Cypriots on Thursday for resettling some Greek refugees is welcome but scarcely sufficient. The Turkish concessions need to be territorial.

Where Greek Cypriots go wrong is in insisting that their preponderance in numbers also entitles them to the kind of predominance they enjoyed under the island's 1960 constitution. If the Turkish Cypriots would yield significantly on territory, they could more credibly insist on a constitution that provides for virtually autonomous states for the two communities, linking them only for a minimum of such "federal" functions as conducting foreign affairs and issuing currency.

Greek Cypriots denounce this idea a mere division of the island. Even if this were true, there would be no alternative; nothing except good will can force the two communities to work together. Because ending Turkey's occupation remains an essential first step toward creating an atmosphere of trust, Congress should not yet relax the restrictions on arms sales. It should make clear to the Greek Cypriots, however, that the United States intends to help them reclaim their farms and villages but not to restore their domination of the Turkish population.

THE CASE AGAINST LIFTING THE TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO

Now is not the time to lift the arms embargo against Turkey. To do so would undermine the rule of law, would call into question our commitment to human rights, would make a Cyprus settlement more difficult, and would strengthen the anti-U.S. and anti-NATO forces in Greece.

Rule of law. The Arms Export Control Act limits military aid to "internal security" and "legitimate self-defense" purposes and provides that aid cannot be resumed until the president determines that a "violation has ceased." Congress imposed the embargo only after President Ford refused to enforce this law in response to the Turkish invasion of Cyprus in 1974. To lift the embargo while the violation of American law continues and the requirements for restoring military aid have not been met would be a repudiation of our law and would communicate to the world that we are not serious about controlling the use of U.S. arms.

The argument that the law has been upheld by our having imposed the embargo for 3½ years does not wash. The embargo has never been rigorously applied or used by any administration as leverage with Turkey. The Ford administration opposed the embargo from the beginning, tried to overturn it after it was enacted and, when all else failed, got congressional approval for sizable exemptions from the embargo based on assurances that they would promote Turkish flexibility on Cyprus.

The Carter administration has also sought exemptions, bringing the total to a whopping $600 million since the embargo was imposed, and is asking for more in combined military and economic aid for Turkey in 1979 than was provided just prior to the embargo. Even before President Carter decided to oppose the embargo, his ambassador in Turkey, Ronald Spiers, undercut the embargo by stating in an interview in Ankara on January 24, 1978, that "the embargo doesn't serve any American interest." It is not the embargo that has failed, but rather the policy of increasingly relaxing it and thereby rewarding Turkish intransigence on Cyprus.

The charge that the embargo has been selectively applied to Turkey rings hollow. Even Secretary of State Cyprus Vance would not support such a charge when he testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee on June 28. Congress did nothing when Turkey initially invaded Cyprus in July 1974, but acted only after the "second invasion" of Cyprus in August 1974 when Turkey expanded its area of control from less than 10 percent to almost 40 percent of Cyprus. Furthermore, Congress did not make the embargo effective for another six months, by which time it was clear that Turkey would not withdraw even after it achieved what purports to be its objective of protecting Turkish Cypriots. Also, how could we retain our credibility regarding the sanctions we have imposed in Latin America on human-rights grounds, or the Soviet Union through the Jackson-Vanik amendment, if we did not uphold the law with respect to Turkey?

Cyprus settlement. Since Turkey has not responded to the annual relaxation of the embargo, there is no incentive to change if the final vestige of America's tangible expression of interest in a Cyprus settlement is removed. Much is made of Turkey's April settlement proposal, but it is so unresponsive to Greek Cypriot concerns and so damaging in its effort to create, in effect, two separate Cypriot states, that it can only be characterized as a crude propaganda ploy. The offer to reduce from 40 percent to 39 percent the amount of territory for the Turkish Cypriots, who constitute only 18 percent of the island's population, is particularly outrageous.

As long as the Turkish troops remain, the embargo is necessary to ensure that Cyprus is not bargaining from weakness.

Effect on Greece. Lifting the embargo would be perceived in Greece as giving Turkey carte blanche for the use of American arms in the eastern Mediterranean. Tensions between Greece and Turkey are high because of their dispute over the division of the continental shelf in the Aegean. Greece would, therefore, be understandably disturbed if we lifted the embargo now. Since the embargo has not significantly slowed the flow of arms to Turkey, it has become largely symbolic; but that symbolism is important as a sign of America's disapproval of Turkey's actions in Cyprus. As a presidential candidate, Jimmy Carter said that "we would be negligent of the moral issues and courting disaster if we fail to couple the improvement in relations with Turkey with improved progress on the Cyprus issue." That statement was valid in 1976 and continues to be today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CASE. Is the Senator seeking time?

Mr. EAGLETON. Will the Senator yield 12 minutes to me?

Mr. PELL. I am not controlling time for the amendment. The Senator from New Jersey would have to yield.

Mr. EAGLETON. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield 12 minutes to me to speak in opposition?

Mr. CASE. I am happy to yield 12 minutes to the Senator.

(Mr. HODGES assumed the chair.)

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, as we begin debate on the Turkish arms embargo, the fourth anniversary of the August 1974, Turkish invasion of Cyprus is approaching. At that time, the Turkish army took by force nearly 40 percent of the island, driving some 200,000 Greek-Cypriots from their homes. This status continues unchanged today.

The history of the arms embargo is well-known to most of my colleagues. It was imposed because Turkey—in conscious violation of U.S. law and bilateral agreements between the United States and Turkey—used U.S.-supplied weapons in its 1974 invasion of Cyprus. Provisions of those laws spell out beyond a doubt that such weapons are for legitimate self-defense purposes only and set forth the penalties which will follow if a violation occurs.

That body of law is as follows: The 1947 bilateral agreement between Turkey and the United States; the 1960 London-Zurich agreements; the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, particularly sections 505 (a) and (b); and the Foreign Military Sales Act of 1968, section 3(c) and section 4.

I would like to quote portions of each of those statutes or laws which apply in this case.

The 1947 agreement on aid to Turkey states in part:

The Government of Turkey will make use of the assistance furnished for the purposes for which it has been accorded. . . . The Government of Turkey will not transfer, without the consent of the Government of the United States . . . the use of any such article . . . for any purpose other than that for which the article . . . is furnished.

The 1960 London-Zurich agreement—I quote from a GAO report on the subject of the illegality of Turkish use of arms in the 1974 Cyprus invasion—provides:

That military assistance furnished by the United States to Turkey [can] not be deployed on Cyprus without the formal consent of the United States Government.

The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, section 502, specifies:

Defense articles and defense services to any country shall be furnished solely for internal security, for legitimate self-defense, to permit the recipient country to participate in regional or collective arrangements or measures consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, or otherwise to permit the recipient country to participate in collective measures requested by the United Nations for the purpose of maintaining or restoring international peace and security. . . .

And, finally, the Foreign Military Sales Act of 1968, section 3(c), provides:

Except as otherwise provided in subsection (d), any foreign country which hereafter uses defense articles or defense services furnished such country under this Act, in substantial violation of any provision of this Act or any agreement entered into under this Act, shall be immediately ineligible for further cash sales, credits or guarantees.

Mr. President, I have not engaged in this recitation of U.S. law for academic purposes, but to set forth beyond a doubt the clear violation that occurred with the Turkish invasion of Cyprus and the subsequent occupation of the island. The compilation of laws and statutes spells out to the letter the obligations undertaken by the recipient government—in this case, Turkey.

If we vote to repeal the embargo, are we not, in fact, sending a message to other countries to whom we supply arms that they need not take U.S. law seriously? If we fail to hold the line on Turkey, what happens somewhere down the line when a similar incident occurs? Do we continue to tape on the wrist those who violate the obligations undertaken in an agreement with us and turn our back on the law?

If we have learned anything in the aftermath of Watergate, it is that disregard for the law is insidious and habit-forming. Our society is only as strong as the foundation of our law. The decision we make on the arms embargo will be a measure of the strength of that foundation.

United States concern with Cyprus is a matter of longstanding. Cyprus has been the subject of four special Presidential missions. In 1964, President Johnson sent George Ball to Turkey to inform the Turks—who were then contemplating an invasion of Cyprus—that such an invasion would violate the previously mentioned body of law, and they would risk losing U.S. assistance and military aid if the invasion were carried off. The same year, President Johnson, delivered the following strong message in a letter to Premier Inonu of Turkey:

I wish . . . to call your attention to the bilateral agreement between the United States and Turkey in the field of military assistance. Under Article IV of the Agreement with Turkey of July 1947, your Government is required to obtain United States consent for the use of military assistance for purposes other than those for which such assistance was furnished. Your Government has on several occasions acknowledged to the United States that you fully understand this condition.

I must tell you in all candor that the United States cannot agree to the use of any United States supplied military equipment for a Turkish intervention in Cyprus. . . .

No clearer declaration of the consequences of Turkey's utilization of American equipment could have been formulated than was done in this very direct and blunt letter from President Johnson to Turkish Premier Inonu in 1964.

Again in 1967, a crisis erupted, followed by a new threat of a Turkish invasion of Cyprus. This time President Johnson sent Cyrus Vance, who warned Turkey that an invasion of Cyprus would trigger the effect of the bilateral agreements and statutes. The crisis was averted.

In July 1974, President Nixon dispatched Joseph Sisco, then Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs, in an effort to forestall a pending Turkish invasion of Cyprus. Sisco's mission came too late, and by the time he arrived in Ankara, the decision to invade was all but finalized.

In response to Sisco's impassioned request that Turkey call off the invasion, Prime Minister Ecevit—fully cognizant of Turkey's obligations under the law—responded:

The United States and Turkey have both made mistakes—the United States by preventing Turkish military action and Turkey by accepting. We should not make the same mistakes again.

As we know, the first invasion occurred on July 20, 1974, followed by another invasion on August 14, 1974, when Turkey expanded further into the northern part of Cyprus. It was the second invasion that put the wheels of U.S. law and bilateral agreements with Turkey into motion, necessitating the action taken by Congress in imposing the embargo.

Critics of the embargo put forth the argument that Congress acted hastily in singling out this ally to chastise, and that the punishment was too harsh. These critics overlook the fact that, in the interest of obtaining a Cyprus settlement—a settlement which Secretary of State Kissinger intimated was forthcoming—Congress delayed the effective date of the embargo until February 5, 1975, to permit Kissinger to pursue settlement efforts. Congress dealt with Secretary Kissinger in good faith during this time; unfortunately, we were not afforded the same courtesy by Mr. Kissinger, who would not make public his own legal department's opinion, which concurred with the opinion of Congress that the invasion did constitute an illegal use of U.S.-supplied weapons.

The critics also overlook the fact that the embargo has always been a partial embargo: During the Ford administration it was eased to permit $125 million in FMS to Turkey; this amount was later increased to $175 million early in the Carter administration. Even with the arms embargo in place, Turkey remains the third largest recipient of U.S. foreign military sales, third only to Israel and South Korea.

The Turks have also benefited from the use of a little-known NATO supply agency called NAMSA—referred to by Columnist Mary McGrory as the "Pentagon's boutique in Luxembourg"—to purchase some $30 million of additional weapons in circumvention of the embargo.

All this considered, it can hardly be said that Congress acted either precipitously or exceedingly harshly in its handling of this situation. To the contrary, I think Congress has taken care to allow the administrations involved a degree of flexibility in their efforts to bring about a Cyprus settlement.

Mr. President, there are several issues of importance at stake in this vote. One is the principle of law—law which constitutes the fundamental underpinning of our society.

Another is that of the fate of some 200,000 Greek-Cypriot refugees who to this day have not been permitted to resettle in their homes in northern Cyprus. There are currently some 22,000 Turkish troops occupying nearly 40 percent of Cyprus.

I might add, at this point, that the 40 percent of Cyprus held by Turkish troops is precisely what they have held since August of 1974. The Turks have not budged 1 inch from what they took by force 4 years ago.

The Turks have been asked to open the Nicosia airport. They refuse.

The Turks have been asked to open the highway between Nicosia and Famagusta, the two main cities of Cyprus. They refuse.

The Turks have been asked to return the unoccupied portion of new Famagusta to the Greeks so that some of the homeless refugees can be housed. They refuse.

In short, the Turks in 1974 grabbed off as much of Cyprus as they could swallow and have been intransigent, unyielding, and uncompromising ever since.

While I am on the subject of new Famagusta—sometimes called Varosha—I caution my colleagues not to be taken in by the statement made last Thursday (July 20) by the leader of the Turkish Cypriot community, Mr. Rauf Denktash.

Let us examine Mr. Denktash's statement. First, what about its timing coming on the very eve of this Turkish embargo debate? I am very suspicious of "death-bed conversions" and "one minute to midnight" changes of heart. The very timing of the statement's release makes suspect both the intent and the substance of Mr. Denktash's statement.

As to the statement itself, I hope my colleagues will read it closely. It does nothing. It says that Mr. Denktash is "prepared to discuss" new Famagusta. Is that not marvelous? Is that not wonderful? I guess we should say, Hallelujah. After 4 long, tragic years during which 200,000 Greek-Cypriots have been homeless, Mr. Denktash is now "prepared to discuss" new Famagusta.

Mr. President, what I have said repeatedly during these 4 years has been that Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots could not simply talk about doing, a few positive things in order to demonstrate a modicum of good faith in achieving a viable settlement in Cyprus. All of the things I have mentioned earlier—opening the airport, opening the road between Nicosia and Famagusta, returning uninhabitated Varosha—new Famagusta—to the Greek Cypriots for their occupancy and their administration—are things which Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots could have done. For Mr. Denktash now to say, on the even of the Senate's vote on the embargo, that he is willing to discuss the future of new Famagusta is really to say nothing of substance. It is purely and simply a cosmetic ploy to project, on the eve of the Senate vote, a posture of "sweet reasonableness" in the hope that this will erase 4 years of unyielding intrasigence.

Mr. President, by what sense of equity or morality should we remove the embargo against Turkey? The embargo, when finally imposed in early 1975, was a direct consequence of Turkey's willful, conscious, premeditated violation of American law. Do we now knuckle under to Turkey and say that, despite the blatant illegality of the Turkish occupation and Turkey's refusal to make even the slightest of concessions, Turkey now deserves or has in some mystical way earned the lifting of the embargo?

When we vote on this issue, we are not just voting on a question of U.S. foreign policy—we are determining, in part, the future of 200,000 refugees. In a collection of essays entitled "Cyprus Reviewed," Michael Attalides points out that—

> The ultimate [political] reality is that of the people whose lives are dislocated. . . . the price of politics can be human loss—loss of life, loss of material, loss of dignity and loss of meaning.

If the embargo is lifted, absent a Cyprus settlement, it is unlikely that the Turks will find any reason to alter the status quo. If they have not made any movement toward a Cyprus settlement while the embargo is in place, what incentive could possibly remain following its repeal?

Removal of the embargo will imply U.S. sanction of the status quo and will only finalize the displacement of the refugees and legitimize the physical alteration of Cyprus that has occurred since 1974 under Turkish occupation.

Let me relate one refugee's experience:

> We left the village on Thursday, early morning, with nothing, and I sat idle for 2 or 3 months. . . . I wanted to live with more dignity so I kept trying until I found work. . . .
> I haven't taken one of the loans to farmers that the government has been offering because I am completely disillusioned by the situation of Cyprus today. I am in complete uncertainty . . . no one knows . . . what will happen each day, or what to expect from the Turkish conqueror. I have neither the courage nor the appetite to find land to cultivate to live.

Mr. President, I visited Cyprus in December 1975, and saw firsthand the tragic plight of the refugees. Their pride and strength has helped them endure the situation, but their spirit is discouraged and they feel increasingly resigned to their situation. I cannot, in good conscience, support repeal of the embargo with the certain knowledge that it means a continuation of the hardships these people have suffered already.

Another consideration in this vote is the impact lifting the embargo could have on Greece. The last election in Greece was a surprise to many. Not only did Karamanlis not receive the margin anticipated, the vote also gave a healthy 25 percent of the vote to Andreas Papandreou, who is not known for his pro-American attitudes.

Papandreou would like to see Greece withdraw from NATO and develop a strong, independent military structure, in addition to developing its own arms industry to make it further isolated from the West. Papandreou was quoted in a recent New York Times interview as saying:

> If [Greece is] exposed to real danger, we could and should arm ourselves with nuclear weapons. And I can assure you we can get them.

If Congress chooses to reverse itself on the Turkish arms embargo, it is possible that we will be sending a signal to Greece that could trigger off strong anti-American sentiment and play into the hands of Papandreou and his supporters. It would not serve the interests of either the United States or of NATO to have Greece isolate herself.

Mr. President, with due respect to my distinguished colleagues from West Virginia and South Dakota, I must say that passage of the Byrd-McGovern amendment would deal a serious blow to the principle of law we have taken such pains to preserve these 3 years the embargo has been in place.

If the amendment passes, the embargo would be repealed under the transparent guise of a "policy statement" alining the United States on the side of progress toward a Cyprus settlement.

Mr. President, there is nothing new in this approach. In point of fact, it is a restatement of the policy we have supposedly been following these 3 years—tying arms sales to Turkey to a Cyprus settlement. The only difference now is that—if the embargo is lifted unconditionally—the Turks will be rewarded for their refusal to budge on Cyprus.

We have consistently encouraged the Turks to take some tangible action on Cyprus in exchange for lifting the embargo. We have shown our good faith by allowing a ceiling of $175 million under the embargo. The Turks have not budged. I fail to see the logic now in handing them another quid without a single quo in return. Removal of the embargo does not just give the Turks license to buy whatever they want in the way of arms, it also removes any prohibition on transferral of arms to Cyprus and on increasing their troop level on Cyprus. For these reasons, I think passage of the Byrd-McGovern amendment would be a grave mistake.

Mr President, we have heard the phrase rule of law invoked so frequently in the recent past that for some it may have become a cliché. This is regrettable. Without the law to bind us as a nation, we run the risk of succumbing to the tyranny of the minority, to any man's will. This runs contrary to the founding principles of our country.

Sir Anthony Eden, at the time of the Suez crisis, made the following observation:

> Drift is the demon of democracy. Democracies should rather consider, in any step they take in world affairs, whether what they do will serve only to relax tension for a while, or whether it is in the true interest of lasting peace. That is the difference between appeasement and peace.

Mr. President, that, it seems to me, is the choice we are confronted with today: appeasement of the Turks or principle. If we lift the embargo, we have decided that it is best to appease the Turkish Government, at the expense of the rule of law, at the expense of 200,000 Greek-Cypriot refugees, and at the expense, perhaps, of our relationship with Greece.

I hope my colleagues will give careful consideration to the points I have raised. And I hope the choice we make today will favor the principle of law, rather than the expedient of appeasement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DURKIN. Will the Senator yield me about 5 minutes?

Mr. CASE. Mr President, I yield the Senator from New Hampshire 5 minutes.

Mr. DURKIN. I thank the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DURKIN. Mr. President, 3 years ago the U.S. Congress took decisive, yet reluctant action against Turkey for its illegal and unwarranted invasion of Cyprus.

Let us not kid ourselves. It was illegal and it was an unwarranted invasion of Cyprus, while our State Department looked the other way.

The invasion, which was against the laws of this country and NATO agreements, to which Turkey was a willing partner, was universally condemned. The decision by the U.S. Congress to impose an arms embargo against Turkey was universally applauded and wholly justified.

Today the administration is asking the Congress to remove that embargo, though Turkey continues to fail to be in compliance with our laws, the NATO charter, and United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3212 of November 1, 1974, calling for removal of all foreign military forces from Cyprus. What has changed, Mr. President, to convince us to change our minds? Regrettably, nothing, Mr. President.

Nothing has changed except the President has gone back on another campaign promise.

Therefore, the administration position should be rejected and the arms embargo retained, certainly until Turkey comes into compliance with our laws and the NATO Charter, and takes the substantive actions necessary under resolution 3212 for achieving a real and lasting peace in Cyprus.

The reasons to continue the embargo are clear, though the administration has tried to obfuscate them. Most fundamentally, 4 years after the illegal invasion of Cyprus, the Turkish Government continues to have illegal occupying military forces on Cyprus, forces which are preventing Greek Cypriots from returning to their homes and their livelihoods. These forces, of course, are using American military equipment during their illegal occupation.

Additionally, the Turkish Government has failed to take significant actions or make significant proposals that could contribute to a peaceful resolution of the Cyprus tragedy. The Greek Cypriots have consistently made good faith efforts to negotiate an end to the dispute which affects not only Cypriots, Greeks, and Turks, but all of the NATO alliance. But the Turkish Cypriots and the Turks have not responded in kind.

Instead we see tens of thousands of Turkish troops with American military hardware occupying almost 40 percent of the island of Cyprus, though the Turkish Cypriots comprise only about 20 percent of the population. We see tens of thousands of displaced Greek Cypriots being denied their fundamental human rights as they exist in temporary homes and struggle to eke out bare livings. We learn of torture and other inhumane treatment by the occupying forces, documented by numerous sources. And we hear of so-called peace proposals by Turkey which are so unrealistic that they cannot even be considered as negotiating positions.

I realize that this Senate has the responsibility to be concerned not only about Greco-Turkish relations and about the suffering residents of Cyprus, but also the importance of relations in the Aegean for world security. The United States must work to insure that contention between Greece and Turkey does not weaken the southern flank of Europe so important to the NATO alliance. Both Greece and Turkey, if its leaders work within a proper international framework, are important to NATO, and very important to us.

But lifting the embargo at this time will not help strengthen the alliance. The opposite will be the likely outcome, for a decision to lift the embargo without moves toward peace by the Turks will undoubtedly anger the Greek Government and its people. That will lead to a further Greek drift away from NATO, especially considering the strong feelings against NATO among the Greek opposition parties. I do not believe that Greek Prime Minister Caramanalis would engage in the type of dangerous flirtations with the Soviet Union that his Turkish counterpart seems to enjoy simply as a result of our lifting the embargo, but certainly he and his government would have a more difficult time convincing their people of the importance of NATO if our country, the leading member of NATO, removes the embargo in the absence of any real peace initiatives by Turkey.

Mr. President, may I have 2 more minutes?

Mr. SARBANES. Senator CASE asked me to stand in and I yield 2 more minutes to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for an additional 2 minutes.

Mr. DURKIN. I thank the Chair.

Both Greece and Turkey play an essential role in the southern region, and they complement each other in our overall NATO defense position. Their geographical location makes them the major hindrance to any Warsaw Pact and Soviet aspirations toward the Mediterranean and Middle East. They each provide important facilities for the U.S. 6th Fleet and other military and intelligence activities. That is why it is imperative that a peaceful resolution of the Cyprus dispute and other points of contention between Greece and Turkey be reached at the earliest possible time.

But lifting the embargo that this country imposed in the face of illegal actions by Turkey without necessary action by Turkey is not the way to achieve that aim—in fact, it will produce the opposite result, I am afraid. It is time for the Turkish leadership, not the Congress, to bite the bullet on this matter. The Turks can be assured that this Senator and my colleagues in this Chamber will not hesitate for a second to take actions to lift the embargo when the occupying forces are removed from Cyprus, when the displaced Greek Cypriots are allowed to return to their homes, and when the Turkish Cypriots and the Turks are willing to negotiate a true and reasonable settlement within the context of Resolution 3212.

Until that moment comes, however, the embargo must be maintained. As President Carter stated so eloquently shortly before taking office:

> We would be negligent of the moral issues and courting longer-range disaster if we fail to couple the improvement in relations with Turkey with increased fair progress on the Cyprus issue.

I could not agree with that statement more, Mr. President, and that is why I will vote to maintain the embargo on arms sales to Turkey that Congress so wisely imposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SARBANES. Does the Senator wish additional time?

Mr. DURKIN. One minute.

Mr. SARBANES. I yield the Senator an additional 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for an additional 2 minutes.

Mr. DURKIN. I thank the Senator and I will be very brief.

Last week, I submitted for the RECORD President Carter's numerous campaign statements, in which he told the people of New Hampshire, he told the people in every primary State, that he was opposed to lifting the embargo. Now we see a change of heart.

We saw in Bonn last week that he told the European leaders he was going to solve the energy crisis with the stroke of a pen. How can they have any faith in that statement, when the people of this country cannot have any faith in the campaign promises he made the length and breadth of this country?

I agree with the President when he said we should not lift the embargo. I am dismayed and disappointed that he has let the State Department talk him into repudiating that. There is no other word for it. You can dress it up, but there is no other word for it. He is turning his back on numerous campaign pledges to oppose lifting the embargo.

We talk about human rights a lot in the Senate. Those poor people in Cyprus do not have human rights. They can barely eke out an existence. What is all this hullabaloo for human rights if we are going to turn our backs on the people in Cyprus?

If this country is going to stand for human rights, we had better stand for human rights in Cyprus. We are not advancing the cause of human rights in Cyprus by lifting the embargo. For that and the other reasons I have discussed I will vote against lifting the embargo, and I urge my colleagues to do the same.

I thank the Senator for the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee for relinquishing this time to me.

Mr. President, the amendment before the Senate to lift our arms embargo against Turkey is one of the more important foreign policy decisions to come before the Senate this year. The outcome could affect our relations with the countries of the eastern Mediterranean, as well as the future condition of NATO's southern flank.

When the Senate first considered military sanctions against Turkey in the fall of 1974, I supported an embargo for two reasons. First, I felt it was necessary for Congress to firmly indicate its indignation over Turkish violation of its arms transfer agreement with the United States. Second, I hoped that the imposition of an arms embargo would interpose some leverage on Turkey to withdraw its occupying troops from northern Cyprus.

After reviewing the 3½-year history of the embargo, I have concluded that the first point has been made, but that we have failed to realize the second. American objections to Turkey's invasion of Cyprus has been made abundantly clear to Ankara. I seriously doubt that anything further can be gained in this respect by continuing the embargo. On the other hand, the embargo has not helped to produce a settlement of the Cyprus problem. Indeed, it may well have had the opposite effect. It has become an inflamed political issue in Turkey that many regard as an insuperable obstacle to a negotiated settlement of the Cyprus dispute. Under these circumstances, it would seem prudent for the Senate to alter a policy which has failed to bring about its intended objective.

The factors which led to the imposition of the initial embargo should be recalled. First, there was the question of Turkish violation of our bilateral agreement. The initial Turkish military action on Cyprus might have been viewed as consistent with Turkish international obligations to guarantee the Cypriot Constitution and hence, no violation of the agreement. However, the second Turkish offensive took place after the ultranationalist Greek Cypriot Government fell, during a declared ceasefire, and after a U.N. resolution had been passed calling for withdrawal of all Turkish troops from the island. By then, American law clearly required an immediate termination of all further military sales and assistance to Turkey. In October 1974, the Comptroller General of the United States criticized the State Department for failing to make such a determination. Congress had little choice but to enact separate legislation embargoing all military sales to Turkey; 3½ years have now passed. Intervening events have raised serious questions about the wisdom of extending the embargo any further.

Not only must we ask whether our own national interest would be served by such a decision, but we must consider the interests of the NATO Alliance as well. Since 1974, Turkey's military position has deteriorated. Its equipment has grown increasingly obsolescent, much of it having been immobilized due to the lack of spare parts. If the deterioration continues unabated, Turkey will be unable to fulfill adequately its important NATO mission.

Events since 1974 have also demonstrated the futility of the embargo as leverage to extract Turkish concessions on Cyprus. During the first 3 years following congressional enactment of the embargo, the Turkish Government under Prime Minister Demirel refused to negotiate over Cyprus. The Turkish position was against parleying as long as we held a "loaded gun to their heads." Thus, the Turks would not budge until the embargo was removed, while Congress would not remove the embargo until the Turks budged. Negotiations were stalemated.

Given the decision of the Carter administration to urge Congress to lift the embargo, this stalemate over Cyprus was partially broken earlier this year when the newly elected Turkish Prime Minister, Bulent Ecevit, announced his intention to negotiate a solution to the Cyprus problem without waiting for the actual removal of the embargo. Turkish Cypriots subsequently tabled a new negotiating position, containing token territorial concessions along with a proposal for a weak federation. Ecevit also indicated his willingness to allow Greek Cypriots to resettle in the city of Varosha, held by Turkish troops. This initial Turkish negotiating position fell far short of Greek Cypriots' expectations, but it represented at least a move toward reopening the talks.

U.N. Secretary General Kurt Waldheim called the proposals concrete and substantive, while our own administration officials testified that they believe Turkish-Cypriots will show more flexibility as the talks proceed.

Evidence that these forecasts are not farfetched is to be found in the action taken by the Turkish Cypriots' leader, Rauf Denktash, on July 20, 1978, the fourth anniversary of the Turkish invasion. According to the State Department, his "open message" states that:

Turkish Cypriots are now prepared to agree to an interim administration for the city of Varosha under U.N. auspices. Talks could begin "promptly" on the nature of the interim U.N. administration.

The Turkish Cypriots say they wish to facilitate the early return of some 35,000 Greek Cypriot residents to their homes and businesses in Varosha.

This new proposal would seem to be a significant indication on the part of Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots that they are prepared to negotiate seriously. It comes on the heels of other recent actions on the Turkish side:

On July 10, for example, two additional brigades, constituting 1,250 Turkish troops, were withdrawn from Cyprus. The Turkish Government has promised that further reductions will be made as negotiations proceed. More than 17,000 troops have been withdrawn from Cyprus since 1974.

The Turkish Cypriots have publicly stated their willingness to reopen the Nicosia airport under U.N. control.

The Turks and Turkish Cypriots have agreed to the idea of establishing a joint committee to deal with the sensitive humanitarian issue of accounting for missing persons.

Taken together, these initiatives on the part of the Turkish side demonstrate that there is reason to expect an earnest negotiation in search of a solution to the Cyprus problem, as long as the Turkish Government does not feel it is being forced to the bargaining table.

On the other hand, if the American arms embargo against Turkey continues in effect, it will remain such a source of antagonism that, in the view of President Carter, it will hamper rather than encourage fruitful negotiations. Sharing that perspective are Secretary Vance, Secretary Brown, the Chiefs of Staff, and other administration spokesmen who, in advocating the removal of the arms embargo, believe that this action will aid progress toward a successful end to the Cyprus problem. In this regard, of course, none of us can be certain that the administration's judgment is correct, but it is the President and his emissaries who have discussed the Cyprus issue in-depth with Ecevit and with Constantine Karamanlis, the Prime Minister of Greece, along with Spyros Kyprianou, the leader of the Greek Cypriots. After examining the case presented by the administration, I think that the President should be entitled to the benefit of the doubt. Therefore, I will accede to the President's request and vote to lift the arms embargo. If Congress concurs, we must hope that their assessment will be proved right and that movement toward a settlement of the Cyprus problem will be forthcoming.

It is also noteworthy that the nature of the embargo itself has changed substantially since it was first enacted in 1974. Today, the embargo is only partial, being limited to government-to-government sales. No longer are there any restrictions on commercial military sales to Turkey. Moreover, the pending amendment would not increase fiscal year 1979 military aid to Turkey, but would simply permit the Turkish Government to purchase for cash additional military equipment through government-to-government channels.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 10 minutes have expired.

Mr. CHURCH. May I have 2 additional minutes?

Mr. PELL. Yes, I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, Turkey is in deep trouble economically and cannot afford large cash payments for military equipment. Therefore, the actual impact of the current embargo is largely symbolic. Practically speaking, Congress has slowly been removing the embargo for several years. This amendment takes the final step.

In these circumstances, the repeal of the arms embargo would not entail a setback for Greece, nor would it mean that Congress is any less concerned about a resolution of the Cyprus dispute. The United States has strong historic, political, cultural, economic, and security ties with Greece. Greek democracy, and the present Greek Prime Minister, Constantine Karamanlis, are held in highest esteem in this country.

Congress will continue to review the progress toward a full settlement of the Cyprus problem.

Senator McGOVERN has language that will make that not only expressly clear but will incorporate it into the action that we take today. In this connection, it is important to note that the administration has not included foreign assistance for Turkey in this bill as part of a 4-year cooperation agreement as originally planned. This change gives Congress the opportunity to review on an annual basis the military and economic assistance proposed for Turkey, in light of the progress made in the Cyprus talks. The aid for Turkey contained in this bill—$175 million in military credits and $50 million in economic aid—is of no small consequence to the Turkish Government. While the arms embargo has proved to be an effective foreign policy instrument, an annual review of Congress of foreign assistance levels to Turkey, bearing Cyprus in mind, might well prove to be a much better instrument.

For all of these reasons, Mr. President, I urge the Senate to support the pending amendment which would repeal the last remnants of the arms embargo against Turkey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield me 15 minutes?

Mr. PELL. In behalf of the Senator from Alabama, the chairman of the committee, I yield 15 minutes to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota is yielded 15 minutes.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, few issues in American foreign policy have engendered such passion as the dispute over the proper U.S. response to events which began in Cyprus in the summer of 1974.

From the outset, the debate was a curious admixture—building from a deep distrust and disapproval of the Kissinger policy in that region, motivated by an urgently felt need to uphold U.S. law at a time when illegality had become a major theme of the American Presidency, and inspired by an earnest desire to provide American support for a just settlement on that small, tragedy-ridden island in the eastern Mediterranean. From this debate, no clear U.S. policy emerged. An embargo—of sorts—was imposed against Turkey by congressional action, but this statute was from the beginning the target of continuing administration efforts to achieve its repeal, efforts encouraged by our NATO allies and clearly visible to Turkish decisionmakers.

The result, instead of a single strong policy, was two policies, each at odds with the other. One was a congressional policy, favoring the retention of sanctions against Turkey pending productive negotiations and the withdrawal from Cyprus of Turkish forces.

The other was an executive branch policy, opposing the partial embargo as being a practical and symbolic impediment both to the maintenance of NATO strength and also to the progress of Cyprus negotiations which had begun under U.N. auspices.

Attuned to the congressional policy were a variety of supporters: Prominent among them were Greek-Americans, as well as others who believed that a violation of the law should not be overlooked and that Turkish actions on Cyprus had been excessive and brutal in the extreme. Favoring the executive branch policy were those concerned to reopen U.S. intelligence bases in Turkey and to maintain Turkey's role in the containment of Soviet power, together with those who believed that the recent history of Cyprus complicated the question of right and wrong more than commonly understood and that the Turkish Government could never be expected to negotiate on Cyprus while under the humiliating duress of the embargo.

For well over 3 years now, the status quo has prevailed. The two American policies have continued to neutralize one another, and little progress has meanwhile occurred on the island which should be the direct focus of our concern. Turkish forces remain, although in slowly diminishing numbers; Cypriot refugees continue their lives in dislocation; the economy of much of Cyprus stagnates; and the fires of hostility among Cypriots and in Greece and Turkey are rekindled daily—all while negotiations toward a just settlement flounder, subordinated to each side's short term tactics of opposing or defending the embargo.

Were the embargo not a matter concerning immense human suffering and the very future of the sovereign republic of Cyprus, the whole question could perhaps be described as ridiculous. What is at issue is a provision of law—section 620(x) of the Foreign Assistance Act—so loosely drawn as to impose little constraint upon the actual transfer of U.S. arms to Turkey. Yet the argument over U.S. policy in the region continues to center on what is called an "embargo." Let us be clear. This provision is primarly symbolic. At this stage—as even its defenders will acknowledge—its principal purpose and effect is not to curtail Turkey's arms supply but rather to stigmatize that nation for its conduct in Cyprus. The question we are asked to consider, then, is whether to retain in law an essentially symbolic provision.

As to the arguments of those who would defend this provision, I am sympathetic but also somewhat puzzled. Having supported the enactment of 620(x), I understand well its original rationale. To me, the salient feature of that rationale was the argument that only a firm U.S. policy could induce the Turkish concessions necessary for a fair settlement. Also persuasive, of course, was the argument that legislative action was needed to uphold the principle that U.S. weapons may not with impunity be turned to aggressive purposes. But this argument from principle, being somewhat muddied by Turkey's role as treaty guarantor as well as the long-standing grievances of the Turkish Cypriot minority, was for me less compelling than the practical argument that tough U.S. action might foster prompt movement toward a just solution for the Cypriot people.

I retain this practical approach—but in so doing I now find myself at variance with certain of my colleagues, who appear to have lost hope that real progress can be achieved on Cyprus and who therefore seem to believe that we must hold fast to the symbolism of our present embargo without regard to its results.

I do not share this view. I believe that our goal must continue to be justice on Cyprus, and I am without doubt that U.S. policy must aggressively pursue this goal, not only in the interests of the people of that nation but in our own interests as well. What happens in future Cyprus negotiations will inevitably bear directly on U.S. relations with both Greece and Turkey and on the relationship of those two countries with each other; thus the outcome in Cyprus will be a central factor in determining the measure of future peace and stability in a region of self-evident importance to the entire Western World.

If justice on Cyprus is our goal, the question at issue is how to pursue it. The answer, I submit, is not to continue a policy which, whatever its association with a principle of law, has not worked. Legal principles derive from experience; they must be applied not in the abstract but in the real world, and such application must always weigh practical consequences, both general and specific.

As to the general consequences in this case, it seems beyond doubt that the point has been made, at least as well as it is going to be made, that the United States takes seriously its prohibitions on using American weapons for aggressive purposes.

Like the Senator from Texas, Senator BENTSEN, who spoke so eloquently on this subject today, I share the necessity of demonstrating our adherence to the American law. But, as to the specific consequences, it also seems beyond a doubt that further application of sanctions—and the continued imposition of a stigma—is no more than a formula for continued deadlock, with no interest on any side truly served.

Nor, on the other hand, do I believe that an effective approach consists in simply repealing section 620(x) on the grounds that it has not worked. Given all that has gone before, it would be all too easy for such an action to be construed in Turkey and elsewhere as a decision to relinquish concern for Cyprus in favor of fortifying the so-called southern flank—the interpretation being, in other words, that military considerations had finally triumphed over moral ones. Such a signal, were it given, could have a perilous consequence—alienating opinion in Greece and dampening Turkey's incentive to participate in constructive negotiations.

Thus, Mr. President, I submit that our approach must be something other than the simple act of retaining the provision in question or the simple act of repealing it. Neither represents a practical and effective policy.

What we need more than anything else, after laboring for better than three years with two mutually destructive policies, is a single, clearly articulated U.S. policy on which Congress and the President can agree and the terms of which strongly declare our unwavering intent to lend our full, active and effective support to the achievement of a just, negotiated settlement on Cyprus. Such a policy, moreover, must make clear that while deleting the embargo provision from our law, we have not deleted a deep concern for Cyprus from our national conscience and that we will examine, through prescribed executive-legislative procedure, our future policies toward each relevant country with a view to whether it has contributed a good faith effort to the process of bringing justice to that island.

What I envision, Mr. President, is embodied in an amendment which is now proposed to the Senate under the sponsorship of the distinguished majority leader (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD), Senator BENTSEN, Senator CHAFEE, myself which, while repealing the embargo, would equalize the fiscal year 1979 military credits available to Greece and Turkey and, more importantly, place into the Foreign Assistance Act a new section entitled "Policy and Procedure Regarding Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey." This provision sets forth, in its first two subsections, certain findings which shculd form U.S. policy and, in its third section, a number of principles which should govern U.S. policy.

In its fourth subsection, the provision continues the President's periodic reports to Congress concerning Cyprus negotiations. And in its fifth subsection, it establishes a procedure governing future Presidential requests to the Congress for aid and military sales to Turkey, Greece, or Cyprus.

The procedure established is simple in concept, but perhaps deceptively so. It requires the President, in connection with any future request relating to any of the three countries, to transmit with that request a fully justified certification that the goal of a just solution on Cyprus has been achieved or that such future aid would contribute to the achievement of that goal. This, I believe, should provide meaningful incentive to each of the concerned parties to move promptly into good faith negotiations. For if the President is unable, for any of the parties involved, to make this certification a year from now, the question of the President requesting any aid at all to that country would be foreclosed.

We are all aware, of course, that certification procedures have, in past administrations, been abused. But I have confidence that President Carter's integrity would preclude an abuse in this instance. Thus, if Turkey does not make a good faith effort in the Cyprus negotiation, I do not expect this administration to make a disingenuous or false certification.

Moreover, if there were to occur a certification with which the Congress disagreed, adequate remedies would be available through the authorization and appropriations process.

Mr. President, no policy in any area is foolproof and the approach embodied in this provision may probably meet the fate of efforts on Cyprus which have gone before. But I trust that this will not be the case. I am prepared to accept Prime Minister Ecevit's clear indications that he will move constructively on Cyprus once the political straitjacket of 620(x) is removed. I do not do so on blind faith, but in recognition that Turkish interests also require genuine progress on Cyprus and in the belief that Mr. Ecevit can understand, and conduct his nation's future policy according to, those interests.

Assuming the enactment of this proposal, I would sincerely hope that 1 year from now we are not involved in a fight over Turkish aid. With some display of statesmanship on both sides in the Cyprus dispute, that will not occur. But if such statesmanhip is not evidenced, I can assure my colleagues that I for one will not hesitate to draw the appropriate conclusions and to join with those who now favor retaining the embargo in seeking appropriate redress through the budgetary authority which Congress will retain even without the continuation of 620(x).

For now, however, I believe that a positive and constructive outlook is in order. It is time to make a new beginning. If this provision is passed, with the administration's tacit acceptance even if not its open support, the United States can finally have a single policy on this matter of grave importance. If energetically implemented by the administration, I think it can be a successful policy. I know that many of my colleagues feel strongly that our policy toward Cyprus, as elsewhere, should have a strong moral base. I agree. And I believe that this proposal rests on such a base. It is a morality directed at results; and, should this measure be enacted, it is toward the achievement of genuine results on Cyprus that the administration should feel obligated to lend the full power of U.S. diplomacy.

Mr. President, today I have received a letter, dated July 24, 1978, which I understand has also been sent to other Members of the Senate, from Mr. Warren Christopher, the Under Secretary of State, in which he makes several observations that I think are pertinent to the debate today. He says:

Last week I wrote to you concerning an important proposal made by the Turkish Cypriots regarding the city of Varosha. Under that proposal, the Turkish Cypriots offered to permit 35,000 Greek Cypriot refugees to return to their homes and businesses in the city of Varosha under United Nations supervision. As you know, we welcomed this Turkish Cypriot proposal.

Earlier today the Government of Cyprus made its proposal with respect to Varosha which we have also welcomed. Although the Greek Cypriot proposal is different in certain respects from that of the Turkish Cypriots, it is apparent that there is now a solid basis for discussions between the parties of the important humanitarian problem relating to Varosha, and thereafter for resuming the Cyprus intercommunal talks under U.N. auspices.

The coming weeks and months will be crucial in resolving the fundamental questions relating to Cyprus which have troubled the people of that island, and the entire world, for so long. In the period ahead, it is important that the United States be in a position to play an impartial and constructive role. The lifting of the Turkish embargo is an essential step in this process. To do so will, we believe, help accelerate the search for peace in Cyprus.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following articles be printed in the RECORD:

An article entitled "Why Should We Lift the Turkish Arms Embargo?" written by Lee Hamilton and published in the Washington Post of June 19, 1978;

An article entitled "Lift the Turkish Arms Embargo," written by Albert Wohlstetter and published in the Wall Street Journal of Wednesday, June 14, 1978;

An editorial entitled "A New Look at Cyprus," published in the Washington Post of March 29, 1978; and

An editorial entitled "The Way Back from Cyprus," published in the New York Times of Friday, March 31, 1978.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY WE SHOULD LIFT THE TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO

It is time to lift the American arms embargo against Turkey. The present situation is clearly unacceptable. Cyprus talks are deadlocked as both parties continue to politick in Washington rather than negotiate with one another. NATO security has deteriorated. The agony of many Cypriots persists and many Greek Cypriots cannot return to their homes. Our bilateral ties with Greece, Turkey and Cyprus are suffering.

Six strong arguments can be advanced for lifting the embargo:

First, the embargo has failed to achieve its intended objective of promoting a settlement on Cyprus. Rather, it has stiffened resistance to accommodations by encouraging both the Greeks and the Turks, for their own reasons, to withhold necessary concessions.

Turkey, a proud and firmly independent nation, rejects the idea of yielding to pressure. The Turks find the embargo a painful humiliation. Many Greeks want to keep the embargo in place, and they believe that progress in negotiations will lead to its removal.

By lifting the embargo and espousing a policy of even-handedness in negotiations, the United States can contribute to the creation of an environment in which constructive Cyprus talks can occur. Overt American pressure on any one party will at best produce a temporary settlement. In this sense the embargo has reduced, rather than strengthened, our leverage.

Second, the embargo has jeopardized NATO security, the long-range defense interests of Greece, and American capabilities in the eastern Mediterranean. These damaging consequences are magnified by the unprecedented buildup of Soviet forces on both the southern flank and the central front.

Turkey, with the second-largest standing army in NATO, is of great importance to both the alliance and the United States. The decline of its forces leaves the whole of southeastern Europe more vulnerable to Soviet penetration. Since the embargo began, our loss of intelligence on missile tests and troop movements in the Soviet Union has been significant. We should not lose sight of the fact that the strategically important Turkish land mass separates the Soviet Union from the Middle East and the Mediterranean.

With the exception of Greece, our NATO allies urge an end to the embargo. At a time when we are asking NATO allies to increase their defense commitments, it is unwise for us to neglect the vulnerable southern flank.

Third, the embargo encourages Turkey to rethink both its basic foreign-policy direction and its ties with NATO and the United States. The consequences of the embargo are not only military. Turkey is the developing country with the longest continuous history of democracy in recent times. The Turkish revolution earlier in this century started a process of westernization that was consummated three decades ago when Turkey joined NATO. This history helps to explain Turkey's anguish over its treatment by the United States. The Turks' drift toward neutralism must not be allowed to continue.

There are many counsels of foreign policy reappraisal in Turkey today and none of them suggests a strengthening of Turkey's ties to the West. By ending the embargo, the United States can help to refocus this debate in Turkey, restore balance and stability to a troubled democracy and rekindle the Turks' faith in the West.

Fourth, the principle of the law has been upheld, and Turkey has been punished for its misuse of American arms in Cyprus. We have demonstrated to all countries that we are serious about enforcing the law, which provides for the termination of military aid in cases where U.S.-supplied equipment has been used for aggressive purposes rather than legitimate self-defense.

Is it not reasonable to think that an embargo that has crippled Turkish military capabilities for nearly four years is sufficient punishment for the misuse of American equipment? Is no allowance at all to be made for the complex circumstances surrounding the initial incident, including Turkey's perception of its treaty obligations to ensure the independence of Cyprus and what it sees as its forbearance in the face of violations of the civil and human rights of the Turkish minority on Cyprus? Is the law not now being applied selectively?

Clearly, the time has come to question whether the rule of law is enhanced by unyielding and selective application. There have been other violations of the law that have gone unpunished. Punishment need not be of extended scope and prolonged duration to be useful. Beyond a certain point, it becomes self-defeating.

Fifth, the suffering of the Cypriot people will more likely be ended by negotiations after the embargo is lifted. We all agree that the plight of Greek Cypriot refugees needs to be resolved and that the longstanding grievances of the Turkish Cypriot minority must be treated.

But problems of human and political rights that stem from decades of communal antagonism can better be addressed in the context of negotiation for an overall Cyprus settlement than in the present deadlocked situation. It is apparent that these human- and political-rights problems are not being addressed today.

Sixth, the Turkish government and the Turkish Cypriots have recently shown a willingness to negotiate a Cyprus settlement. While initial Turkish proposals are neither all the Greek side wants nor all it should expect, they should not be viewed with indifference. Turkey has withdrawn 16,000 troops over the months, and the Turkish Cypriots have displayed a willingness to make significant territorial adjustments in six specific areas, reduce troop levels further and allow tens of thousands of Greek Cypriots to return to new Famagusta as negotiations begin, and reopen the Nicosia airport. Furthermore, a detailed constitutional recommendation is on the table for discussion. These initial proposals are promising and constructive. They offer a basis for renewed talks.

Tentative manifestations of Turkish flexibility and compromise will be dissipated if the embargo is kept in place. New and evolving Turkish positions can be drawn out and developed only through negotiation. Prime Ministers Bulent Ecevit and Constantine Karamanlis are meeting. The Cypriot leaders should do likewise.

Of course, there can be no guarantee that lifting the embargo will either resolve problems in our relations with these NATO allies or help achieve progress toward a Cyprus settlement. But there is certainty that the present unacceptable situation will be perpetuated and a Cyprus settlement further postponed if the embargo remains. The reasonable hope is that lifting the embargo would trigger progress in the area.

After three years of impasse and deepening risk to our national interests, it is time to try to break the impasse by lifting the embargo. We must adopt an approach more likely to produce a settlement on Cyprus. We need a policy that is more attuned to American concerns in the eastern Mediterranean.

Lift the Turkish Arms Embargo

The United States, Turkey and Greece have very strong mutual interests affecting their security-interests that have been harmed by the behavior of all three nations. The self-destruction pattern can be broken by support for President Carter's initiative to lift the arms embargo against Turkey.

All NATO countries—not only the United States, Turkey and Greece—have an interest in restoring health to the southeastern flank of NATO. That is also of great consequence for the credibility of any American guarantee in the Middle East and for countries such as Japan that depend on oil from the Persian Gulf.

What makes the problem urgent is the worsening of our position on the southern flank of NATO and especially in the eastern Mediterranean, the increase in Soviet ability to project power at a distance, Greece's continued absence from the NATO military command, the increased precariousness of our own and allied reliance on oil from the Gulf area, the deterioration of the Turkish armed forces that remain part of the NATO military structure, and the steady decline in our relations with Turkey.

There are of course endless claims and counterclaims about the rights and wrongs of Greek, Turkish or even American and British behavior on Cyprus. I do not think a fair and accurate picture can be drawn in simple black and white. Nor do I think the legal questions as to the use or misuse of U.S. arms aid present a simple issue, with an obvious answer justifying punitive action in the form of a continuing embargo.

THE GAO LETTER

The Greeks as well as Turks are armed predominantly by the United States and both, it is plain, have used these arms to protect what they regard as their legitimate rights and obligations. The usual authority cited on Turkish violations is the General Accounting Office letter to Sen. Eagleton. A careful reading shows that it does not unambiguously claim a Turkish violation. Moreover, I think the GAO would have qualified its judgment on Turkey even further if it had been asked about violations on the other side, which were much less ambiguous.

I am afraid many Americans made moralistic statements about the crisis that strain moral credibility. There is no doubt that the events started with a coup engineered by the military dictatorship then existing in Greece. And there is no doubt in my mind that the Treaty of Guarantee signed by Greece, Turkey and Great Britain was a justifiable basis for Turkish intervention in July. In the subsequent August landing the Turks expanded their very precarious foothold in the face of Greek delays and refusal to agree to a security zone around Turkish forces.

One always hears that 40 percent of the land is occupied by the Turks, who make up only 18 percent of the population. I would point out first of all that the 40 percent seems to be inaccurate; it is more like 36 percent or 37 percent, and the Turks question the 18 percent as well. More important, the Turkish "18 percent" or more of the population, being mainly farmers, always had more than the corresponding 18 percent or so of the land—about 40 percent at the time of the 1960 census, and perhaps 30 percent at the time of the coup. The recent Turkish proposals for voluntary population and land transfers consider the military and economic viability of the transfers, and seem to me as they do to Secretary General Waldheim a substantial advance in the negotiation.

On such complicated disputes between two important allies, the United States had best avoid the pretense that the moral or legal issues are simple black and white ones on which we can sit in judgment. Such pretense does mischief to our reputation for any balanced concern about the rule of law. I would be as deeply opposed to an embargo on arms to Greece as I am to continuance of the embargo against Turkey. We should not be asked to choose; both are of key importance to our own security and to that of our allies.

The security considerations, meanwhile, are essential to the strategic significance of Turkey. While there have been recent claims that new weapons technologies make the Turkish armed forces, facilities and geographical position obsolete, it simply romanticizes technology to suggest that ICBMs or any other sophisticated technology can replace forces that operate from close-in range. Similarly, the Turkish intelligence facilities closed since the embargo were of great value, and substitutes have been only partial, creating deficiencies that become harder and harder to overcome. These facilities provided us with information about the development of Soviet long-range systems, and also, as in the fall of 1973, about movements and concentrations of Soviet forces.

The value of Turkey for the United States and its NATO allies extends far beyond the few installations on which operations have been suspended since the embargo. That value proceeds in the first place from control of the exit from the Black Sea through the Straits of the Bosporus and of the entry to the Aegean through the Dardanelles. Second, from the large number of strategically placed base facilities for combat, communications, navigation and other support functions, including facilities besides those withdrawn from current operation. Third, from the control of the air space above Turkey. And fourth, from the Turkish ground forces themselves, which are the largest in NATO aside from those of the United States, and have a well-deserved reputation for fighting ability.

It is usual to talk of the value of Turkey for our allied security in rather general terms. That makes it easy to dismiss its value with some vague reference to technology or the like. I would like to illustrate Turkey's importance in some concrete detail.

First, on the importance to Turkey to Greece, which proponents of the embargo tend to think of, if at all, only in passing. Turkey's participation in NATO sharply increases Soviet force requirements for Bulgarian or combined Bulgarian-Soviet attacks on Greece. Turkish control of the Dardanelles blocks the Soviet's sea lines.

NATO planes based in Turkey could interdict Soviet sea and air movements to Bulgaria. The only invasion-supply route into Greece which is not within easy artillery range of Turkish forces is a single-track railroad with a parallel road. With Turkey and Greece cooperating in NATO, this attack would be a much riskier adventure and therefore one much less likely to be attempted or persuasively threatened. And most important, Soviet force would be less likely to cast a political shadow.

On the importance of Turkey for the whole of NATO's southern flank, and consequently for the NATO center, Secretary of Defense Brown has been quite clear. If the flanks are neutralized by political or military action, an adversary can concentrate more massively against the center. The defense of the center cannot be separated from the defense of either flank.

In the defense of the Persian Gulf area, however, the potential role of Turkey deserves concrete illustration. If the Soviets can overfly Turkey at will, they can cut in half the time needed to deploy forces by air over Yugoslavia to an objective near the Gulf. (Roughly the same is true for deployments to Lebanon and Israel.) The availability of Turkish airspace drastically affects what the Soviets can do compared with what the United States can do in the Gulf area. Without substantial overflight over Turkey, the Soviets, for example, might be able to bring into the area a force roughly equivalent in firepower to a U.S. mechanized division and do it in about the same time as it would take the U.S., that is, in about two weeks. With overflights unconstrained the Soviets could get there a week earlier.

For conflict in the Persian Gulf area the Turkish Straits also are plainly important. If the Soviets cannot use the Straits to resupply by sea as well as by air their forces fighting in the Gulf, they might have to rely exclusively on a massive initial airlift until they could, for example, resupply by sea from Vladivostok—a much more distant supply route. Other conceivable routes might be even longer, more complicated or more vulnerable.

In short, when one looks at the grubby details of how the contestants might fare in a struggle in such key parts of the world as the Persian Gulf or Greece, it is apparent that with the technologies available to each side the role of Turkey is likely to be of major importance. No airy references to sophisticated weapon systems should erase that importance from our minds.

TURKEY'S SIGNIFICANCE

Finally, a few words on the significance of Turkey for the Middle East. It would be possible to illustrate in some detail the effects of the availability to one side or the other of Turkish air space, the Straits, bases and materiel in Turkey, or the Turkish forces. The potential effect on conflict between the confrontation states and Israel is large. The stability of settlements now being proposed for the Middle East depends not only on the ability of the parties to defend themselves with only logistic support from outside, but also on external guarantees of possible intervention.

But no guarantee is likely to be accepted if it cannot be backed up, that is, if the risks of backing it up are so large that fulfillment of the guarantee is not believable. And even if a very risky guarantee were accepted, the settlement guaranteed would very likely be unstable. There has been a long history of the importance of Turkey for military operations in the area. Turkey was a key to our successful intervention in Lebanon in 1958. Our intervention at that time exploited the strategic position of Turkey and was greatly aided by it.

To restore the role of Turkey in the alliance we should end the embargo. The embargo in any case blocks compromise on Cyprus. The Turks will not bend to a public humiliation by a major ally. And those Greeks who see Turkey only as a rival and a danger and want it weakened will delay compromise to perpetuate the embargo. For the sake of Cyprus, and for the mutual security of our allies, including Greece and Turkey, we should at long last bring the embargo to an end.

A NEW LOOK AT CYPRUS

Isn't it time to set the Cyprus issue to one side in the tangled affairs of the eastern Mediterranean and to get on with restoring firm American ties with Turkey and Greece? Does not this approach promise better results in Cyprus itself than four years of direct diplomatic assault have produced?

We think so. We think that few American policies have been more earnestly motivated, and more thoroughly discredited, than the failed effort to force Turkey to roll back its invasion of Cyprus by imposing an arms embargo. Cyprus has received no benefit whatsoever from it. The American position in that strategic corner has steadily deteriorated. Two American presidents have been undercut.

The congressional "Greek lobby," which has dominated successive administrations on this issue, remains unreconstructed. It holds that the best way to pry the Turkish army off the island and bring a settlement is to keep the pressure in Ankara. Increasingly, however, other legislators, including now a House International Relations Committee majority, suspect that the embargo merely humiliates Turkey and that the Turks—curse them as you will—will not budge on Cyprus while this embargo stays in effect. We agree.

Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher is in Ankara today. If he is not trying to see whether Turkey, in the event that the embargo were lifted, would move promptly on its own toward a fair Cyprus settlement, he has wasted a trip. Great delicacy is required. The Turks can't countenance being seen to be acting under pressure. The Greek government must not be exposed to opposition charges that, for the sake of NATO, Greek interests on Cyprus are being sold out. But perhaps a bargain can be struck.

Cyprus is not, after all, the issue it was. Greek Cypriots, foresaking the Palestinian example of the open wound, have built a successful new life in the south. They want only some territory in the north, a federal system that would leave the Turkish Cypriot minority well protected, and an end to the Turkish occupation and to the specter it raises * * *.

THE WAY BACK FROM CYPRUS

Since 1974, when Turkish troops, using American weapons, occupied two-fifths of the island of Cyprus, relations between Ankara and Washington have been sour. Congress has limited the flow of additional arms until Turkey pulled back its forces; successive Turkish Governments have refused to define their conditions for withdrawal under such pressure. Both the United States and Turkey will end up losers if no way can be found to break out of this bind. Turkey could point the way by revealing its proposals for a Cyprus settlement.

Turkey's invasion was scarcely unprovoked. The 18 percent Turkish minority on Cyprus had never been well treated by the Greek majority. And in July 1974, a coup brought to power a hard-line Greek-Cypriot faction that seemed likely to take even less account of Turkish-Cypriot rights. Although the insurgent regime lasted only a few days, that was long enough to precipitate Ankara's invasion.

Ankara has reacted to the limit on arms sales—$175 million this year—by sharply restricting American use of NATO facilities in Turkey. Under steady pressure from Greek-Americans, Congress has remained firm. But the Ford Administration strongly deplored the Congressional restrictions as harmful to NATO—and thus caused the Greek Government to curtail its military cooperation with NATO. The Carter Administration has tried to straddle the issue. It has continued discussions for a defense agreement that would substantially increase American military aid to Turkey. But it has implied that it would not conclude the agreement until there had been progress on Cyprus. Early this month, Secretary of State Vance was explicit: Washington would not move, he told Congress, until it had examined proposals for Cyprus promised by Turkey's new Prime Minister, Bulent Ecevit.

More intolerable "linkage," responded Mr. Ecevit—and this time from the Administration, not merely from Congress. He countered with reverse linkage: no Cyprus proposals until the heat is off. That message, and subsequent hints that Turkey might withdraw its half-million men from NATO's command and even sign a nonaggression pact with Moscow, caused a high-level American delegation to hurry to Ankara this week to attempt to set things right.

That won't be easy. Strong sentiment continues in Congress that Turkish concessions are necessary before normal military relations can resume. That sentiment is justified. Turkey broke United States law and violated the spirit of its alliance when it used American weapons to expel Greek Cypriots from their homes and farms. Having made its point, Ankara should now pull back. Greek Cypriots—and Greece—realize there can be no return to the old arrangements on Cyprus. They acknowledge that Turkish Cypriots should enjoy nearly complete autonomy, including a territorial zone of their own, but one proportionate to the size of the Turkish-Cypriot population.

There is every reason to believe that both Prime Minister Ecevit and the Turkish military leadership would like to pull back. Because the Turkish occupation force is the central issue in contention, the first moves must come from Ankara. Since the issue continues to be the most explosive one in Turkey's politics, such a move would be painful. But Mr. Ecevit is in a strong parliamentary position; unlike his predecessor, he does not depend upon ultranationalists for his majority.

Turkish dissociation from NATO would be costly to the United States. But it is the Turks who should calculate the benefits of full participation in NATO; it is they who face the risks of weakened ties to the West. Meanwhile, those who would support NATO by lifting the restrictions on arms to Turkey should remember that Cyprus is just an emotion-wrenching an issue in Greece. It would not strengthen the alliance to appease Turkey at the expense of turmoil in Greece.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDERSON). Who yields time?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, in the momentary absence of the ranking Republic member, as next ranking member I yield 6 minutes to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PERCY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following members of my staff be granted the privileges of the floor during the consideration of and votes on the pending bill: Scott Cohen, Alison Rosenberg, Mary Locke, and Fred Tipson.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, as much as any Member of this body, I favor good and constructive relations with the Government of Turkey, our NATO ally and friend. Whether we lift the embargo or not—and I hope that we will not—I want the Government of Turkey to hear that all of us on both sides of this issue deeply care about the future of Turkish-American relations, and that we will work in good faith to restore those relations to a normal state.

There are compelling reasons not to lift the embargo, and I would like to restate them now. But Turkey should know that this is not a decision on relations with Turkey. Whatever the decision of the Senate today, we will want to move ahead to improve Turkish-American relations in the interest of both countries and of NATO.

Mr. President, because of this position, the question of whether the arms embargo on Turkey should be lifted is for many of us a difficult question, because we desire nothing more than good and constructive relations with both Greece and Turkey and a fair settlement for the Cyprus problem.

The question is basically which course of action will facilitate these objectives.

We are told by the administration that our relations with Turkey, and Turkey's relationship with NATO, are at stake. We are told that a refusal to lift the arms embargo will so alienate Turkey that serious damage will be done both to Turkish-American and Turkish-NATO relations.

There is a rationale for the Carter administration to take this stand, because Turkey has indicated that negative consequences may follow a refusal to lift the embargo. Such consequences could include the shutdown of U.S. bases in Turkey, expulsion of U.S. military personnel from Turkey, Turkish withdrawal from the military wing of NATO, and closer Turkish-Soviet relations. These steps clearly would harm NATO and further weaken its southeastern flank.

The administration also maintains that a refusal to lift the embargo would not contribute to a settlement of the Cyprus problem because it would stiffen Turkish intransigence there.

I submit that the Carter administration's position is a result of either of Turkish blackmail or a blackmail self-imposed by the Carter administration. It sends a message to Ankara that the United States is prepared to put aside the effects of lifting the embargo on the democratic government of Prime Minister Caramanlis in Greece. It indicates that the United States is prepared to put aside our own law prohibiting the aggressive and unauthorized use of American-supplied military equipment. It indicates that the United States is prepared to tolerate the continued military occupation of nearly 40 percent of Cyprus with American military equipment.

Despite my own strong feeling that we should have good relations with every member country of NATO, and my desire that Turkish-American relations be improved, I cannot accept this rationale for lifting the embargo.

The administration, in taking its position, puts the burden of improving Turkish-American relations on the United States, not on Turkey where it belongs. It is Turkey, not the United States, which invaded Cyprus. It is Turkey, not the United States, which continues the military occupation of Cyprus after 4 years. It is Turkey, not the United States, which violated the U.S. arms transfer law. It is Turkey, not the United States, which contemplates weakening the NATO alliance.

To accept Turkish terms by lifting the embargo would be interpreted as American weakness in the face of Turkish threats. It would solve an immediate problem in Turkish-American relations, but it would not engender the mutual respect which must be at the foundation of Turkish-American relations in the future. It would signal the Turkish Government that we will give them what they want regardless of their actions on Cyprus.

The New York Times has said that "It would not strengthen the alliance to appease Turkey at the expense of turmoil in Greece. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch has characterized the effort to lift the embargo as "misguided." The Financial Times of London, referring to the weak Turkish proposals for a Cyprus settlement, said "The responsibility for rebuilding trust has to be with the stronger party—in this case the Turkish side. And it is up to them to show that they can do better and offer more than they have so far."

The arms embargo is often blamed by the Carter administration for the friction in Turkish-American relations. After all it was imposed by the American Congress. But it was imposed because Turkey had violated American law. As a practical matter, however, the United States has not deprived Turkey of American military equipment.

During the period prior to the embargo, 1969–74, the United States transferred to Turkey an average of $125 million in arms annually. Then, despite the embargo, in 1975 through 1977, U.S. arms transfers to Turkey averaged $120 million annually, almost the same as before. For 1978 and 1979, the foreign military sales ceiling for Turkey is $175 million annually. Turkey is the third largest recipient in the world of such U.S. military credits.

In addition, Turkey will receive $50 million in security supporting assistance, which frees up other Turkish funds to purchase additional military equipment from European sources. Everyone should realize that these amounts "ain't just peanuts." A question that should be asked of the administration is how much more military equipment would be envisioned for Turkey if the embargo were lifted, how that would affect U.S. relations with Greece and how that would loosen Turkey's iron grip on northern Cyprus.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. PERCY. I ask for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. I yield the Senator 2 additional minutes.

Mr. PERCY. At a time when Turkey maintains its occupation of Cyprus with more than 22,000 troops armed with American weapons, at a time when Turkish proposals for a Cyprus settlement are inadequate and unjust, at a time when Turkey threatens the expulsion of American forces, I must and will oppose the lifting of the arms embargo.

Mr. President, I would very much like to address a question to our distinguished colleague the senior Senator from New York, because, though we do support in all our votes the Mideast arms sales, the Senator from Illinois has relied very strongly on the proposition that a law is a law, and is binding, and we will hold those who enter into agreements based upon that law to that agreement.

In the case of the arms sales to the Mideast, the Senator from Illinois took the position that an alternative was available to Saudi Arabia:

They could purchase sophisticated Mirage aircraft, either of the present series or the future 2000 or 4000 series. They could purchase them in unlimited quantities. They would have no restraints whatsoever from France or French law in transshipping those weapons systems to any other country in times of combat, whereas the American law was firm. Saudi Arabia had firmly avowed they would adhere to that law.

I ask my distinguished colleague if the representations made at that time are in a sense null and void if in this case American law was violated and an agreement violated, and we say, "Well, the terms laid down by the Secretary of State, the danger pointed to by the Secretary of Defense, that no movement has been made in Cyprus, and still there has been no significant movement." Would it not establish a dangerous precedent for the future which might say to the Saudis and others that the U.S. law means nothing and an agreement with the United States means nothing? We have these weapons and in the case of need we can transship them to combat areas. May we not be endangering the Mideast situation which I believe to be crucial and highly critical?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes to reply to the question.

Obviously, the question is one of consistence. We can change our minds; we can do something else. But, obviously, if we are inconsistent we can hardly expect other powers to be consistent. While I did not join in the Senator's position on the jet aircraft to Saudi Arabia, the majority did. Therefore, anything which would be conducive to cementing the proposition that the Saudis, having made a promise, we expect them to keep it and we act that way, consistently, is conducive to the policy of our country in having made that deal.

That would be my reply.

While I am on my feet, might I also say that it has been charged that Greece used U.S. arms in this coup which was attempted on Cyprus in 1974, which allegedly brought on the first Turkish incursion to protect Turkish enclaves in Cyprus. The difficulty with that argument is that if they had stopped at the first incursion, it is a good argument, but subsequently they seized a very great part of the island and the accountability for that certainly has never been made to my satisfaction. I will address myself to this subject separately.

I thank my colleague for the statement he has given.

Mr. BIDEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. How much time does the Senator wish?

Mr. BIDEN. Ten minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. I yield 6 minutes to start with.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, the U.S. Congress has been asked to lift the arms embargo against Turkey. The administration has claimed that the embargo has not been an effective instrument for bringing about a Cyprus settlement. The line of administration reasoning is, briefly: Since the embargo has not worked, U.S. policy should take a 180 degree about face.

But how are we to measure how well this embargo worked when it was only in effect for a period of 6 months? Under this so-called embargo, Turkey has been the recipient of such increasing amounts of foreign military sales credits that, in point of fact, she has been able to purchase about as much as she could have ever afforded had the United States never imposed an embargo.

What the administration is really asking the Congress is to lift not a real embargo but a symbolic one. Turkey can currently import $175 million in FMS from the United States, which is $50 million more than the average amount it purchased between 1969 and 1977. What Turkey finds humiliating is the embargo as a symbol of a deteriorating United States-Turkey relationship. So much so in fact that Turkey has informed the administration that lifting the embargo is now a precondition of a serious presentation on her part of a Cyprus settlement.

To look at it from the other side of the periscope; Should the United States lift the arms embargo, Turkey then will have achieved all her basic objectives while a Cyprus settlement continues at stalemate.

Let us go back to the very beginning—to the Turkish invasion of Cyprus in the summer of 1974. The intervention of 40,000 Turkish troops in the internal affairs of Cyprus using American arms was a violation of American law which states explicitly that the American arms are to be used strictly for defensive purposes. The embargo imposed on Turkey by Congress for this violation was in effect only a few months when the Ford administration asked that it be at least partially lifted.

The year is 1975—less than 12 months after the Turkish invasion of Cyprus. The administration has convinced a majority of the Congress to partially lift the embargo permitting the sale of $125 million worth of arms. This ceiling figure was repeated in 1976. In 1977, the administration raised the ceiling figure to $175 million. So, despite the so-called embargo, Turkey has been voted $425 milion in arms during the last 3 fiscal years.

Nevertheless, in retaliation for this embargo, Turkey restricted the use of American bases. While these base facilities were not crucial to U.S. security interests, they are a convenient source of intelligence gathering. Unless the United States lifts the arms embargo this year, Turkey threatens to close all these monitoring bases permanently. What precisely is Turkey doing? In retaliation for a total embargo that does not exist, is Turkey in effect blackmailing the United States?

When the new administration took office last year, a new policy was articulated. Already during the campaign for the Presidency, Jimmy Carter recognized that the conflict between Greece and Turkey over Cyprus posed a serious threat to the security interests of NATO. He established an appropriate linkage, coupling the supply of arms to Turkey to concrete progress on the Cyprus problem. It was a new and important policy formulation.

Consistent with this policy, the administration announced earlier this year that Turkey was on the verge of announcing a reasonable negotiating proposal for Cyprus. The administration informally notified the Congress of its intent to lift the embargo from the books just as soon as this plan was made public. To my mind, there was nobody in this Congress who wasn't willing to lift the arms embargo against Turkey upon the emergence of a sincere and realistic plan for troop withdrawal and a peace settlement for Cyprus.

But no Turkish realistic negotiating plan for Cyprus emerged.

Several months later, there was talk again of Turkey presenting a realistic negotiating proposal to the United Nations.

But no such realistic proposal emerged.

But despite the principle established by this administration— implicitly linking the lifting of the embargo to Turkish peace proposals—and despite the fact that apparently twice this year Turkey indicated that proposals would be forthcoming, these so-called reasonable Turkish proposals never emerged, and yet the administration is asking the Congress to lift the arms embargo.

Moreover, the administration is indicating—indicating mind you, not promising—that once the embargo is lifted, then Turkey will produce a realistic peace plan for Cyprus.

Why has the administration reversed itself? Why has the administration reversed its policy principle for Turkey? How can the administration responsibly suggest that placing the cart before the horse will produce more progress?

The explanation given by the administration is that Turkish pride is so deeply affected by the embargo, the principle of the embargo that her government cannot take any political action until the embargo is repealed.

What is the administration telling us? Are they saying that they cannot budge Turkey 1 inch? Or that Turkey is, practically speaking, innately incapable of making a genuine political concession to American security interests—that the only inducement to which Turkey can respond is the erasure of section 620(x) from the Arms Export Control Act?

Let us look at the balance sheet.

In the fall of 1975, the United States partially lifted the embargo to Turkey and then in 1977 raised the ceiling to its present level.

The United States has chosen to overlook the fact that Turkey purchased an additional $30 million of American military equipment in Western Europe last year.

The administration has submitted to the Congress, in addition to the FMS ceiling request, a proposal to authorize $50 million in security supporting assistance.

And how has Turkey responded to the easing of the embargo? She has restricted the use of American intelligence gathering facilities.

She has threatened to withdraw from NATO. And she has threatened to ask the Soviet Union for military and economic assistance.

And should the Congress at this point vote to lift the arms embargo, then I submit that Turkey will have achieved all her objectives, with no assurance to the United States that a peace settlement on Cyprus will ever emerge.

In addition, there is one underlying theme in Turkey's threat to leave NATO as well as in the administration presentation of Turkey's need for additional economic assistance. And that is the precarious state of Turkey's economy. There might be one explanation that this administration as well as the Government of Turkey prefers not to analyze. And that is the possibility that Turkish support of her occupation army on Cyprus is a financial drain on her resources; and that she is only able to afford with American help.

So while the administration presses for a peace settlement on Cyprus which will encompass the withdrawal of the remaining 23,000 Turkish troops on the island, the administration at the same time is asking the Congress for $175 million in military credits plus an additional $50 million in security assistance for Turkey. Is this so Turkey can better afford to maintain this occupying army on Cyprus?

Let me now briefly summarize my reasons for maintaining the principle of the arms embargo.

I believe first and foremost that American security interests are enhanced by the peaceful solution to problems between Greece and Turkey. That American security interests are threatened by Turkey's intransigence, her occupation forces in Cyprus, and her political inability to negotiate a peace settlement. And until sincere and concrete proposals are forthcoming, the arms embargo—primarily a symbolic one—ought to be kept in place.

Second, I deplore the consistent excuses successive administrations have made for Turkey's unwillingness to negotiate. I deplore the lack of firmness in America's position that permits her security interests and her credibility to be threatened by another country's intransigence.

Finally, I ask my colleagues to question the probability of Turkey producing a genuine peace proposal once she has achieved all her objectives. In the 4 years since Turkey violated American law, the United States has easily gone more than half way in encouraging Turkey to redress the situation. To no avail. And there is no indication that a measure of political maturity on Turkey's part will emerge should the last of the constraints be removed.

Mr. President, many of my colleagues who are in opposition to lifting the embargo today are going to make, and make more eloquently than I, the moral argument and the legal argument that the embargo should not be lifted. I would like to speak, in the brief amount of time I have remaining, more specifically to the naked self-interest of the United States of America and discount for the moment the moral and legal implications of lifting the embargo.

Assume for the moment that those in support of lifting the embargo are correct when they say that the legal and moral implications of lifting the embargo are not of any real consequence. This is because the United States has already made its point and nothing more really can be served by continuing the embargo.

The spokesmen for lifting the embargo raise some of the following points: That this has become a test of our relationship with the Turkish Government; that it has great psychological impact; that failure to lift it will seriously damage our relationship with Turkey, especially with regard to the southeastern flank of NATO, and thereby jeopardize U.S. interests.

Administration spokesmen are pursuaded that once the embargo has been lifted, somehow our relationship with Turkey is going to turn around; that once the Turks look again favorably upon their participation in NATO, the southeastern flank is going to be strengthened, and NATO is well on its way to becoming strong again.

But the bottom line of U.S. security is that for the southeastern flank of NATO to be strong again, or stronger, there has to be a better relationship between Greece and Turkey.

I do not know of any one of my distinguished colleagues who has suggested that there is any real likelihood within the next several months or even years of a dramatic change in Cyprus. I would hope that would come about. I would hope that would happen. But I do not know of anyone in this Chamber who is holding out any realistic prospect that the Greek and Turkish Cypriots are going to somehow rectify the situation and live on Cyprus harmoniously in the very near future.

Further, even if the Cyprus situation were to improve as a consequence of this embargo being lifted, I do not see how relationships between Greece and Turkey are going to become measurably better.

A more basic issue than Cyprus, it seems to me, one which would impact significantly upon our security interests in the southeastern flank of the Mediterranean, is the Aegean Sea.

I do not see things improving between Greece and Turkey with regard to their disputes over mineral and air rights. I do not see how, by lifting this embargo, we are going to convince Turkey to become less provocative in its position or to ameliorate any of its demands with regard to the Aegean. And I see the lifting of the embargo as only exacerbating our relations with Greece. I see those in opposition to the pro-American policy of Mr. Karamanlis point with satisfaction to the no-win position of the Karamanlis government. Lifting the embargo sends the message to the present Greek Government that to aline itself with the United States of America and to strengthen relations with us is of really no consequence. They end up getting dealt out rather than getting dealt in.

The point I am trying to make is simply this: If we are to believe that by lifting this embargo our self-interests, the U.S. self-interest, is going to be served, it seems to me it is incumbent upon those arguing in its favor to show us how our total position is going to be better after having lifted this embargo than it is now; not merely to show us that things are not getting better with the embargo remaining.

Do any of my distinguished colleagues here today suggest that by lifting the embargo things are going to so rectify themselves in our relationship with Turkey and, conversely, that no severe damage will occur with our relationship with Greece?

In short, where do we come out? Where does the United States of America come out as a consequence of lifting this embargo?

It seems to me that our self-interest is damaged and in no way enhanced as a consequence of lifting the embargo. It seems to me that lifting the embargo——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BIDEN. Will the Senator yield 1 additional minute?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

Mr. BIDEN. Will not in any way enhance the prospects for a peaceful settlement in Cyprus, will not go down the road to bettering Greek-Turkish relationships. And in the long run, unless the relationship between Greece and Turkey is improved, U.S. interests will not be served. In addition, it seems to me we should not only not yield to Turkish threats of moving into a closer relationship with the Soviet Union, but we should call that card if that is the case.

In summary, to lift the embargo now does not serve the U.S. self-interest, notwithstanding the legal and moralistic arguments that have been offered here on the floor.

My time is obviously up. I yield the floor back to the manager of the bill.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator from Alabama yield 3 minutes to me?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, when the embargo was first discussed on this floor, I supported it, although I have to admit that I supported it a little bit against my better judgment. However, now, Mr. President, I have to oppose the embargo against the Turkish Government, mainly because it has not worked; but more than that—and the Senator just asked the question—I think we have to ask ourselves in whose interest will this decision be: The interest of Turkey, the interest of Greece, or, more importantly, the interest of the United States?

Mr. President, we formed NATO many years ago for a mutual deterrent against the Soviet Union and it has worked very well. But the Turkish army and the Turkish air force are getting to be in a very bad state of disrepair. In fact, I might say the air force is almost nonexistent, because of the need for new equipment and the need for spares to rebuild the old equipment.

Mr. President, in order to keep the southern flank of NATO intact and keep it strong, I am going to vote against further embargo on Turkey.

The Turkish army today of 27 divisions is the largest ground force we have in NATO. When you study that southern flank and are there, as I have been on two occasions, to travel to the highlands and see what we are doing in the way of collecting electronic intelligence against the Soviets, that fact alone would cause me now to vote against embargo. Without the Turkish outpost, we would be very, very deficient in the intelligence we gather about our probable enemy, the Soviets.

We can gather it in other ways, and we do, but it is not as complete as what we gather off the heights of Turkey.

So, Mr. President, the question, I think, boils down to what is best for the United States and what is best for the world. In my humble opinion, a strong Turkey and a strong Greece are very necessary to both of those items. I see no way that continuance of the embargo is going to bring the Greeks and the Turks any closer together. I think that our constant pressure on both sides to bring about an agreement will do more than relying on this side or that side to solve a very ancient and very critical attitude on both sides that is not being solved today.

I merely wanted to rise for a few moments to express the reason that I am changing my vote from the last time, from one of support of embargo to one opposed to embargo.

I thank my friend from Alabama for yielding.

Mr. CHAFEE and Mr. BARTLETT addressed the Chair.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I wonder if I may have 2 minutes to respond to a point the Senator from Delaware made.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I had promised the Senator from Oklahoma that I would yield 5 minutes to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, my overriding concern in this debate is the protection of American security interests in the eastern Mediterranean. At stake here is the viability of the southern flank of NATO, the maintenance of a proper check on Soviet mobility, given their designs in the eastern Mediterranean and northern Africa, and the maintenance and restoration of American military and intelligence gathering facilities in Turkey, which have proven themselves vital.

Turkey currently maintains the largest standing army in NATO. Their presence ties down approximately 26 Warsaw Pact divisions, which would otherwise be diverted to other fronts of potential conflict. Turkey also provides important facilities for United States and NATO uses in the forward basing of tactical fighter aircraft, peacetime training and logistical support of the Sixth Fleet.

Turkey remains fully integrated within NATO at present. Yet economic problems and the arms embargo have forced her to reevaluate her position as active military participants in NATO, with forecasts of impending reductions and withdrawal if assistance is not forthcoming.

Turkey, as well as Greece, has immense strategic value, given their placement on the Mediterranean, Aegean and Black Seas. However, it must be noted here, that their strategic placement is of a complementary nature. Without both participating in NATO, either is left vulnerable to attack by Warsaw Pact forces. Without Greece, Turkey is isolated from her nearest ally by 700 miles. Vital communications could be cut and the Turkish straits could be assailed unimpeded. This further points to the need for resolution of the antagonism caused by the Cyprus question.

As one looks to a map of the eastern Mediterranean, the significance of Turkey's position as governor of sea and air routes and buffer between the Soviets and the Middle East becomes immediately apparent. Turkey's presence denies territorial continuity to Russian access to the Mideast and Africa. Denial of Turkish air space to the Soviets causes a threefold increase in flying time to areas of the Middle East. Denial of the Bosporus Straits and the Dardanelles to Soviet shipping forces a delay of 3 to 5 weeks in supply or resupply efforts to the Middle East.

There has been a general warming of relations between Turkey and the Soviet Union in recent months, due in part to waning U.S. military and economic support.

Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit visited Moscow slightly over a month ago, at which time he and Mr. Kosygin signed a "Political Document on the Principles of Good Neighborly and Friendly Cooperation." This friendship agreement could well be seen as the preamble to any future nonaggression pact, which would be disastrous to the West. Turkey must not be allowed to slip any further toward neutrality. She should be welcomed back into the Western fold as a partner and an equal.

There remains a final component of national security, the loss of which could well have dire consequences in the decade to come. I am speaking of the intelligence-gathering facilities in Turkey, which are of singular importance in the U.S. intelligence-gathering network.

Loss of information on troop movements and developments in missile technology and other military systems have reduced our confidence in our knowledge of these subjects and retarded our ability to develop countermeasures. In addition, the loss of advanced radar stations reduces the warning time of a Soviet attack against our 6th Fleet from 60 to 15 minutes. Obviously, that time differential could spell the difference between preparedness and annihilation.

In the area of strategic nuclear development, the loss of our information-gathering stations becomes even more critical. The loss of our atomic energy detection stations (AEDS) and other intelligence installations has seriously impaired our ability to verify any present or future SALT agreements or a comprehensive test ban treaty. Our inability to verify future Soviet treaty agreements will put the United States at a serious disadvantage at the negotiating table and prevent our monitoring the tests of Soviet weapons systems. These detection stations are vital and we need them back.

Given the considerable support the Turkish Government has given the United States and NATO toward providing for our security needs in the past, and our dependency upon their providing support in the future, I deem it only fair that we be willing to help provide for their defense requirement in the present. Their military equipment is obsolete and badly deteriorated. It is imperative that we act to remove the arms embargo against Turkey and pledge our future assistance.

There is considerable precedent to suggest that if we do not move in this instance, they will turn toward the Soviets and neutral alinement. This would in itself constitute a serious blow to the security of our friends in the Middle East and to nations of the West.

Mr. President, I strongly urge the immediate removal of the arms supply sanctions against Turkey.

I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Rhode Island. I believe it is 2 minutes he wanted.

Mr. CHAFEE. Yes.

I just want to reply quickly, if I might, to the remarks made by the Senator from Delaware in which he said, "What do we get out of this if we remove the embargo?"

Let me say quickly, Mr. President, dealing solely with the matter of intelligence, I quote from Vice Admiral Inman, head of the NSA. This is what Admiral Inman said about our intelligence activities in Turkey:

> In summary, intelligence derived from U.S. bases in Turkey was extensive, important, and often unique. Its greatest value was information on Soviet weapons development and on Soviet force readiness and movement. Unless the U.S. capability is restored, we will continue to lose this valuable information, and U.S. ability to counter Soviet weapons systems under test and development will continue to be hampered, thereby reducing our level of confidence and knowledge of these systems.

In other words, clearly Turkey contributes something to our intelligence gathering.

Now, if the embargo is lifted, what do we get out of it? Secretary Vance before the Armed Services Committee said:

> We have a clear understanding that the lifting of the embargo will lead to the reopening of the installations, and negotiations could commence immediately.

He is referring to the U.S. intelligence installations:

> Indicated we could discuss opening even before the negotiations were completed, and our presence could be put back on those bases again.

So clearly, Mr. President, we do get something out of it—the United States does—if this embargo is lifted; something tangible and something immediate.

I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CASE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE. I yield 6 minutes to the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, first I ask unanimous consent that Karen Campbell and Claudia Louis, of Senator STEVENS' staff, be granted the privilege of the floor, and the same for Bill Reinsch, of Senator HEINZ' staff, during consideration, debate, and voting on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator yield for the same request?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I ask unanimous consent that Christopher Lehman of my staff be granted privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the Senator yield for unanimous-consent request?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask unanimous consent that Tom Gibson of my staff be granted privilege of the floor during the debate on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, without a doubt, as other speakers have said on both sides of this question, this is about the toughest question we are dealing with this year. We have to make a judgment based on what someone suggested very properly is the self-interest of our country.

It is unfortunate that we find ourselves in a position of having to impose, or at least to suggest an imposition of, our will in an effort to settle some very serious and longstanding disputes.

Mr. President, under this foreign assistance authorization bill, we are faced with one of the toughest foreign policy issues to confront Congress this year. That is, what do we do about the standoff between Greece and Turkey, both NATO allies, and what do we do about the arms embargo of Turkey, which is under consideration now? The mutual interests of the United States, Turkey, and Greece, the future of the unfortunate people of Cyprus, and the security of all the member nations of NATO are involved. Much will depend on the outcome of our deliberations here in Congress. And of particular significance, the credibility of American foreign policy will be seriously tested by the outcome of this decision.

NEED FOR A THAW

The present state of Greco-Turkish relations and the state of affairs on Cyprus are unacceptable from the standpoint of European security, internationally accepted norms of human rights, and our own relations with these three countries. The disagreement and hostility of Greece and Turkey over Cyprus has seriously damaged the southern flank of NATO through the military withdrawal of Greece and the weakening effect of the arms embargo on Turkey. Continuation of this situation will lead only to further damage, to the disadvantage of all concerned. Some middle ground must be found on which the dilemma of Cyprus can be solved, and the question of NATO unity can be approached. Those parties involved must be impressed with the necessity of a quick solution to this damaging stalemate.

BACKGROUND FOR EMBARGO

Many now question the logic of further maintenance of the arms embargo, reasoning that it no longer serves American interests and does serious damage to our relations with Turkey and to the military position of Turkey. The negative effects of the embargo are not to be disputed. But in considering this issue, one must keep in mind the background behind the embargo—that is, the Turkish invasion of Cyprus in 1974, admittedly in response to the aggresive behavior of the pro-Enosis coup d'etat, in which Turkey broke U.S. laws, and bilateral agreements with the United States under those laws, violated the U.N. Charter and the NATO Charter, and violated international law. Cyprus was the main factor behind the embargo, a factor which remains unsolved.

CYPRIOT INSTABILITY THE FOCUS

Given this situation, the proper focus should be on Cyprus and a solution to the problem of demilitarization of the island, of its territorial settlement, and of forming a new government. The present reality in Cyprus is that about 40 percent of the island is under Turkish military control. Thousands of Greek Cypriots have fled from this sector where the Turks have been exercising local authority. The instability of the island has not improved by any means. The sources of this instability still exist: The threat of pro-Enosis Greek Cypriot guerrilla action and the reprisals which would follow, and the economic disruption that has continued as a result of the occupation. Efforts to alleviate these conditions have not achieved much progress from either the Greek or the Turkish side. The present state of negotiations between these countries in the United Nations is now frozen and no thaw appears in sight. The resolution of the situation on Cyprus emerges as the key stumbling block to improving the state of Greco-Turkish relations and our relations with these two countries.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that in this debate that we have had, and further debates, I would say, because it is a matter of record, that I was persuaded by President Ford that we should lift the embargo. That was in 1975 when that passed the Senate by a vote, as I recall, of 47 to 46—one vote.

It was defeated in the House, as I recall, by a vote of 203 to 220-some.

So it was a long festering problem for the Congress and, certainly, for the countries, Turkey and Greece and Cyprus.

ARMS SALES NOT AN APPROPRIATE APPROACH

The embargo has not come near to achieving its initial goal: That of forcing the withdrawal of Turkish troops from Cyprus. In considering why this is so, it is interesting to note that Turkey has actually been receiving military supplies from the United States in the form of annual sales, allowed through a Presidential suspension of the embargo. These sales have totaled some $609.9 million in credits since 1975. This appears to be a substantial amount of aid, when one considers that we are supposed to be prohibiting military assistance to Turkey, according to law passed by this Congress. Nevertheless, some have criticized the embargo as an ineffective approach to solving the situation, and support its repeal. However, given the continued separation and hostility of the two Cypriot communities, and the still unstable nature of Cyprus, it strikes me as unwise to try and seek a solution to a hostile military situation by increasing the military preparedness of the aggressor.

While renewing the sale of arms to Turkey does not necessarily mean that they will use those arms to increase their forces in Cyprus, or will further their own military position on the island—indeed, President Ecevit of Turkey has pledged himself to a peaceful settlement—it would increase their overall military capabilities above NATO requirements, giving them the ability to escalate the situation should it explode again. The possibility of this cannot be excluded without some kind of change in the present status of the Turkish occupation and of the disposition of the displaced citizens and properties of Cyprus. Military assistance is not an appropriate way of trying to alleviate an unstable situation. The prospects of cutting the Cyprus knot by repealing the embargo are not promising.

When Mr. Carter was a candidate for President, he expressed the opinion that the restriction on arms sales to Turkey should stand until that government withdrew its occupation forces from Cyprus. Unfortunately, his opinion changed after he had taken office. It is for that reason, primarily, that we are here today debating this critical issue.

I agreed with that statement made by then-candidate Carter when he was seeking the Presidency. I would say to my colleagues, if we can vote down the pending amendment, that I plan to offer an amendment that would say, in effect, that when the invasion of troops is withdrawn, the embargo be lifted.

That seems to this Senator to be in accord with what was the statement made by candidate Carter, now President Carter, and it is for this reason we are here today debating this issue.

TURKEY IS NOT OUR ONLY SECURITY INTEREST

In debating the repeal of the arms embargo, many have emphasized that our national security interests in Turkey are being jeopardized by withholding military assistance. But Turkey does not represent our only interest in the eastern Mediterranean, either strategically or economically. Greece represents an important part of the Western Alliance system, a front on the Balkan Peninsula, and one of the major positions in the eastern Mediterranean. If concern is expressed over what may happen to Turkey or the internal government of Turkey if the embargo is not repealed, we must also consider what the effects of its repeal would be on Greece. I see very little focus on that particular matter. We cannot forget that more than one type of national security interest is involved here.

The Greeks obviously have a strong interest in the fate of the Greek community on Cyprus, an interest that goes back far into history. These interests are not to be taken lightly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, may I have 2 additional minutes?

Mr. CASE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

NEGOTIATIONS OVER CYPRUS CRUCIAL

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, with these considerations in mind, a solution to the deadlock on Cyprus again emerges as a key factor. Negotiations between the two communities have remained stalemated over the presence of the Turkish occupation force. We hear a lot about the recalcitrance of the Greek Cypriot negotiators, but when one considers that it is their territory that is occupied by a hostile alien force, this is not all that difficult to understand. While the occupying force remains, Turkey holds them at a distinct disadvantage. This insecurity stands as the main obstacle to progress in the negotiations. It is on this that we must focus when considering the issue at hand.

NEED FOR U.S. INITIATIVE

Mr. President, I oppose this amendment, which would lift the embargo of arms and military assistance to Turkey, as I feel that it is inappropriate for achieving progress toward a peaceful settlement of the situation on Cyprus. We must not lose sight of the importance of Cyprus as the initial reason behind the embargo, nor can we forget the continuing instability on the island. I feel it is of utmost importance to emphasize the need for a positive, dynamic approach toward progress in negotiations.

Later today, I will propose an amendment which would call upon the President to take an active role in using the power and prestige of his position in office to initiate a more serious approach toward solving the dilemma of Cyprus. This would give an indication of our sincere desire for peace in the area, and of our concern for the defense of Turkey. The sooner the Cyprus dilemma is solved, the sooner we can return to normal relations with Turkey, as well as with Greece. So, as a first step, I believe we should take some initiative in pushing for a quick settlement. The President has taken an active, personal role in efforts to achieve a settlement in the Middle East and South Africa. Why have such initiatives not been taken toward Cyprus? Both of these countries are our allies and NATO partners. Bringing them together at the executive level could very well be the most expedient way of resolving their differences. Through such positive action, all parties involved could actively push toward the inevitable precondition for reaching a settlement—demilitarization.

Once demilitarization of Cyprus is achieved, then the intercommunal talks between the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities over the territorial and political settlement will proceed much more smoothly. This must be the goal of all parties: To achieve demilitarization of Cyprus as soon as possible. Then perhaps the tension and hostility, within this group that is supposed to be closely allied, can be ended, and a basis created for the ultimate, just settlement of Cypriot problems.

It is in everyone's interest—that of NATO and the West, that of Turkey and above all the people of partitioned and occupied Cyprus—that a settlement is reached, and reached soon. Cyprus has been divided now for 4 years, and for every month that passes the realities that exist there become more real, and more intolerable. The urgent need for a settlement soon cannot be underestimated. The longer the deadlock continues, the more difficult a solution will become, and the more disruptive its consequences. The long-term effects of the occupation and displacement of the citizens of Cyprus have already created problems that will take many years to heal, problems of both an economic and social nature. We must keep this in mind, and take positive action to encourage an end to military occupation of Cyprus, rather than to refuel the volatile situation.

PRESIDENTIAL INITIATIVE

The great need for demilitarization of Cyprus, involving withdrawal of both Greek and Turkish forces, must be stressed. This move should be accompanied by a more positive, affirmative role of the United States in pressing for an initial settlement of the basic problems involved: Those of the future political and territorial arrangements. I will propose that the President actively press for a summit meeting of the leaders of all of those countries immediately interested in a settlement. This includes ourselves and Great Britain, France, West Germany, and Canada as members of NATO, as well as Greece, Turkey, and Cyprus. Demilitarization can be encouraged and arranged through such a summit.

The President should also encourage the strengthening of the U.N. security force on the island, to assist the demilitarization and provide the protection necessary throughout this process. A stronger international police force could most effectively provide the security and stability necessary for serious, effective negotiations on the basic problems confronting us. The President must take the initiative in such a move. Beyond the fact that primary interests of ours and of everyone else concerned are at stake, we have a responsibility to do everything we can to achieve a just settlement to this problem and to put an end to the violence and disruption which those of both sides have suffered.

We do not seek to dilute the role of the United Nations in bringing peace to Cyprus—we seek to strengthen it. That role would be made much more difficult, in my opinion, if we were to resume arms sales and shipments to Turkey before her tens of thousands of forces are removed from the island. By upholding the rule of law, we encourage its application and effectiveness in the future.

I emphasize that it seems to me that if we want to approach this from a realistic standpoint, we will defeat the pending amendment. Then I will offer an amendment which will say, in effect, that we will lift the embargo when the armed occupation forces of Turkey have been removed from Cyprus.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the New York Times editorial of Saturday, July 22, 1978, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, July 22, 1978]

CYPRUS AND THE SENATE

The Senate is about to vote on whether to continue the limitations on arms sales to Turkey. They were imposed after Ankara used American-supplied weapons to occupy two-fifths of Cyprus in 1974, in violation of a Congressional prohibition. We have argued in the past that the limits should be kept until Turkey indicates it will withdraw its forces. We still think so.

Few controversies are as vexing as the feud between the half million Greek Cypriots and the 120,000 Turkish Cypriots over how they will coexist on their island. Their centuries-old quarrel has reached into American politics. The Turks and Turkish Cypriots and their American sympathizers contend that national pride forbids concessions on Cyprus so long as the "embargo" stands. Direfully, they predict that maintaining last year's $175-million limit on arms sales will drive Turkey out of NATO, perhaps even into Moscow's arms. But it would be no gain for the West to purchase Turkish good will at the price of Greek resentment.

When Jimmy Carter was a candidate for President he held that the restriction on arms sales should stand until Ankara withdrew the force that enables Turkish Cypriots, with 20 percent of the island's population, to occupy roughly 40 percent of its territory. This spring, however, he urged that the embargo be lifted. Administration spokesmen maintain that once it is lifted, Ankara will make generous diplomatic proposals. But the Government of Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit has so far given no sign that it is prepared to risk the domestic consequences of offering the concessions needed to reach an accommodation. The vague proposal put forward by the Turkish Cypriots on Thursday for resettling some Greek refugees is welcome but scarcely sufficient. The Turkish concessions need to be territorial.

Where Greek Cypriots go wrong is in insisting that their preponderance in numbers also entitles them to the kind of predominance they enjoyed under the island's 1960 constitution. If the Turkish Cypriots would yield significantly on territory, they could more credibly insist on a constitution that provides for virtually autonomous states for the two communities, linking them only for a minimum of such "federal" functions as conducting foreign affairs and issuing currency.

Greek Cypriots denounce this idea as a mere division of the island. Even if this were true, there would be no alternative; nothing except good will can force the two communities to work together. Because ending Turkey's occupation remains an essential first step toward creating an atmosphere of trust, Congress should not yet relax the restrictions on arms sales. It should make clear to the Greek Cypriots, however, that the United States intends to help them reclaim their farms and villages but not to restore their domination of the Turkish population.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I am convinced the Turkish embargo that was mandated by the Congress was as much a product of domestic political considerations as it was of any foreign policy concepts. I opposed this embargo in 1974 because I did not believe that was the way to handle the matter. In retrospect, it was emotion, rather than logic, that brought us to the predicament we face today.

The embargo has not served our best national interest because it has weakened considerably the strong military and political ties we had with Turkey prior to that embargo. Even though, in the interim, a portion of the embargo has been repealed, that is not adequate and it is important that conditions return as they were preembargo. We must recognize the significant contribution Turkey plays in the southern flank of NATO.

Gen. Alexander Haig, in his appearance before the Armed Services Committee, said the present situation places our ability to defend the southern region of NATO in direst jeopardy. He made it clear that any NATO defensive success or failure is inexorably linked with our own vital national security interests.

Mr. President, aside from the basic military hardware requirements that have not been filled, it is also very important that we reestablish good government-to-government relations with Turkey. The Turks have found it difficult to understand our policy in this matter, since they had always been one of our staunchest allies. My colleagues may recall how responsive the Turkish Government was in contributing their forces to our United Nations effort in Korea in 1950, and the reliable ally they have been to the NATO alliance over all these years.

We must also examine this problem in the overall ongoing struggle between the superpowers and the fact that this struggle requires, if we are to be successful, the establishment and maintenance of strong alliances with as many other nations as possible. We cannot survive in this struggle alone, and we cannot afford to allow schisms to develop that weaken the binding of our various alliances and relationships with other nations.

That is the real issue, Mr. President, and that is why this embargo should be repealed.

It is time we ended this folly of trying to insure the arrival at a solution of the Cyprus problem by an embargo that has not worked, that has been counterproductive, and that now should be removed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, reference has been made to the letter written by Mr. Warren Christopher, the Deputy Secretary of State. I believe Senator McGOVERN referred to it. I shall not take time to read the entire letter, but I call attention to this portion of the letter, which is dated yesterday:

Earlier today the Government of Cyprus made its proposal with respect to Varosha which we have also welcomed. Although the Greek Cypriot proposal is different in certain respects from that of the Turkish Cypriots, it is apparent that there is now a solid basis for discussions between the parties of the important humanitarian problem relating to Varosha, and thereafter for resuming the Cyprus intercommunal talks under UN auspicies.

He concludes with this statement:

In the period ahead, it is important that the United States be in a position to play an impartial and constructive role. The lifting of the Turkish embargo is an essential step in this process. To do so will, we believe, help accelerate the search for peace in Cyprus.

It is signed by Warren Christopher.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DEPUTY SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., July 24, 1978.

Hon. JOHN J. SPARKMAN,

DEAR SENATOR SPARKMAN: Last week I wrote to you concerning an important proposal made by the Turkish Cypriots regarding the city of Varosha. Under that proposal, the Turkish Cypriots offered to permit 35,000 Greek Cypriot refugees to return to their homes and businesses in the city of Varosha under United Nations supervision. As you know, we welcomed this Turkish Cypriot proposal.

Earlier today the Government of Cyprus made its proposal with respect to Varosha which we have also welcomed. Although the Greek Cypriot proposal is different in certain respects from that of the Turkish Cypriots, it is apparent that there is now a solid basis for discussions between the parties of the important humanitarian problem relating to Varosha, and thereafter for resuming the Cyprus intercommunal talks under UN auspices.

The coming weeks and months will be crucial in resolving the fundamental questions relating to Cyprus which have troubled the people of that island, and the entire world, for so long. In the period ahead, it is important that the United States be in a position to play an impartial and constructive role. The lifting of the Turkish embargo is an essential step in this process. To do so will, we believe, help accelerate the search for peace in Cyprus.

Sincerely,

WARREN CHRISTOPHER.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY).

CYPRUS, NOT TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO, IS THE ISSUE

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, there has been a good deal of talk during this debate over the urgent need to repair our relations with Turkey by lifting the arms embargo.

I fully share the concern of many over the festering problems in the eastern Mediterranean, and the importance of both Turkey and Greece in NATO. But in our efforts to achieve these goals, I believe Cyprus remains the issue at hand. I, for one, am prepared to lend my full support to every effort to restore and to strengthen our relations with Turkey if there is some definitive and concrete progress in the field toward resolving the Cyprus problem.

Whether the administration likes it or not, real progress toward an honorable and just resolution of the Cyprus problem is crucial in repairing and revitalizing our relations with both Turkey and Greece. It was Cyprus that caused the Congress to impose the arms embargo against Turkey, and Cyprus remains the issue today.

But what will give new priority to Cyprus? What is good faith? And what is real progress?

I submit that the answers to these questions do not lie in new expressions of optimism. They do not lie in the rhetoric of new promises. And they do not lie in just lifting the Turkish arms embargo.

The answers lie in giving time and attention to new initiatives to promote concrete actions in the field. And we in Congress should be in no rush to act on legislation affecting the people of Cyprus until such new initiatives produce those concrete developments.

Over 2 months ago, I urged the administration to give Cyprus the diplomatic priority it demands. I suggested that the United States undertake a new diplomatic initiative to get negotiations underway. I suggested that we directly help the parties establish some guidelines and principles to give the negotiations direction and focus. I suggested that if tangible steps were taken in support of a resumption of negotiations—such as, for example, the permission of substantial numbers of refugees to return to their homes and lands in the Famagusta or Morphou areas under United Nations auspices—this would warrant a positive response from Congress on the Turkish arms embargo.

It is interesting that we have been able to outline a statement of principles with regard to a solution and settlement of the Middle East issues and questions, and we have a great sense of pride in the leadership of the United States in fashioning that statement of principles.

It seems to me that if we had been able to exercise some leadership in stating these principles and seeing marked progress in trying to reach these principles on Cyprus, the issue before the Senate today would be different. But we have not, and no real initiatives have been made by the administration in that area.

Last week, the Department of State suggested that the recent proposals of the Cypriot-Turkish representative, Mr. Rauf Denktash, represent such progress. Mr. President, if these proposals by Mr. Denktash represent the kind of progress and good faith the administration says they do—then why do we not wait and allow time for all parties concerned to develop the proposals in a mutually satisfactory way that will allow the resumption of meaningful negotiations? If Mr. Denktash is operating in good faith, then let us give the United Nations an opportunity to work out the modalities of allowing substantial numbers of refugees to return to their homes in Famagusta.

As the manager of the bill, the Senator from Maryland understands, to my knowledge not one refugee family has been permitted the opportunity to return to their home. There has not yet been much opportunity for the reunification of families in the occupied area on Cyprus. And no genuine effort to trace the missing.

That is what we are talking about. As we are talking about human rights and the plight of refugee families, let us recognize that no effort has been made to date to really make progress to help them. It can be done very easily and simply. The refugee subcommittee, of which I served as chairman, in three reports, has outlined recommendations as to how those steps could be taken.

The United Nations is fully aware of the possibilities, and still no progress has been made on some of the most basic and fundamental humanitarian issues.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield on that point.

Mr. SARBANES. I think it is a very important point. As the Senator from Missouri, Senator EAGLETON, pointed out earlier today in the debate, careful consideration of those proposals that were brought forth by the Turkish Cypriots last week showed clearly that they are nothing beyond a proposal to talk. The fact of the matter is, as a consequence of the aggression committed in the summer of 1974, Turkish forces occupied 40 percent of the island. They are in a position to take concrete action to prove their good faith to return territory, to allow people who have become refugees to actually return to their homes. They have not been prepared to do this.

The New York Times in its editorial on Saturday, arguing that the Senate should maintain the limited embargo which now exists on arms sales to Turkey, went on to say that:

The vague proposal put forward by the Turkish Cypriots on Thursday for resettling some Greek refugees is welcome but scarcely sufficient. The Turkish concessions need to be territorial.

How long are we going to go on allowing the aggressors to completely realize all the fruits of their aggression and come to this body and argue that the embargo which was applied as a matter of American law should be lifted in the absence of any significant and substantial concrete action to remedy the aggression which was committed?

The most clear and dramatic example of that would be a significant return of territory which would allow refugees to go back to their homes and be resettled and quit living as displaced persons in their own country.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that William Haley, of Senator HANSEN's staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I wish to engage the Senator from Maryland in a colloquy in a few minutes in developing these points, but as I understand, Mr. President, the recent statements of Mr. Denktash have been labeled by the Department of State as "substantive and significant," and, as I mentioned earlier, I think it is time that we put our diplomacy to work and see if we cannot implement them.

It is unfortunate, Mr. President, that Congress is asked to lift the arms embargo to Turkey just when all parties should be concentrating on working with the United Nations, and Secretary General Kurt Waldheim, in getting the negotiations resumed and implementing concrete proposals for a peaceful settlement of the outstanding issues in the field. If the progress is made, then will be the right time for Congress to consider lifting the arms embargo. In the absence of substantive and significant progress, it is not only premature but potentially damaging to the prospects for a peaceful settlement for us to take the actions proposed today by the administration.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator will yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. I only have about 4 additional minutes of comments, and then I will be glad to yield.

Last April I wrote to Secretary of State Vance about the importance of new initiatives for peace in Cyprus.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., April 18, 1978.

Hon. CYRUS R. VANCE,
Secretary of State,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: As you know, over the past several years I have closely followed developments on Cyprus, and the difficult and complex issues involved in repairing our relations with both Greece and Turkey. I supported the early initiatives of the Administration in this important area of public and Congressional concern, and I want to continue to work with you in the days ahead.

However, I am deeply concerned that the issue of Cyprus has been inadequately considered in the Administration's most recent proposals relative to military assistance to Turkey. And in this connection, I wanted to draw your attention to some proposals I discussed yesterday relative to some new diplomatic alternatives that I believe might contribute to progress in resolving the Cyprus problem.

I would appreciate your comments on my attached statement, and discussing these proposals further with you. Many thanks for your consideration, and best wishes.

Very truly yours,

EDWARD M. KENNEDY.

Mr. KENNEDY. Attached to my letter were concrete proposals for movement on the territorial, constitutional, security and humanitarian issues, that the Senator from Maryland has mentioned, which continue to face us on the island.

In each of these areas, it was my conviction that the United States could work energetically and creatively with the parties to develop at least the outline of a comprehensive solution in any one of those areas, and there was still no progress.

On May 1, Secretary Vance replied to my letter, assuring me of the priority that the administration continues to attach to achieving a just settlement on Cyprus. He looked forward to a "more useful" role for the United States, and cited the proposals made by the Turkish-Cypriot side on April 13.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of Secretary Vance's letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, May 1, 1978.

DEAR TED: I appreciated hearing your views on the Cyprus issue and your suggestions as to possible diplomatic initiatives in the coming months.

I can assure you that this Administration continues to attach a high priority to the achievement of a just settlement on Cyprus that will permit the two communities to live peacefully together in one nation. Our recent proposals to the Congress regarding security assistance in the eastern Mediterranean are not, we believe, inconsistent with this goal and we believe they will indeed facilitate the negotiating process. The United States can play a more useful role in terms of encouraging a return to the negotiating table and the development of sound proposals if we are perceived by all the parties concerned to be even-handed in our approach. An embargo against one side makes it difficult to play that role.

As you know, the Turkish Cypriots presented at least an outline of new negotiating proposals to Secretary General Waldheim in Vienna on April 13. The Secretary General then travelled to Nicosia to consult with the Government of Cyprus, which after examining the new proposals declared them to be unacceptable. In the circumstances, the Secretary General has indicated that he plans to study the matter further before reaching any decisions on possible resumption of intercommunal negotiations.

I agree with you that the next few months may offer a new opportunity to move toward a Cyprus settlement, an opportunity that should not be allowed to pass. For this reason, we have urged Secretary General Waldheim to continue United Nations discussions with the two sides so that negotiations may soon resume, and we have undertaken to approach the parties to impress on them the need for a more flexible attitude.

I would like very much to come over to see you about Cyprus later this week and discuss in detail our discussions with the parties and my several recent conversations with Kurt Waldheim.

Sincerely,

CY.

Mr. KENNEDY. The sad fact, however, is that the United States has not succeeded in bring either Cypriot side substantially closer together.

The Turkish side has failed to make sufficient proposals for forward movement—although we now see the glimmering of what could be achieved if Congress were to withhold action on the administration's request until further efforts are made by the parties concerned. I strongly believe, on the basis of many years of consideration of the issues on Cyprus and in the eastern Mediterranean, that we have a key opportunity for forward diplomatic movement, which we could miss by premature action on arms for Turkey.

Then just a few days ago—last Friday—I received a letter from Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher forwarding the latest Turkish proposals, commenting that they were, in his opinion, "substantive and significant."

However, when we look closely at what the Turkish-Cypriot leader proposes, it is unclear as to its intent, and some of the proposals—such as the reopening of Nicosia Airport—should have come earlier to have constructive impact.

The crucial issue of good faith on Turkey's part remains what they are prepared to do to allow a substantial number of refugees to return to their homes under clear-cut terms and under the protection of the United Nations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 4 additional minutes?

Mr. CASE. I yield the Senator 4 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized for 4 additional minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in the rush to meet the deadline of the vote on the Turkish arms embargo, these factors remain only tentative and preliminary and, given past action, are open to serious question.

In the rush to meet our vote today, neither the Turks nor the administration have yet marshaled the evidence sufficient to suggest that concrete and substantial steps have or will be taken in resolving the Cyprus problem if we vote to lift the embargo today.

Mr. President, we should all share a concern for peace and a just settlement of the outstanding issues on Cyprus. At the same time, we should share an interest in good relations with our NATO allies, Greece and Turkey, which will in fact facilitate the resolution of these longstanding and important issues. I believe that the best way to achieve this is for us to give diplomacy time to work, to permit both this administration and the Secretary General of the United Nations to test and bring to fruition the tentative signs we have today of forward movement.

By acting on arms for Turkey before we have the assurances of peace for Cyprus, we do not give ourselves or the people of Cyprus, or our Greek and Turkish allies, the opportunity we deserve to achieve the comprehensive settlement we have all been aspiring and working toward over the past 4 years.

So I must strongly oppose lifting of the Turkish arms embargo at this time. I must remind all of us of the dangers we run in terms of lasting peace in the area, for the sake of short-term advantages with only one of our allies. A decision to lift the arms embargo will unfortunately be a shortsighted choice for Turkey, and not a statesmanlike response to the overall problems we face in the eastern Mediterranean.

Mr. President, I wish to draw attention of the Senator from Maryland to a matter that goes back a number of years. This is relative to the missing Cypriot Greeks who disappeared during the early days of the invasion in 1974. In the third round of intercommunal talks in Vienna in August 1975, at that time the Turkish Government made a commitment and an agreement to respond to the International Red Cross—and it was their finding—the International Red Cross finding about 2,700 missing persons.

We are very concerned about missing Americans in action, as we should be, but here we have the International Red Cross talking about 2,700 missing in Cyprus, and the Turkish Government agreeing in Vienna in August 1975, about accountability, and still, as I understand, there has not been any genuine response or reaction, just on this very basic and fundamental question about missing persons.

It just seems to me, Mr. President, that on a series of humanitarian issues such as the missing in action, the plight of refugee families, small items which many countries are willing to attempt to deal with, in order to respond to requests of civilized nations of the world—on Cyprus we have had virtual silence.

I can remember this year in visiting the People's Republic of China asking about 23 families that were separated, that were of special humanitarian concern. Already this year we see that four have been released to the United States to be reunified with their family here.

We concern ourselves about issues of human rights, and it seems to me that what the Senate is being asked today is to act on the promises of Mr. Denktash—speculative comments of the Turkish leaders—that we should lift this embargo, and I am wondering whether the Senator from Maryland has found in his own study of this situation whether there have been any independent actions to which we could point that would indicate any reflection of progress toward meeting just basic and fundamental humanitarian issues?

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, to allow independent bodies, international bodies to undertake through the——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time has expired.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield additional time?

Mr. CASE. I yield an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. SARBANES. To allow international bodies to undertake a careful examination of the missing persons problem have been rejected.

If you want to talk about a human rights issue, this is the issue.

The Sunday Times, the London Sunday Times, on January 23, 1977, published excerpts from the report of the European Commission on Human Rights detailing the violations of human rights which had occurred on Cyprus as a result of the Turkish military forces' occupation of that country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article from the London Sunday Times setting out the excerpts from the European Commission's report on the violations of human rights on Cyprus be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the London Sunday Times, Jan. 23, 1977]

TURK ATROCITIES: WHAT SECRET REPORT REVEALS

The Sunday Times has obtained a copy of a secret Council of Europe report which finds Turkey guilty of violating seven articles of the European Convention on Human Rights. It amounts to a massive indictment of the Ankara government for the murder, rape and looting by its army in Cyprus during and after the Turkish invasion of summer 1974.

The politically explosive report by leading jurists on the European Commission of Human Rights is regarded as so confidential that only one copy has been lodged with each of the Council of Europe's 19 member states. Its impact could result in the withdrawal or expulsion of Turkey from the Council.

Allegations made by the Cyprus Government against Turkey covered systematic killings of civilians who were not involved in the 1974 fighting; repeated rape of women aged from 12 to 71, often brutally, in public; the torture and savage and humiliating treatment of hundreds of Greek Cypriots, including children, during their detention by the Turkish army; and charges of extensive looting and plunder which were supported by unpublished United Nations documents.

The Commission said it could reach no conclusion on allegations of forced labour.

The inquiry by the Commission of 17 members, under their British president, James Fawcett, began in May 1975. A delegation visited the island in September 1975, and submissions were received up to May 18, 1976.

The investigators were hampered by Turkey's refusal to participate in the inquiry—they were denied access to the "Turkish Federated State" unilaterally established in the occupied north of Cyprus. They were also hampered by the sheer number of alleged violations of the Convention, and had to restrict their investigation to a limited number of cases "selected as representative."

Copies of the report were sent to member governments as long ago as last August, but it will be next month before the Council's committee of ministers meets in Strasbourg to consider what action to take.

The Turkish government's response to the Commission's report has been to reject it out of hand. A statement issued by the Turkish Foreign Ministry in Ankara said: "The Commission examined the Greek [allegations] in a manner which we don't think is in accordance with the European Human Rights agreement, and in Turkey's absence.

"The Commission has thus based its report on the allegations of the Greek Cypriot Government and the statements of a few Greek witnesses alone which it listened to in four short days in Cyprus. And it prepared it [the report] with unusual haste."

Both the Turkish Foreign Ministry and Prime Minister, Suleyman Demirel, also complained that the Commission had not taken into account "the terrorist activities undertaken by the Greeks against the Turkish community" in Cyprus.

Referring to inter-communal strife on the island between 1963 and 1974, Mr. Demirel said: "Why does nobody see cruelty when it is committed against Turks? For years (Cypriot) Turks were subjected to cruelty but everyone was silent. Turks were pitilessly slaughtered from the baby in the cot to old people of 90. They were evicted from their houses and homes. Nobody saw that. Now they condemn Turks with a report."

Mr. Demirel added that Turks were "extraordinarily civilised people" and "have not committed cruelty or anything against anyone."

Last night a senior official of the Turkish Foreign Ministry said it was "a scandal" that the Sunday Times had obtained a copy of the Commission's report. He blamed "the Greeks."

TURKEY AND CYPRUS

On page ten of today's issue, we publish some of the details from a report about alleged Turkish atrocities in Cyprus. The report is the work of the Human Rights Commission of the Council of Europe. It is a horrendous indictment against Turkey and its soldiers and civilians sent from the mainland to the Turkish areas of Cyprus. The member Governments of the Council of Europe must decide next month whether or not to accept the report. If they do accept it, and it is difficult to see, on the evidence, how they can avoid doing so, then Turkey will stand condemned before the bar of European and indeed world opinion.

The first thing to be clear about is that these wrongdoings are the work of the Turks from the mainland. Turkish Cypriots harbour a credible sense of past grievance against the Greek Cypriot majority on the island. But they know that they can and must eventually live, as they have done for centuries, in peace with their Greek neighbours. The invaders from the north are another matter altogether. The government in Ankara as well as Turkish public opinion itself, must be brought to see that Turkish behaviour in Cyprus is a blot upon the good name and reputation of the Turkish people themselves. "Turks are extraordinarily civilised people," Mr. Demirel, the Turkish Prime Minister, said last week.

The Prime Minister can, of course, sustain this claim by producing counterevidence for the period of the European Commission report. But there are other steps of immediate relevance to the people in northern Cyprus today. He should issue orders—and see they are obeyed—for the protection of human rights. And he should permit free access (denied even to Turkish Cypriots) to all parts of northern Cyprus. These would be measures of good intent. The new President of the United States, who has pledged himself to defend human rights, should encourage Turkey in this; his moral fervour and humanity will be an important element in reasserting the need for America's NATO allies to observe irreducible standards of conduct.

THE TERRIBLE SECRETS OF THE TURKISH INVASION OF CYPRUS

(The plight of Cyprus, with 40 percent of the island still occupied by Turkish troops who invaded in the summer of 1974, is well known. But never before has the full story been told of what happened during and after the invasion. This article is based on the secret report of the European Commission of Human Rights. For obvious reasons, Insight has withheld the names of witnesses who gave evidence to the Commission.)

KILLING

Relevant Article of Human Rights Convention: Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law.

Charge made by Greek-Cypriots: The Turkish army embarked on a systematic course of mass killings of civilians unconnected with any war activity.

Turkish Defence: None offered, but jurisdiction challenged. By letter dated November 27, 1975. Turkey told the Commission it refused to accept the Greek Cypriot administration's right to go to the commission, "since there is no authority which can properly require the Turkish government to recognize against its will the legitimacy of a government which has usurped the powers of the estate in violation of the constitution of which Turkey is a guarantor." No defence therefore offered to any other charges either.

Evidence given to the commission: Witness Mrs. K said the powers of the state in violation that on July 21, 1974, the second day of the Turkish invasion, she and a group of villages from Ella were captured when, fleeing from bombardment, they tried to reach a range of mountains. All 12 men arrested were civilians. They were separated from the women and shot in front of the women under orders of a Turkish officer. Some of the men were holding children, three of whom were wounded.

Written statements referred to two more group killings: at Trimithi eyewitnesses told of the deaths of five men (two shepherds aged 60 and 70, two masons of 20 and 60, and a 19-year-old plumber). At Palekythron 30 Greek Cypriot soldiers being held prisoner were killed by their captors, according to the second statement.

Witness S gave evidence of two other mass killings at Palekythron. In each case, between 30 and 40 soldiers who had surrendered to the advancing Turks were shot. In the second case, the witness said, "the soldiers were transferred to the kilns of the village where they were shot dead and burnt in order not to leave details of what had happened."

Seventeen members of two neighboring families, including 10 women and five children aged between two and nine were also killed in cold blood at Palekythron, reported witness H, a doctor. Further killings described in the doctor's notes, recorded evidence related to him by patients (either eyewitnesses or victims) included:

Execution of eight civilians taken prisoner by Turkish soldiers in the area of Prastio, one day after the ceasefire on August 16, 1974.

Killing by Turkish soldiers of five unarmed Greek Cypriot soldiers who had sought refuge in a house at Voni.

Shooting of four women, one of whom survived by pretending she was dead.

Further evidence, taken in refugee camps and in the form of written statements, described killings of civilians in homes, streets or fields, as well as the killing of people under arrest or in detention. Eight statements described the killing of soldiers not in combat; five statments referred to a mass grave found in Dherynia.

Commission's verdict: By 14 votes to one, the commission considered there were "very strong indications" of violation of Article 2 and killings "committed on a substantial scale."

RAPE

Relevant article: No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Charge by Greek-Cypriots: Turkish troops were responsible for wholesale and repeated rapes of women of all ages from 12 to 71, sometimes to such an extent that the victims suffered hemorrhages or became mental wrecks. In some areas, enforced prostitution was practised, all women and girls of a village being collected and put into separate rooms in empty houses where they were raped repeatedly.

In certain cases, members of the same family were repeatedly raped, some of them in front of their own children. In other cases women were brutally raped in public.

Rapes were on many occasions accompanied by brutalities such as violent biting of the victims causing severe wounding, banging their heads on the floor and wringing their throats almost to the point of suffocation. In some cases attempts to rape were followed by the stabbing or killing of the victims, victims included pregnant and mentally-retarded women.

Evidence given to commission: Testimony of doctors C and H, who examined the victims. Eyewitnesses and hearsay witnesses also gave evidence, and the commission had before it written statements from 41 alleged victims.

Dr. H said he had confirmed rape in 70 cases, including:

A mentally-retarded girl of 24 was raped in her house by 20 soldiers. When she started screaming they threw her from the second-floor window. She fractured her spine and was paralyzed;

One day after their arrival at Voni, Turks took girls to a nearby house and raped them;

One woman from Voni was raped on three occasions by four persons each time. She became pregnant;

One girl, from Polekythron, who was held with others in a house, was taken out at gunpoint and raped.

At Tanvu, Turkish soldiers tried to rape a 17-year-old schoolgirl. She resisted and was shot dead;

A woman from Gypsou told Dr. H. that 25 girls were kept by Turks at Marathouvouno as prostitutes.

Another witness said his wife was raped in front of their children. Witness S. told of 25 girls who complained to Turkish officers about being raped and were raped again by the officers. A man (name withheld) reported that his wife was stabbed in the neck while resisting rape. His granddaughter, aged six, had been stabbed and killed by Turkish soldiers attempting to rape her.

A Red Cross witness said that in August 1974, while the island's telephones were still working, the Red Cross Society received calls from Palekythrou and Kaponti reporting rapes. The Red Cross also took care of 38 women released from Voni and Gypsou detention camps: all had been raped, some in front of their husbands and children. Others had been raped repeatedly, or put in houses frequented by Turkish soldiers.

These women were taken to Akrotiri hospital, in the British Sovereign Base Area, where they were treated. Three were found to be pregnant. Reference was also made to several abortions performed at the base.

Commission's verdict: By 12 votes to one the commission found "that the incidents of rape described in the cases referred to and regarded as established constitute 'inhuman treatment' and thus violations of Article 3 for which Turkey is responsible under the convention."

TORTURE

Charge by Greek-Cypriots: Hundreds of people, including children, women and pensioners, were victims of systematic torture and savage and humiliating treatment during their detention by the Turkish army. They were beaten, according to the allegations, sometimes to the extent of being incapacitated. Many were subjected to whipping, breaking of their teeth, knocking their heads against walls, beating with electrified clubs, stubbing of cigarettes on their skin, jumping and stepping on their chests and hands, pouring dirty liquids on them, piercing them with bayonets, etc.

Many, it was said, were ill-treated to such an extent that they became mental and physical wrecks. The brutalities complained of reached their climax after the ceasefire agreements; in fact, most of the acts described were committed at a time when Turkish armed forces were not engaged in any war activities.

Evidence to Commission: Main witness was schoolteacher, one of 2,000 Greek Cypriot men deported to Turkey. He stated that he and his fellow detainees were repeatedly beaten after their arrest, on their way to Adana (in Turkey), in jail in Adana and in prison camp at Amasya.

On ship to Turkey—"That was another moment of terrible beating again. We were tied all the time. I lost the sense of touch. I could not feel anything for about two or three months. Every time we asked for water or spoke we were being beaten."

Arriving at Adana—" . . . then, one by one, they led us to prisons, through a long corridor . . . Going through that corridor was another terrible experience. There were about 100 soldiers from both sides with sticks, clubs and with their fists beating every one of us while going to the other end of the corridor. I was beaten at least 50 times until I reached the other end.

In Adana anyone who said he wanted to see a doctor was beaten. "Beating was on the agenda every day. There were one or two very good, very nice people, but they were afraid to show their kindness, as they told us."

Witness P spoke of:

A fellow prisoner who was kicked in the mouth. He lost several teeth "and his lower jaw came off in pieces."

A Turkish officer, a karate student, who exercised every day by hitting prisoners.

Fellow prisoners who were hung by the feet over the hole of a lavoratory for hours.

A Turkish second lieutenant who used to prick all prisoners with a pin when they were taken into a yard.

Evidence from Dr. H. said that prisoners were in an emaciated condition on their return to Cyprus. On nine occasions he had found signs of wounds.

The doctor gave a general description of conditions in Adana and in detention camps in Cyprus (at Pavlides Garage and the Saray Prison in the Turkish quarter of Nicosia) as reported to him by former detainees. Food, he said, consisted of one-eighth of a loaf of bread a day, with occasional olives; there were two buckets of water and two mugs which were never cleaned, from which about 1,000 people had to drink; toilets were filthy, with feces rising over the basins; floors were covered with feces and urine; in jail in Adana prisoners were kept 76 to a cell with three towels between them and one block of soap per eight persons per month to wash themselves and their clothes.

One man, it was alleged, had to amputate his own toes with a razor blade as a consequence of ill-treatment. Caught in Achna with another man, they had been beaten up with hard objects. When he had asked for a glass of water he was given a glass full of urine. His toes were then stepped on until they became blue, swollen and eventually gangrenous. (The other man was said to have been taken to hospital in Nicosia, where he agreed to have his legs amputated. He did not survive the operation.)

According to witness S, "hundreds of Greek Cypriots were beaten and dozens were executed. They have cut off their ears in some cases, like the case of Palekythro and Trahoni. . . ." (verbatim record).

Verdict by commission: By 12 votes to one, the commission concluded that prisoners were in a number of cases physically ill-treated by Turkish soldiers. "These acts of ill-treatment caused considerable injuries and in at least one case, the death of the victim. By their severity they constitute 'inhuman treatment' in the sense of Article 3, for which Turkey is responsible under the convention."

LOOTING

Relevant article: Every natural or legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions.

Charge by Greek Cypriots: In all Turkish-occupied areas, the Turkish army systematically looted houses and business premises of Greek Cypriots.

Evidence to commission: Looting in Kyrenia was described by witness C: "* * * The first days of looting of the shops was done by the army, of heavy things like refrigerators, laundry machines, television sets" (verbatim record).

For weeks after the invasion, he said, he had watched Turkish naval ships taking on board the looted goods.

Witness K, a barrister, described the pillage of Famagusta: "At two o'clock an organised systematic, terrifying, shocking, unbelievable looting started * * * We heard the breaking of doors, some of them iron doors, smashing of glass, and we were waiting for them any minute to enter the house. This lasted for about four hours."

Written statements by eye-witnesses of looting were corroborated by several reports by the secretary-general of the United Nations.

Verdict of Commission: The commission accepted that looting and robbery on an extensive scale, by Turkish troops and Turkish Cypriots, had taken place. By 12 votes to one, it established that there had been deprivation of possessions of Greek Cypriots on a large scale.

OTHER CHARGES

On four counts, the commission concluded that Turkey had also violated an Article of the Convention asserting the right to respect for private and family life, home and correspondence. The commission also decided that Turkey was continuing to violate the Article by refusing to allow the return of more than 170,000 Greek Cypriot refugees to their homes in the north.

On three counts, the commission said Turkey had breached an Article laying down the right to liberty and security of persons by confining more than 2,000 Greek Cypriots in schools and churches.

Finally, the commission said Turkey had violated two more articles that specify that the rights and freedoms in the Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground, and that anyone whose rights are violated "shall have an effective remedy before a national authority."

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator is absolutely right. Not only are the territorial concessions we have talked about earlier being made, but there have been significant steps that could have been taken to address the human rights problem which have not been done. Those are good faith manifestations of a desire to bring about a solution of this problem, and to remedy some of the consequences of the aggression, and we have not even been able to attain those steps in the most humanitarian of areas, including the missing persons problem to which the Senator has alluded and to which he has given some careful attention.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator. I am going to put in the RECORD excerpts from a report of my Refugee Subcommittee that discusses some of these humanitarian issues where the Turkish side has failed to respond—where there has really been no corresponding action in terms of the recommendations of the international community, whether it has been the International Red Cross or other special pleas by the United Nations in the area of humanitarian concerns.

If there are those here on the floor who have knowledge of this situation and are able to provide any information, I think the RECORD should show it, otherwise it seems to me to be very clear there has not been any action.

I thank the Senator from Maryland and I ask that excerpts from the Subcommittee on Refugees' report of 1976 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM REPORTS OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON REFUGEES, U.S. SENATE, ON THE CRISIS ON CYPRUS

MISSING PERSONS

One of the most troublesome humanitarian problems on Cyprus is the fate of hundreds of missing Cypriots. Progress was achieved early in the exchange of prisoners, but little has been attained in terms of securing information on those persons still missing subsequent to the Turkish invasion and occupation of the island. This, despite the effective work of the Tracing Agency of the International Red Cross in developing an extensive file and documentation on missing persons.

By all accounts—and as reported in the Subcommittee's Study Mission report in October 1974—the Turkish army conducted widespread and systematic arrests and detainment of Cypriot-Greek men, both during and after the invasion. Most of the Cypriot-Greeks now missing and unaccounted for, date from this period. Their whereabouts is of particular concern, because evidence exists, in several dozen cases, that they were seen alive long after their detainment and, in some instances, after other prisoners were released.

Although detailed information on individual Cypriot-Greeks listed as missing has been transmitted to Turkish authorities by the International Red Cross—a total of some 2,700 Cypriot-Greeks by name—Turkish officials have stated flatly that they hold no further prisoners, and they have offered no information on the fate of the missing. In conversations with high-ranking Cypriot-Turkish authorities in Nicosia, the study team was told that while "some information" was no doubt available on some missing Cypriot-Greeks, there was no sense of urgency in providing it "since they were all dead." These officials emphasized that during the violence and fighting many civilians were killed and summarily buried, and there simply was no easy way to obtain further information.

However, this fails to take into consideration the Red Cross documented cases involving persons seen since the violence ended, and since the ceasefire was implemented. When such cases have been pursued, information has resulted. One celebrated case recently involved a Cypriot-Greek judge known to have been taken into custody by the Turkish military, because it was noted by International Red Cross officials on the scene at the time. After consistently denying it had any information, the Cypriot-Turkish administration subsequently acknowledged, upon investigation, that the judge had indeed been arrested, but was later shot to death. How many more such cases, and how much similar information, could be developed upon investigation is difficult to determine without the cooperation of the Cypriot-Turkish administration. Given the lack of progress on this issue, and the fact that documentation files have been completed on all known cases, Swiss officials from the Tracing Agency of the International Red Cross closed their operation in Nicosia in October, turning all files over to Cypriot authorities and the United Nations.

The Third Round of Intercommunal talks in Vienna in August 1975, officially took note of missing persons problem, its final communique stating:

Although both sides again affirmed that they were not knowingly holding undeclared prisoners-of-war or other detainees, it was agreed mutually to extend full facilities for searches in response to information given by either side.

To date, however, the Cypriot-Turkish authorities have made no facilities available for searches for the missing, despite the extensive information provided to them.

Although most Cypriot-Greeks have reluctantly come to the conclusion that most, if not all, of the missing are probably dead, their family members still believe they have a right to know the fate of their relatives who were in the hands of Turkish military authorities. It has become a serious political issue on Cyprus, and one that threatens to exacerbate tensions and derail negotiations, unless some gesture is made in responding to the legitimate concern over missing persons on Cyprus.

4. PLIGHT OF ENCLAVED CYPRIOTS

As a result of the continuing deadlock over a negotiated settlement, Cyprus has slowly drifted toward a total ethnic separation. Of the 200,000 Cypriot-Greeks who used to live north of the current ceasefire line, no more than 10,000 now remain, mostly in the Karpasia region. Of the 45,000 Cypriot-Turks who formerly lived south of the line, no more than a handful remain today—nearly all old people in the Paphos area.

Whereas the movement of the Cypriot-Greeks south has been the result of the invasion and forcible evacuation and harassment, the movement of Cypriot-Turks north has resulted from the persistent demands of Turkish authorities. This demand was met in the Third Round of Intercommunal talks in Vienna, between Rauf Denktash, representing the Cypriot-Turkish community, and Glafcos Clerides, representing the Cypriot-Greek community. The agreement was a quid pro quo: the Cypriot-Turks would be allowed to go north under U.N. auspices, if the Cypriot-Greeks in the north were allowed to stay, and their lives normalized and protected under U.N. auspices. Specifically, the text of the Vienna agreement issued on August 2, 1975 provided:

1. The Turkish Cypriots at present in the south of the island will be allowed, if they want to do so, to proceed north with their belongings under an organized programme and with the assistance of UNFICYP (The United Nations Peace-keeping Force in Cyprus).

2. Mr. Denktash reaffirmed, and it was agreed, that the Greek Cypriots at present in the north of the island are free to stay and that they will be given every help to lead a normal life, including facilities for education and for the practice of their religion as well as medical care by their own doctors and freedom of movement in the north.

3. The Greek Cypriots at present in the north who, at their own request and without having been subjected to any kind of pressure, wish to move to the south will be permitted to do so.

4. UNFICYP will have free and normal access to Greek Cypriot villages and habitations in the north.

5. In connection with the implementation of the above agreement priority will be given to the reunification of families, which may also involve the transfer of a number of Greek Cypriots, at present in the south, to the north.

The question of displaced persons was also re-examined.

Months later, of the five points agreed upon in Vienna, the only one implemented in good faith was the first point, that the Government of Cyprus would permit the movement north of Cypriot-Turks who wished to move under United Nations auspices. In every respect, the Cyprus government has abided by the provisions of the Vienna accord, although in no respect has the Turkish administration fulfilled its obligations toward the Cypriot-Greeks in the occupied areas.

The study team noted that every objective observer on Cyprus has concluded that the Cypriot-Turkish Administration has done tragically little to fulfill its pledge to help Cypriot-Turkish Administration has done cluding facilities for education and for the practice of their religion as well as medical care by their own doctors and freedom of movement in the north." In fact, during the study team's visit on Cyprus, conditions among the enclaved Cypriot-Greeks further deteriorated: (1) the last remaining Cypriot-Greek doctor was expelled; (2) schools were still closed, with parents increasingly anxious that their children would be forced to forego a second year of schooling; (3) freedom of movement was severely restricted; (4) the Cypriot-Greeks from Kyrenia still in the Dome Hotel were expelled and not allowed to return to their homes; and (5) Greek Orthodox priests were still prohibited from conducting services in certain areas. In addition, the obligation to allow freedom of movement to UNFICYP personnel was being honored more in the breech. In short, the Vienna accords which were to normalize the lives of Cypriot-Greeks in the Turkish occupied areas have not only been ignored, they have been followed by a new round of harassment and further expulsions. Officials in the American Embassy explained that this occurred not because of any lack of goodwill on the part of Mr. Denktash; but, rather, "the Turkish Army has constantly pulled the rug out from under him."

Whatever the reason, and no matter the excuses, the plain fact remains that life among Cypriot-Greeks in the north has not improved. It has deteriorated since the Cypriot-Turkish Administration solemnly pledged in Vienna to take steps to normalize and protect their lives. This total violation by Turkish authorities of a negotiated agreement inevitably raises questions in the minds of Cypriot-Greeks as to the worth of Mr. Denktash's signature, much less the intentions of Turkish authorities to abide by negotiated agreements. This is particularly painful when the Government of Cyprus has, under international auspices, faithfully fulfilled provisions relating to the Cypriot-Turks in the south—allowing them to move north in an orderly fashion, protecting those who remain, and permitting what they had steadfastly refused to allow: the total ethnic partition of the island. And for this the Cypriot-Greeks have received nothing in return. All of which bodes ill for future negotiations on the fate of Cyprus.

5. HUMANITARIAN PROBLEMS IN OCCUPIED AREAS

Although the Cypriot-Turks inherited some 70% of the economic potential of Cyprus within the line drawn by the Turkish invasion—as well as nearly half the agricultural exports, 50% of the manufacturing production, 65% of the tourist accommodations, 83% of the cargo handling, and 56% of the mining output—nonetheless the economy in the northern half of the island is in disarray and stagnating.

According to the Foreign Economic Trends report prepared by the American Embassy, in the year since the invasion: "The economy in the Turkish-controlled north is in a state of major disruption and is unlikely soon to return to the production level of the pre-war period. So far, the Turk Cypriots living in the north do not have either the managerial or the capital resources necessary to reactivate their economy."

The gloomy economic picture in the north is manifested in the continued depressed living standards among many Cypriot-Turks, which, ironically was one of the grievances held by them against the Cypriot-Greeks. Now, not only are they separate and free from economic domination by the Cypriot-Greeks, they have inherited the largest share of the island's economic potential—but they have been able to do very little with it. This economic stagnation, when coupled with the massive population dislocation that has occurred from south to north, has served to create a number of humanitarian problems which the Cypriot-Turkish administration has only barely begun to grapple with. It is little comfort to note that the mainland Turkish army brought this plague upon the house of the Cypriot-Turks, although they ultimately have the moral responsibility for conditions in the occupied areas—and, under the provisions of the Geneva Conventions, the legal responsibility as well. Nevertheless, a number of humanitarian problems persist in the north, not dissimilar to some of those in the south.

Housing, for example, remains a problem despite the fact that the Cypriot-Turks inherited the houses of some 180,000 Cypriot-Greeks who fled during the invasion or who were later expelled from their homes by the Turkish military. Yet, when Cypriot-Turks move from the south to the occupied areas in the north, they are greeted by nicely built houses that have nothing in them. They have all been looted and damaged, and require considerable repair before they are livable. This is hardly as serious a housing problem as that confronting Cypriot-Greeks, but it has proved to be a hurdle in normalizing conditions in the north.

Food is also a problem in the occupied areas, despite the fact that the northern region represents some 48 percent of the total agricultural resource of the island. But without the labor to plant and harvest the fields, they continue to lie fallow. Without hands to pick the citrus fruit, the oranges rot on the trees. As a result of the disruption of the agricultural sector in the north, Turkish military authorities have been forced to import quantities of food supplies from mainland Turkey.

Health problems have also developed in the occupied areas, with the danger of a malaria epidemic spreading across the island. Mainland Turkish soldiers have apparently introduced malaria to Cyprus which, until last year, was totally free of the disease. In October 1975, a noted Cypriot-Turkish health official, Mr. M. Aziz, warned that unless the Cypriot-Turkish administration took strict preventive measures epidemics would soon spread in Cyprus. The increased passenger traffic between mainland Turkey and Cyprus could import such diseases as malaria, which is rampant in parts of southern Turkey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a minute to reply to some of the comments made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BENTSEN. The Senator is speaking in support, and I understand the Senator was in position to yield time.

Mr. SARBANES. On behalf of the chairman of the committee I ask is there time left on the amendment to the chairman?

Mr. BENTSEN. Then I do not request it.

Mr. SARBANES. I am told they want to reserve that time.

Mr. CASE. I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I know of no issue that has caused more vexation than this one. I have been to Greece and Turkey only within the last few months.

Mr. President, could I have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Can we have order? The Senate is not in order.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I am just in the middle of speaking. I wish to have continuity, but I am perfectly happy to quit and let the Senator speak. I would just as soon quit and then start again because I just do not want to be interrupted in what I have to say.

Mr. BENTSEN. By all means, go ahead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. As I said, Mr. President, I know of no issue in the foreign policy field that has caused me more vexation than this. For a number of years, I have presided as chairman in an effort to obtain Greek and Turkish economic cooperation, that effort looked extremely promising until it was untracked by the military coup in Greece in 1967.

I believe that Prime Minister Ecevit, of Turkey, and Premier Karamanlis, of Greece, are two of the really outstanding statesmen of the world, comparable in their own countries, on the one side, Karamanlis with Venizelos and, on the other, Ecevit with Ataturk. Those illustrious predecessors concluded an accord in the 1920's which gave peace to Greece and Turkey, for 50 years notwithstanding the centuries-old traditional struggle between the Greek and Turkish people.

It is my judgment, after giving it the most profound consideration, that for this time we ought to stay where we are and, therefore, I shall vote against the amendment. I would like to give my reasons.

It is very difficult for me because I know that anger, antipathy, and anxiety never produce peace, but one has to make a choice in our business, and one has to vote yea or nay.

(Mr. McGOVERN assumed the chair.)

Mr. JAVITS. The reason, Mr. President, is—and it is one thing which has not yet come up in our debate—that there is not only grave strain between Greece and Turkey over Cyprus, but there is grave strain between Greece and Turkey over the Aegean, and the strain in that area could prove even greater than the difficulties over Cyprus.

The fact is that in the Aegean there are Greek islands which are extremely close to the Turkish mainland, and Greece—and this is not particularly to its credit—allegedly in violation of treaty agreement, has fortified two of those islands which the Turks consider a great threat.

On the other hand, Mr. President, we know very well, although we are arguing it as if it were an embargo, that this is not a real embargo on Turkey.

Turkey has received more credits for foreign military sales aid during the period of this embargo than before. There is $175 million in credits in this bill for it now, as well as $50 million in economic support aid. That is hardly an embargo in the traditional sense, and it compares extremely favorably with what is allowed for Greece under this and previous bills.

We are talking about moral disapproval, that is what is at stake, and the question is not whether we should stay as we are but the McGovern-Byrd amendment seeks to have us change our position.

I feel, Mr. President, that the difficulty is so deep and the dangers are so great, that no matter what we do we should not yet change our position.

When I voted—and the present occupant of the chair was there when I voted and will confirm it—I said that beyond this vote I give no assurances as to where I will stand, because, let us remember, this is a 1-year bill and a 1-year proposition. Therefore, I still feel that for this year rather than incur the danger that we will jump from the frying pan into the fire and that we will exacerbate the strains, the dangers, and the tensions respecting both Cyprus and the Aegean if we make a new move, I would rather stay where we are and give another little amount of time for the United Nations to try to work out a mediation or for NATO to do it or for their influences which are at work, especially the distinction and brilliance of these two prime ministers.

Mr. President, it is interesting to me that responsible journals which have taken pretty much the same line—and the New York Times, of course, is one of the leaders in that regard—pretty much came to the same conclusion. They felt that Greece was at fault in not being forthcoming to these offers of the Turkish Cypriots, but they felt, however, that the Turks were more at fault in remaining in occupation of a part of this island which was unconscionable, and that unless there was some movement there could be no settlement.

The question which we are trying to debate is that if there is this movement, to wit, a lifting of the embargo will there be a settlement? I believe the dangers of this new situation, as I have just described them, of making the Turks feel they now have a clean bill of health and making the Greeks feel that the United States has abandoned them, and their situation is now desperate, would not lessen the dangers.

Mr. President, I would like to read this sentence from this editorial to which I have referred, which confirms in my mind the validity of the position which, although very vexatious and very difficult for me, I have decided to take. It reads as follows:

> Because ending Turkish occupation remains an essential first step toward creating an atmosphere of trust, Congress should not yet relax the restrictions on arms sales.

So I think, Mr. President, we are picking the wrong time, the wrong place, and the wrong occasion to make a change of position.

For those who argue it is essential to our national security, I think we all know by now that the positions we had in Turkey, the bases, so valuable for intelligence, simply had to be replaced because we were essentially ousted from them.

Again I find no fault; that is a fact of life. And that is no longer, in my judgment, the problem that is presented before us.

So, Mr. President, to give the forces of rationality and of peace an opportunity, not to inflate anybody's ego or to satisfy anybody's chauvinistic aspirations, but to keep the situation in status quo, I believe we should allow the matter to stand where it is and give Waldheim, ourselves, and NATO an opportunity to try to make some real progress in the situation.

The real progress, Mr. President, will be announced by the fact—and one can understand this—that when an area is under occupation, and that is what this is, including the proposals which have been made by Mr. Denktash, it still remains an area under occupation, and there are still many thousands of refugees.

The fact is that Turkey is getting very substantial amounts of arms. The fact is that so is Greece. The fact is that Turkey really has no reason for being insulted by the continuance of what has gone on now since 1974, and we ought to give yet a further opportunity to see if some advance cannot be made. If it cannot, I, like every other Senator, reserve my right to change my mind.

So I hope very much that the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, a few weeks ago, the Senate voted in support of the administration's proposal to sell aircraft to Israel, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia. At that time, those of us who supported the sales did so with the knowledge that the United States could exercise controls over the use of these weapons. My own vote was conditioned on this very premise—if the recipients of these aircraft violate the terms of the sale, this Government will impose suitable and effective restrictions. I no not doubt our ability to do so if such action proves necessary.

Today, we asked to lift the embargo prohibiting certain military sales to Turkey. This embargo, unfortunately but necessarily leveled against a NATO ally, constitutes that very type of control that the United States must exercise over arms transfers. Mr. President, there has been a clear violation of the terms under which Turkey acquired American arms. At the time of the Turkish invasion of Cyprus, American arms were used in violation of U.S. arms export laws. That violation holds in force today. Can we lift this embargo without calling into question the controls that this country must at least attempt to retain over all arms transfers? I believe that we cannot. Mr. President, the United States bears the responsibility to prevent, or at least to limit, aggression of any form—and most assuredly, aggression which American arms helped to make possible.

In the absence of a substantial Turkish troop withdrawal from Cyprus, the United States has no real indication that the terms our ally accepted in order to acquire American arms will be honored in the future. Certainly, Turkey has a legitimate interest in the rights of the Turkish Cypriot minority on Cyprus. I fail, however, to see how the true interests of the Turkish Cypriots will be served by continued military occupation. Their true interests can only be served by a fair, negotiated peace settlement. There can be no settlement without Turkish troop withdrawals—there cannot even be meaningful negotiations.

Those who favor lifting this embargo point to the fact that it has not positively influenced Turkish policy. On the other hand, Mr. President, we do not know if lifting the embargo would have this desired positive effect. We do know that it would make Turkey more able to continue the occupation. We do know that our other ally in the area, Greece, would hardly welcome the action that the administration proposes. We do know that there has been, and still is, a clear violation of our agreement with Turkey as well as our own arms control laws.

Supporters of the proposal have argued that Turkey is not alone in real or suspected violations of U.S. arms transfer laws. But how can this be a rationale for removing the embargo? This fact should serve as a warning signal to this government. A warning that the United States must cease selling arms altogether, sell them without restriction, or enforce the terms of our own laws that seek to control those arms sales that we believe to be legitimate and necessary. This last course is, in my mind, the only satisfactory one open to us. It is the only course to use in the Middle East—the only one to use here.

In closing, Mr. President, I can only say that I am not convinced that it is in the best interests of the United States, the NATO alliance, Turkey, Greece, Cyprus, or the world to lift this embargo today. Let us make it clear to the world that we intend to enforce our arms export laws. Let us make it clear to our enemies that we will not follow a policy that pits one ally against another or benefits one at the expense of another. And finally, let us make it clear to both Greece and Turkey that we are willing to offer our good offices to move toward a Cyprus settlement. When progress toward that settlement is evident, when violations of our laws are rectified, we will not hesitate to lift this embargo and provide our ally, Turkey, with whatever assistance we are able to give her.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD). The Senator's 4 minutes have expired.

Mr. LEAHY. May I have 2 more minutes?

Mr. CASE. I am sorry we do not have the time. I grant the Senator 1 minute.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I hate very much to go against a President who has been willing to make tough choices in foreign affairs, as President Carter has in the cases of Panama and the Middle East—choices that have been necessary, even though they go against popular opinion. If there were any way at all that I could vote with the administration on this matter, I would. For me, Mr. President, it is a matter of conscience; and my conscience says to vote to continue the embargo.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Massachusetts.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, I shall oppose the effort today to lift the partial embargo on U.S. military assistance for Turkey. My decision to do so is based on a belief that such an action, coming at this time, would not contribute to the search for stability on the southeastern flank of NATO and a just resolution of outstanding differences between Greece, Cyprus, and Turkey, and respective ethnic communities.

There are no easy decisions on this matter. U.S. interests demand that we do everything reasonable to maintain effective alliance relationships with both Greece and Turkey. Those interests also demand that our actions be consonant with our values and ideals. The dilemma we face is that past actions of those with whom we desire close relationships have established certain, I hope, temporary incompatibilities between our alliance-related interests and those directly tied to our national value system. In such a situation, we cannot hope to find a completely satisfactory solution. What we must seek is the course of action that will minimize the damage to our interests as much as possible.

There is, I believe, no one in this body who desires to alienate Turkey from the United States. That has never been the purpose of the embargo. Yet, there are many of us who have been convinced that the embargo was and is necessary to indicate to the involved parties that relations with the United States must be predicated upon certain principles and when such principles are violated, as was the case regarding Turkish use of U.S. supplied equipment in the military action on Cyprus, we, as a nation founded on respect for the "rule of law," are compelled to express our displeasure in a forceful manner.

There is a desire on the part of many of us who continue to support the embargo at this time to see it ultimately lifted. But, we recognize that were we to lift it under the wrong conditions or at the wrong time, the net result would likely be an exacerbation rather than an alleviation of the problems to which it is addressed.

I believe that this is the wrong time to lift the embargo for several reasons. First, thousands of Turkish troops continue to be entrenched on Cyprus. They are an intimidating force that inevitably makes Turkish and Turkish-Cypriot actions and policies appear coercive in nature. An ending of the embargo while such an intimidating military presence exists on Cyprus would inevitably be interpreted on the island and elsewhere as U.S. acquiescence, however reluctant, to a coercive Turkish posture. It matters not that such would not be the intent of a lifting of the embargo; the perception would be as I describe it. Such a perception would fan the flames of anti-Americanism in Greece and on Cyprus and could very well set in motion events that could lead to irreparable harm in our relations with both countries.

Second, during the past week, both the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot sides have tabled proposals designed to break the deadlock, at least in terms of getting the parties back to the negotiating table. I believe the sensible course of action for the United States is to allow a sufficient length of time to pass for the assessment of these proposals and for possible initiatives from the international community before taking any unilateral action on its own. There are times in international affairs when studied inaction is a wise tactic.

Third, many issues regarding human rights are involved in the Cyprus controversy. The administration has elevated concern for such rights to a preeminent position in U.S. foreign policy. It would be a fundamental mistake to take an action that would raise serious doubts about the strength of our commitment to the human rights effort. Lifting the embargo at a time when there are many unanswered questions regarding "human rights" on Cyprus would be such a mistake.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 4 minutes have expired.

Mr. BROOKE. Will the Senator yield 1 additional minute?

Mr. CASE. I yield.

Mr. BROOKE. Only when a serious attempt is made by the Turkish authorities regarding resettlement of refugees to ancestral homelands and there is a good faith accounting for those whose fate is unknown, could the United States conclude that human rights issues are being addressed in a serious and substantive enough manner to contemplate a total lifting of the embargo.

Mr. President, even though I do not believe conditions are such as to permit the United States to lift the embargo at this time, I fully support continued close associations with Greece, Cyprus, and Turkey and hope that events in the immediate future will permit us to place those associations on a firmer basis than at present. Positive action regarding further removal of the Turkish military presence and a good faith effort to alleviate the physical and mental distress of those who have been dispossessed would do much to promote substantive negotiations which in turn would call for serious consideration of the embargo question. Some movement has taken place. We will be well advised to refrain at this time from unilateral action that promises only to widen the gulf between the involved parties, jeopardize our relations with Greece and Cyprus, and reduce our ability to influence events. The embargo should remain in place at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE. I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. President, the substance of my remarks on this occasion is simple. It is, first, to express my admiration for the junior Senator from Maryland, (Mr. SARBANES) who has brought to this debate a wealth of experience and commitment acquired here and in the other body.

I would address myself to this question: What is realism, what is toughmindedness in this matter? In so doing, I do not seek to improve upon the case that has been made for the maintenance of the current law. The so-called embargo on American military assistance to Turkey has already been amended, such that the embargo amounts to a ceiling of $175 million per annum. I should think, therefore, that the proper question—the practical question—is whether that ceiling ought to be raised, and if so by how much.

Those of us who support the existing restrictions on military assistance to Turkey do so because we feel it important that the arms transfer policies of the United States remain associated with this fundamental principle: That U.S. arms ought not to be used for purposes other than genuine self-defense. Whatever the symbolic connotations of the current ceiling on military aid to Turkey, the very symbolism of that measure—as a disapproval and a disavowal of Turkish action—outweighs any other.

There seems to be general agreement that Turkey's Cyprus policy does not yet comport with the principles of our arms transfer statutes. Thus, to announce that we will abandon the attempt to apply those principles to Turkey is such a dangerous precedent. It would convey the impression that in a test of wills with the United States over important points of principle, it is the United States that will acquiesce. It would convey, further, the impression that American foreign policy is departing from its traditional political and ethical underpinnings and has instead become one solely of putatively realistic strategic calculation.

I find, Mr. President, a disturbing tendency to dismiss questions of the political and philosophical content of policy as somehow unrealistic. One finds a certain appeal in being toughminded—to the dismissal of deeper issues. And yet it strikes me that this matter of the future of Cyprus speaks directly to America's image of itself as a great power. It is precisely our willingness to incur a strategic cost as the price of principle which defines the unique character of our policy. And that same willingness to bear these costs is the quality which acquires for us deep allegiances and profound respect around the world.

In almost every difficult foreign policy decision—in almost every issue that we will be called upon to examine during the course of debate on the military assistance bill—there is a not dissimilar question: Where do the axes of proper realism and proper idealism intersect? I suggest, Mr. President, that in this case it is in continued adherence to the principle that American arms are provided for self-defense.

It is the mark of a great power that it can have choice in foreign policy. Those who would seek a foreign policy based on morality must accept that only a nation able to make choices and willing to do so can, in any meaningful sense, speak of a moral basis for policy. It is that basis which has commanded not only the respect of the world but the support of the American people. It is on the judgment of the American people that a realistic approach must be made to the issue on which we will vote this afternoon.

Today, our deliberations concern the eastern Mediterranean, but surely the issue is the same in the Middle East, in northeast Asia, in southern Africa. And, if the details of the Greece-Turkey-Cyprus relationship are perhaps more complicated than other international issues, if the Cyprus problem seems more intractable, all the more will we gain and hold the allegiance of people around the world if the Senate remains firm in support of its original position on Turkish behavior on Cyprus.

A fair solution to the problems of Cyprus must remain central to our policy. We must continue to exert such pressures as we can. I do not pretend that this will be without cost, or even without risk. I am confident however that the risks are on the right side, on the side of traditional American concerns, on the side of a proper realism in international affairs. For a free and independent Cyprus must remain an important goal of American foreign policy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Who yields time? The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I yield 7 minutes to the Senator from Virginia to come out of my time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, conflicts on the Island of Cyprus, and among the nations concerned with Cyprus, pose problems which are particularly difficult for the United States and for Western Europe.

One of the most tragic aspects of the Cyprus issue, from the point of view of our Nation, is the deep division which it has fostered between Greece and Turkey.

Both Greece and Turkey are friends of the United States.

Both are important to the defense of free Europe.

Nearly 4 years ago, following the invasion of Cyprus by Turkey, the Congress banned further military aid to Turkey. I supported the imposition of this embargo, and I remain convinced that the Congress acted properly in 1974.

Today the issue before the Senate is whether this embargo should be lifted or continued.

As the Senate considers this question, I think it is helpful to review the background of events which have led to the present situation.

What prompted the Turkish invasion of Cyprus was a Greek Cypriot coup which overthrew the Makarios government in July of 1974.

The coup was initiated by Greek officers units of the Cypriot national guard and Greek Cypriot factions who supported uniting Cyprus with Greece.

Turkey, which was a coguarantor of the independence of Cyprus, was greatly concerned that the new government would move Cyprus toward union with Greece.

Turkey approached Britain, a coguarantor of the independence of Cyprus. When Britain failed to take any action, Turkey invaded Cyprus on July 20. Turkey justified its actions on the basis of the 1960 Treaty of Guarantee and the Treaty of Alliance between Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey.

The invasion resulted in the fall of the new Cyprus Government and the fall of the ruling military junta in Greece, which had supported the coup.

Peace negotiations were quickly initiated, but when they deadlocked on August 14 the Turkish forces on Cyprus expanded the territory under their control to approximately 40 percent.

As a result of the Turkish invasion, roughly one-third of the island's Greek population was displaced from the Turkish zone into the Greek-held territory.

In protest against alleged American inaction, Greece announced its military withdrawal from NATO and subsequently its abrogation of existing bilateral Greek-United States agreements respecting military basing facilities.

On December 31, 1974, the Congress imposed an arms embargo on Turkey because of its use of U.S. military equipment in the invasion of Cyprus.

Turkey argued that its use of American-supplied equipment was not a violation of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1962, because section 2302 of that act permitted the use of such equipment in "collective or regional arrangements." Turkey argued that as a coguarantor of the independence of Cyprus its actions were lawful and appropriate.

The embargo has now been in effect for almost 4 years—and sadly, little progress has been made toward a settlement of the Cyprus issue.

Turkish forces still occupy a substantial portion of Cyprus and thousands of refugees are still homeless.

At the same time the strength and readiness of NATO forces on the southern flank has declined. Greece has withdrawn from the military structure of NATO. And U.S. military forces have been denied access to bases in both Greece and Turkey.

In general, things are in pretty bad shape.

Almost everyone agrees on that. Where the disagreement comes is on what actions will be likely to bring about an improvement. Will Turkey be more likely to compromise on the Cyprus issue if the embargo is lifted? Will Greek-United States relations deteriorate even further if the embargo is lifted? What effects will a continuation of the embargo have on the military readiness of the southern flank?

These are all important questions to which I have given a great deal of thought. On balance, I have concluded that lifting the embargo will provide a better chance of improving the situation than keeping it in force.

I have discussed this matter with President Carter, and he believes it is more likely that Turkey will be willing to make more meaningful compromises on the Cyprus issue if the embargo is lifted.

The widespread consequences of the Cyprus conflict have had the effect of harming NATO security, weakening Greek, Turkish, and American capabilities in the Mediterranean region.

This weakening of Western capabilities has taken place at the same time that Soviet capabilities in the region have improved. To me, this is cause for alarm.

Turkey is an important member of NATO. With the second-largest standing army in NATO, it has a major role in the defense of NATO's southern flank.

The military readiness of Turkish forces has deteriorated as a result of the embargo and has thus weakened the whole region.

Another problem caused by the continuing embargo is that it encourages Turkey to move toward a more neutralist position.

Of course, it is correct that the law limits use of American-supplied military equipment to self-defense, internal security, and meeting certain regional commitments.

As I stated earlier, I think our Government acted properly when it originally imposed the arms embargo on Turkey, which action I supported.

However, I think that 3½ years of banning military assistance to Turkey constitute sufficient action by the United States to deter subsequent violations.

We should keep in mind, too, the suffering of the people of Cyprus. Surely that suffering will more likely be relieved if negotiations can break the longstanding impasse on the future of the unhappy island.

In turn, it seems probable that negotiations are more likely to occur if the arms embargo against Turkey is removed.

Obviously, there can be no assurance that this is so. But it is demonstrable that present policy—the policy of embargo—has produced no movement toward settlement of the complex political problems of Cyprus.

It is time for a new policy.

This new policy may or may not succeed. But, at least, it should get things off dead center. Should the removal of the arms embargo not prove helpful in resolving the conflicts of Cyprus and strengthening the southern flank of NATO, the Congress retains the power to act at any time to reimpose the arms ban or to take any other action which it feels is wise in the light of new circumstances.

For one, I am anxious for an appropriate solution to the Cyprus problem. If the embargo on Turkey is lifted, that country assumes an obligation to provide progress toward a fair Cyprus settlement.

Mr. DANFORTH and Mr. RIEGLE addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. President, I rise today to strongly oppose the lifting of the arms embargo against Turkey. This policy reversal by President Carter is not in the strategic interests of the United States and I hope it will be rejected by the Senate.

We all know the tragic and dismal facts concerning the Turkish occupation of Cyprus. To date, the Turkish Government has done nothing to end this illegal occupation and help construct a reasonable settlement that can ease the massive human suffering taking place on Cyprus.

The Turkish invasion and continuing occupation of Cyprus violates the U.N. Charter, violates the charter of NATO, and openly and directly violates U.S. law as well.

The arms embargo by the United States was and is a fully justified response by our Nation. Yet the Nixon/Ford administration and now I am sad to say, the Carter administration have never fully implemented the embargo. In fact, the executive branch of our Government, in my judgment, has deliberately destroyed the effectiveness of the embargo by refusing to implement it faithfully, fully, and forcefully. That lack of good-faith implementation, in my judgment, has been improper.

The answer to that is not to remove it altogether, which is what is proposed. We see the results of a failure to implement the embargo effectively in terms of what has taken place on Cyprus itself, the adverse effect on the people there—families split apart, people driven from their homes and land, continuing suffering, with no end in sight.

Frankly, I was astonished to see the administration do a 180 turn on this issue in light of comments made by the President just short months ago. What the administration is proposing, is a reward for aggression, because that is exactly what this will be if we choose to set aside this arms embargo at this time.

What a terrible object lesson that would be for the rest of the world, especially at a time when the United States is attempting to champion the cause of human rights. It seems to me that to set aside the arms embargo now would be an open invitation to other countries to follow Turkey's example with whatever disputes they may have with whatever neighboring countries they are involved with.

I think it would be a tragic mistake for the United States to send that message around the world. I am very disturbed that our administration has decided to make this policy reversal.

It was in my own hometown of Detroit, on May 12, 1976, that Jimmy Carter said:

> We would be negligent of the moral issues and courting longer-range disaster if we fail to couple the improvement in relations with Turkey with increased fair progress on the Cyprus issue.

I am sorry to say that I do not see any measure of progress on this issue. I frankly doubt that the administration has seen any, either.

I think we need the arms embargo and I think we need an administration that will carry it out with determination. I hope the Senate will decide not to surrender to the illegal actions of Turkey and vote against the lifting of this arms embargo today.

I thank the Senator very much for yielding.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield 3 minutes on the bill to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HODGES. Will the Senator from Missouri yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. DANFORTH. Yes, I do.

Mr. HODGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Lynn Boyd of my staff may have the privilege of the floor during the debate on this measure.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the President yield for a request?

Mr. DANFORTH. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Bob Paquin of Senator LEAHY's staff be permitted the privilege of the floor during consideration of this bill.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I make the same request for Mark Edelman of my staff and for Tom Carter and John Bacher of Senator HAYAKAWA's staff.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the arms embargo on Turkey has backfired and should be terminated. It has had the opposite of its intended effect. It has served as a barrier to a just settlement of the Cyprus conflict. It has had a strongly adverse effect on America's national security interests and on the strength and effectiveness of NATO.

A careful analysis has led me to the conclusion that terminating the embargo would serve the defense interests of the United States and Western Europe and would increase the possibility of ending the stalemate on Cyprus.

The military significance of Turkey cannot be exaggerated. Turkey shares a 1,500-mile frontier with the Soviet Union and serves as a barrier between Russia and the Middle East, Africa, and the Persian Gulf. In the event of war, a strong Turkey could deny Soviet access to these areas. Moreover, Turkey is an essential partner in the southern flank of NATO. Supplying more ground forces to NATO than any other nation, Turkey helps tie down 25 Warsaw Pact divisions plus pact aircraft and naval units.

As a direct result of the arms embargo, Turkey shut down American intelligence-gathering bases in 1975. The intelligence installations permitted us to gather vital information on Soviet nuclear, missile, and military systems. If these intelligence facilities remain closed, new generations of Soviet space and missile systems could reach advanced development without our complete understanding of their workings and potential threat. Moreover, a continued shutdown would impair our ability to monitor Soviet compliance with existing and future strategic arms agreements. The Turks have clearly stated that they would allow these bases to reopen if the embargo is lifted.

Historically, the Turkish military has been equipped primarily by the United States. The adverse effect of the embargo on the Turkish military capability has been severe. With little new equipment or replacement parts available since 1975, 40 percent of their tanks and 50 percent of their aircraft have become inoperable. Training has been sharply curtailed. Modernization efforts have been halted. Turkey is no longer capable of meeting minimum NATO standards for training and readiness.

This deterioration in NATO's Southern flank has been viewed with alarm by General Haig, the commander of NATO, and by his predecessors, Generals Goodpaster, Lemnitzer, Gruenther, Norstad, and Ridgway. All these generals and our Joint Chiefs of Staff have urged that the embargo be removed in order to strengthen NATO. Every member of the North Atlantic Alliance, except for Greece, also believes that lifting of the embargo is essential for the security of the alliance.

When the embargo was imposed in 1975, it was hoped that Turkey would be pressured into withdrawing from occupied territory on Cyprus. This has not happened. On May 22, Turkish Prime Minister Ecevit stated that his government does not "consider it a right thing to link the Cyprus issue and Turk or Greek problems to Turkish/American relations." The American embargo, he said, will have no effect on his negotiating position.

Mr. President, I have the greatest respect for Greece and the strongest desire to foster our longstanding close relationship with that country. However, the embargo is a policy which has been tried and which has been found not to work. It has not brought progress toward a just settlement of the Cyprus problem. It has had no positive effect on the position of Turkey. It has seriously weakened the security interests of the United States, and it has threatened the effectiveness of the Southern flank of NATO. When a policy has failed and when it proves injurious to the interests of the United States, it should be terminated.

The amendment which I support not only lifts the arms embargo on Turkey, but it also affirms that the Congress continues to believe that peace in the eastern Mediterranean must be achieved through "internationally established peaceful procedures." It provides that the United States "shall strongly oppose any attempt to resolve disputes through force or threat of force," and that "the continuing presence of a major Turkish force (on Cyprus) is inconsistent with the legitimate status of Cyprus as a sovereign republic." In addition, the President is required to report to the Congress every 60 days on progress toward reaching a settlement of the dispute and to certify that each request for economic or military assistance to Greece, Turkey, and Cyprus contribute to a settlement.

By ending the embargo and enumerating principles this country should pursue to achieve an end to the conflict, the amendment represents a significant step forward to the goal of strengthening NATO and obtaining a just peace on Cyprus and between two allies.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. CASE. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank my good friend from New Jersey. I shall probably not even speak the 2 minutes. I want just to make a couple of points.

Almost 3 years ago to the month, the U.S. Senate passed S. 846, the Mansfield-Scott bill, that allowed a temporary continuation of military aid to Turkey.

I, along with 40 of my colleagues, voted for S. 846, because we hoped Turkey would negotiate in good faith, and work toward an immediate resolution of the Cyprus problem. This temporary continuation of aid was based on the premise that the United States, for both national and international security reasons. would exercise every possible effort to maintain both Greece's and Turkey's participation as cooperative members of the NATO alliance.

In retrospect, we initially cut off aid to Turkey to exert influence on her Cyprus negotiations. When we agreed to S. 846 in May of 1975, we were authorizing the President to report every 30 days to Congress on the progress of negotiations between Greece and Turkey. In response to our initiative, we assumed Turkey would comply with our mutual goal. It is obvious that neither of the above actions have been fruitful—there is still no settlement in sight.

My recollection is that that was a very close vote. In fact, I think it was decided by one vote that we would partially lift the embargo and permit the President to report to us everv 30 days on the progress that was so optimistically predicted in terms of the relationship between the Turks, who had occupied Cyprus, and the Cypriots. The whole reason for that seems to me to be the same reason proposed today by those who want to totally lift the embargo: namely, that Turkey, for some reason of their own internally, would not negotiate so long as there was an embargo. Now, it seems to me that, we need not go through the litany of what has occurred in those 3 years other than to say that it is obvious that the 30-day reports by our Presidents from that point in time have indicated little or no progress. In the meantime, although Turkey has not received every kind of military assistance that she wants, she has received substantial millions—in fact, in the hundreds of millions of dollars—in military assistance.

Mr. DOMENICI. May I have 1 additional minute, I ask my friend from New Jersey.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. CASE. I will yield on the bill.

Mr. DOMENICI. Do I have an additional minute?

Mr. CASE. Yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Senator.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield 1 minute?

Mr. CASE. Yes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. I think we did what our national leadership and what the leaders of Turkey wanted us to do then and nothing has happened.

I believe it is sheer folly to assume by lifting the embargo at this point that anything will occur that will benefit the posture of Turkey versus Greece, or Greece versus Turkey, or that the United States will be benefited over the long run in terms of NATO and its allies.

I do not know what will be asked of us next in an effort to resolve this dispute. I think there are far too many negatives in terms of precedent, in terms of the law, that might have long-range implications for us to risk the lifting now when the partial lifting had little or no effect.

I think it is up to Turkey to solve its own internal problems. When they do that, we will be able to lift the embargo.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. DOMENICI. I ask for 2 more minutes.

Mr. CASE. Two more minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Senator from New Jersey.

I do not want to further aggravate Turkey to the point where she decides to terminate her relation with NATO; nothing could be further from my mind. However, our temporary resumption of aid has not deterred her from working closely with the Soviet Union, and I question whether or not we can justify further arms agreements when past efforts to appease her have been ineffectual.

We are aware that Turkey violated the terms of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 by using U.S. arms to attack Cyprus. The administration repeatedly emphasizes the role this Nation must play in seeking compliance with human rights objectives of the International Security Assistance and Arms Export Control Act; Turkey has consistently violated these provisions. Additionally, Turkey's invasion of Cyprus violated the principles of our NATO charter which states that international disputes will be settled by peaceful means, and participants will refrain from threat or use of force.

We seek normalization of relations with Turkey. We recognize the international security interests are of paramount importance. However, I firmly believe it is time we demand a return of our confidence. The Cyprus conflict can, and must, be brought to an immediate negotiated settlement. Before we decide to permanently lift the arms embargo, I do not think it is too much to ask that Turkey accept her responsibility to her friends. We all have a stake in the outcome. I believe this complex issue can be resolved. I hope the Senate will reject the lifting of the embargo until Turkey meets her obligations.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's 2 minutes have expired.

The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE. I yield 7 minutes on the bill to the Senator from Maryland.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. President, it is important in considering this embargo to review history for just a moment.

The embargo was imposed by the Congress in the fall and winter of 1974 in order to implement law that was already on the books and that was not applied by the administration.

We sought to impose it because of the second Turkish military adventure on Cyprus in mid-August of 1974, when, with the parties having arrived at talks, with the United Nations having assumed jurisdiction on Cyprus, with the parties at Geneva engaged in peace talks, subsequent to the first military action in mid-July, when all of that had been stopped, Turkish forces launched a major invasion, took over 40 percent of the island of Cyprus, created 200,000 refugees, one-third of the island's population—in this country it would be 70 million people—one-third of a nation became displaced and were refugees for no provocation.

It was as a consequence of that military action that it was insisted that existing American law which said that military weapons supplied to other countries were to be used for defensive purposes had been violated and that further arms should not be sent to Turkey.

No one has really challenged that those arms were used aggressively.

It was necessary for the Congress to invoke the embargo in order that existing law which had been on the books, as the Senator from Missouri reviewed earlier in this debate, for decades be enforced.

Now, that law carries out very important principles and we ought not delude ourselves that they are not important and that they are being forsaken here today if, in fact, the embargo is lifted. It involves a rule of law. It involves a question of human rights, very basic questions of human rights. It involves a question of the lessons other countries will learn with respect to the use of American arms and their ability to engage in aggressive actions. It involves what we stand for as a Nation in terms of principles we seek to implement, the sort of peace we seek to obtain in the world.

It comes back to, what do we stand for as a country? Why do we have these security alliances if they are not, in fact, to deter aggression?

We now have the argument stood on its head that in order to hold together an alliance designed for security, for peaceful purposes, we should overlook that aggression committed by a member of the alliance. It stands its purpose on its very head.

Furthermore, it has been argued that the embargo has not worked. Let me address that point.

The administration has undercut the embargo. In the previous administration, the Secretary of State was opposed to the embargo. It was constantly being said, "Hold on, we'll reverse the Congress and lift the embargo."

The current administration came in on a commitment to the embargo, on a commitment which linked resuming a normal military relationship between the United States and Turkey, which linked that normal relationship with progress on the island of Cyprus in terms of achieving a settlement.

That linkage was there. That linkage preserved, therefore, the principle we are talking about.

We have made exceptions to the embargo in terms of arms which have been sent, in the name of realism and pragmatism, in the name of the carrot and the stick, to induce a response.

There has been no response. At no point to this date has there been concrete action—concrete action—by the Turkish forces to return any of the fruits of their aggression.

Proposals were talked about, yes, but no concrete action in a situation in which they occupy 40 percent of the country.

It is said they have been punished enough. What does that mean, punished enough? Arms have been flowing.

Now, they say, lift the embargo even though none of the fruits of the aggression have been returned.

Why is not the lesson to draw from that not only with respect to Turkey, but with respect to other countries as well? Why is not the lesson to draw that if you just hold on long enough to the fruits of your aggression, just hold onto them and onto them and onto them, eventually the United States will relinquish and you will realize the consequences of your aggressive actions.

We wrote to the President about this in February and I ask unanimous consent that letter be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., February 8, 1978.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The recent trip by Secretary Vance to Turkey and Greece, following a visit to those two countries and to Cyprus by United Nations Secretary-General Waldheim, underscores the importance of achieving a just solution to the question of Cyprus. Such a solution is important for Cyprus itself; for American relations with Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey; and for the relationships of those countries with one another.

As you know, we have supported your approach to this matter which, in contrast to the Ford-Kissinger view, recognizes that the re-establishment of the military arms supply relationship between the United States and Turkey requires a just settlement of the Cyprus question. That relationship was upset because of Turkey's use of American arms for aggressive purposes on Cyprus, in contravention of our law.

We believe the linkage you have established between the supply of arms to Turkey and a solution on Cyprus is basic to the principled conduct of American foreign policy which you have urged both before and since assuming office. We understand that for tactical reasons you have chosen not to stress this linkage publicly, but we recall, and have reposed confidence in, your direct assurance at our White House meeting with you that a linkage does indeed exist.

In light of our shared objectives, we feel we must bring to your attention our deep concern over what seems to be a pattern of action on the part of members of your Administration in the handling of the Cyprus question. These actions threaten to undermine the principles to which you have committed your Administration. Furthermore, as a practical matter, these actions make it far more difficult to achieve a just settlement on Cyprus.

We trust that the brief summary that follows of some of those actions will enable you to understand better the basis for our apprehension.

The Administration's first arms request for Turkey, submitted by the State Department last March, sought a level of military assistance many times the level supplied by the previous Administration. This request, you will recall, engendered strong opposition and was ultimately reduced substantially. Nevertheless, Turkey received a 40 percent increased in military sales (from $125 to $175 million) although it had taken no positive action on Cyprus. The hope that this significant increase would serve as an inducement to such positive action on the part of Turkey proved empty.

The Department of Defense has used the NATO Maintenance and Supply Agency (NAMSA), located in Luxembourg, to supply Turkey with weapons beyond the restrictions in American law limiting the amount of military sales. Such circumvention of the military sales limitation makes a mockery of joint Executive-Congressional actions and undermines pressure on Turkey for a Cyprus settlement.

The United States Ambassador to Turkey recently declared in a news interview in Ankara that "the embargo doesn't serve any American interest," that "without changing the law [which prohibits United States arms to aggressor countries] I would like to find some way around it," and that "my only hope is that sanity will prevail and it [the embargo] will be removed." High-ranking U.S. military officers have made similar statements in the past year and have thereby encouraged Turkish intransigence with regard to a just settlement on Cyprus. Obviously, the arms limitation cannot be effective when the Turkish government hears high American officials publicly contradict your own position on this matter.

In an effort to avoid offending Turkey, the United States Mission to the United Nations voted with a very small minority last fall to weaken a General Assembly resolution which called for action on Cyprus. Moreover, the State Department recently submitted a report on human rights in Cyprus which was an unfair and inacurrate report of the tragic events on that island.

The State Department's proposed military aid request for the next fiscal year reduces aid to Greece while maintaining the aid level for Turkey and thereby suggests a basic shift in Administration policy. Repeated press reports that Administration officials are preparing to urge Congress to approve the four year, $1 billion Turkish defense agreement without regard to a resolution of the Cyprus question only heighten our concern.

Our restrained comment in the face of each of these developments has largely been due to the assurances we have received, from you and your representatives, that this Administration is committed to pursuing the policy of linkage. We have, therefore, publicly affirmed the Administration's good faith and urged that you and the Secretary of State be given the time to implement this policy.

Today, we are deeply concerned that actions like those set out above may be placing the Administration on a different path whereby Congress will be asked to approve the Turkish DCA without a just settlement on Cyprus or whereby other approaches will be employed to break the linkage you have expressed to us. Such a changed course would have the most grave consequences for the integrity and principled conduct of our foreign policy and the achievement of a just solution on Cyprus. To reestablish the arms relationship with Turkey without a redress of the aggression on Cyprus would demean the rule of law, contradict your strong commitment to human rights and weaken your call for proper controls on U.S. arms exports. Such action would also erode support for democratic, pro-Western governments in Greece and Cyprus and make virtually impossible the achievement of normal relationships in the eastern Mediterranean.

In this crucial period, citizens in this country and throughout the world look to you, Mr. President, for principled leadership to bring justice and peace to Cyprus and to the eastern Mediterranean.

We stand ready to assist in this endeavor and would welcome the opportunity to discuss this matter with you at a time convenient to you.

Respectfully,

THOMAS F. EAGLETON,
United States Senate.
PAUL S. SARBANES,
United States Senate.
JOHN BRADEMAS,
BENJAMIN S. ROSENTHAL,

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, this administration has taken a number of actions which have really undermined the embargo.

In other words, we have sent signals to the Turks that if they just hold on, there is a good chance the embargo will be lifted without forthcoming action on Cyprus to redress the aggression, and that is the issue involved here.

The amendment presented by the chairman and the substitute, which has been talked about, both involve the same fundamental principle, and that is the question of lifting the embargo.

Now, the administration undercut it in a number of ways. Despite its statements of support, controlling U.S. arms sales abroad, it has attempted to significantly increase the amount of military aid going to Turkey. Despite its statements in the rule of law, NAMSA, a little-known agency in Luxembourg that someone called the Department of Defense boutique——

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield me 3 more minutes?

Mr. CASE. Yes; 2 minutes on the bill.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Senator.

It has been used to circumvent the restrictions on aid to Turkey.

Despite the administration's statements in support of human rights, it has turned a blind eye to the massive ongoing violations of human rights taking place on the island of Cyprus.

Despite its statements in support of the embargo, leading officials of the administration have declared their opposition to the embargo. In January of this year, when the administration was committed to a policy in support of the embargo, the American Ambassador to Turkey declared in a news interview that the embargo does not serve any American interest and without changing the law he would like to find some way around it.

Obviously, arms limitations cannot be effective when the Turkish Government hears high American officials publicly contradict our Government's own position on the matter.

The contention that the embargo be lifted because it has not worked stands logic on its head.

The embargo has not worked because the administration has been unwilling or unable to make it work. So, pragmatically, it has not been used to work; and if it is lifted, it will constitute a condoning by the United States of the aggression which took place, because it comes in the context of being lifted without a single concrete action to remedy or to rectify that aggression, with all the fruits of the aggression continuing to be realized by the aggressor.

We should not let our country be placed in the position of condoning the aggression which occurred on the Island of Cyprus. We should not lift this embargo.

I urge the Members of the Senate to vote against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CASE. I suggest we vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are the 3 minutes remaining on the amendment yielded back?

Mr. CASE. I yield back my time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I understand I have 1 minute. I yield it to the majority leader.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1492

(Purpose: To provide for a policy concerning Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey)

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. McGOVERN, Mr. BENTSEN, and Mr. CHAFEE, I now send to the desk an amendment to the amendment by Mr. SPARKMAN and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the amendment is in order.

The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from West Virginia (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD), for himself and others, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1492.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the language proposed to be inserted by the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN) (UP-1491), insert the following:

"(b) The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by inserting, after section 620B, the following new section:

'Sec. 620C. U.S. Policy and Procedure Regarding Cyprus, Greece and Turkey.

'(a) Congress finds that

'(1) events in Cyprus in 1974, precipitated by a coup sponsored by the Greek military dictatorship and resulting in an intervention by Turkish military forces, created an international problem within the authority and responsibility of the United Nations;

'(2) given the presence in Cyprus of a United Nations peacekeeping force mandated to prevent further inter-communal violence, and given the inter-communal negotiating process established under the aegis of the United Nations Secretary General, the continuing presence of a major Turkish force is inconsistent with the legitimate status of Cyprus as a sovereign republic;

'(3) United States policy respecting this problem should continue to accord high priority to supporting the implementation of United Nations resolutions regarding Cyprus and United Nations efforts to restore full Cypriot sovereignty through the negotiation of a just settlement;

'(4) U.S. limitations on arms transfers to Turkey enacted in 1975 represented a strong American desire to support such efforts and to affirm basic U.S. foreign assistance statutes;

'(5) although events in Cyprus have caused bitterness among the people of Cyprus, Turkey, and Greece, the United States continues to have a strong interest in maintaining stable and sound relations with each of these nations;

'(6) the maintenance of such positive relations will inevitably depend on the achievement of a just solution on Cyprus.

'(b) Regarding such solution, Congress finds that—

'(1) the guidelines for inter-communal talks agreed to in Nicosia in February 1977—setting forth the common goal of an independent, sovereign, nonaligned, bicommunal Federal Republic of Cyprus—continue to provide a sound basis for the negotiation of a just settlement in that nation;

'(2) serious negotiations, under United Nations auspices, will be necessary to achieve detailed agreement on, and implementation of, constitutional and territorial terms within such guidelines;

'(3) the United States should actively support efforts to achieve such a just solution, providing full protection for the human rights of all Cypriots.

'(c) United States policy regarding Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey shall be directed toward the restoration of a stable and peaceful atmosphere in the Eastern Mediterranean region and shall therefore be governed by the following principles:

'(1) the United States shall actively support the resolution of differences through internationally established peaceful procedures, shall encourage all parties to avoid provocative actions, and shall strongly oppose any attempt to resolve disputes through force or threat of force;

'(2) United States arms transfers to Greece and Turkey shall be made solely for defensive purposes and to sustain their strength as North Atlantic Treaty Organization allies, shall be designed to insure that the present balance of military strength among countries in the region is preserved, and shall not signify a lessening of the United States commitment to a just solution on Cyprus;

'(3) the achievement of such a solution shall remain a central concern of United States policy in the region; and

'(4) because future United States relations with the nations concerned must be shaped according to progress toward such a solution, the President and Congress shall continually review such progress and shall determine United States policy in the region, including United States economic and military assistance, accordingly.

'(d) To facilitate such review, the President shall, within 60 days after the enactment of this section and at the end of each succeeding 60-day period, transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, a report on progress made during such period toward the conclusion of a negotiated solution of the Cyprus problem. Such transmissions shall include any relevant reports prepared by the Secretary General of the United Nations for the Security Council.

'(e) Upon enactment of this Act, the President shall, with any request for funds for military or economic assistance under this Act, or credits or guaranties under the Arms Export Control Act, for countries named in this section, transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate his certification (with a full explanation thereof) that the goals set forth in this section have been substantially achieved or that such assistance would contribute to their achievement. Such ceritfication shall also accompany any notification of anticipated arms sales to such countries submitted for Congressional consideration under the provisions of section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act.'

(C) Notwithstanding section 26 of this Act, subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall take effect upon the date of its enactment.

(D) On page 26, line 20, strike out $674,-300,000 and insert in lieu thereof $677,800,-000; and on line 23, strike out $2,085,200,000 and insert in lieu thereof $2,120,200,000."

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are 15 minutes to a side on this amendment. Who yields time?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I designate 5 minutes to Mr. BENTSEN, 5 minutes to Mr. CHAFEE, and 5 minutes to Mr. McGOVERN, of the 15 minutes under my control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, the arms embargo against Turkey is now 3½ years old. It has not worked and there is no good reason to suppose that it will work as intended in the future.

If that were not bad enough, the embargo has been counterproductive for the United States, for Cyprus, for Greece, and for Turkey.

We have been told by some that because an offer was made on Varosha, we should not do anything about the embargo now; let us delay it; let us wait and see how that works out. But the offer was made on Varosha because the parties know we are debating this issue today; because they know we are about to vote on it.

At first, the Turkish proposal was rejected out of hand by the Greek Cypriots. As of today, we are told they are making a counter offer.

We have decided, very wisely, that we would set aside the 1976 compact; that we would not go on with that; that we would not make a 4-year commitment; that we would do it year by year, as we reevaluated what kind of progress was being made on Cyprus.

This amendment was carefully structured to accomplish that objective.

If we look back over the last 3½ years, what have we accomplished with the embargo? We have poisoned bilateral relations with Turkey. A key NATO ally.

We have sacrificed access to important intelligence installations located on Turkish territory.

We have created real doubts in Turkey about our reliability as a friend and about our commitment to the NATO alliance.

We have hastened the deterioration of Turkish military capability and inhibited our ability to redress the situation.

We have seen a deterioration of our security position in the eastern Mediterranean.

We have frozen the situation on Cyprus by demanding that the Turks knuckle under to our pressure.

Mr. President, we have done a lot of things for a lot of nations around the world. I think we should take an international outlook and we should help other nations. But we also must remember the best interests of our own country; and our interests lie in the direction of the strongest possible NATO alliance; the strongest possible position in the eastern Mediterranean; and the strongest possible friendship with two very important allies—Greece and Turkey.

Before this amendment, Greece was scheduled to get $140 million in foreign military sales credits. We have raised that now to $175 million, to try to be evenhanded.

When you talk about someone being forthcoming, that applies to both sides. The Greek Cypriots made an offer, a geographic offer, but they were talking about 18 percent to 20 percent of the territory for the Turkish population.

However, we have to remember this: Prior to 1974, the Turkish Cypriots alleged they had 32 percent of the area, because they are essentially farmers, and this was the territory they were occupying at that time. The Turks have made an offer to negotiate in six specific areas with respect to the territory they would be giving up.

Continuation of the arms embargo will make it impossible to repair our bilateral relations with Turkey. It will make it far more difficult for us to work with our allies and help Turkey plan for the future.

Continuation of the embargo could well drive Turkey away from the alliance, with all that would entail for our own security position. It will almost certainly result in the irrevocable loss of intelligence installations on Turkish territory.

Our national interests also lie in the direction of a Cyprus settlement. There is no doubt on this score. The only question—the real question we have been debating today—is whether the embargo helps or hinders progress toward a settlement on Cyprus.

Even proponents of the embargo are hard pressed to suggest that it has worked as intended. Obviously, it has not. They contend, instead, that the embargo has failed because it has not been rigidly enforced. And they suggest more of the same. We could go all the way. We could cut off diplomatic relations with Turkey; we could force them out of NATO. But that does not make sense. They continue to insist on prolonged punishment under rule of law despite the fact that from all available evidence such punishment condemns the people of Cyprus to stalemate and tragedy.

The notion that the arms embargo will be an incentive for Turkish concessions on Cyprus has been thoroughly discredited. We have seen that the very existence of the embargo serves as a barrier to negotiations. I, for one, thought it would do otherwise, and previously supported the embargo. But there are many who have changed their minds through the 3½ years, as they have seen that the embargo will not work. The embargo is a roadblock on the path of peace. It must be removed.

The President of the United States wants the embargo lifted. He has described this as the most important foreign policy issue pending before the Congress, and he is correct. Our NATO allies, with the sole exception of Greece, want it lifted, and they are correct. Six former NATO commanders want it lifted, and they are correct. Over 80 major newspapers in this country have called for lifting the embargo because they have seen that the policy is totally ineffective and contrary to our best interests.

Mr. President, there is no shame in standing up and saying, "here is a policy that seemed right in 1974. We have made our point, but the policy hasn't worked the way we intended. It has outlived its usefulness. It is time to try another approach."

Eliminating the embargo will not open the floodgates of military assistance to Turkey. It does not bind us to a multiyear commitment of the sort envisioned in the defense cooperation agreement. The Turks know we are going to be watching their reaction.

The purpose of lifting the embargo is to remove an obstacle to negotiations on Cyprus and to shore up our security situation in the region.

We can provide no firm guarantee that this new policy will succeed, but we can attest that the old policy—the embargo—has failed. To continue it would be an admission of intellectual bankruptcy.

Lifting the embargo is an overdue initiative that serves our own interests, the strength of the NATO alliance, and the cause of peace on Cyprus.

Mr. President, I urge the adoption of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. McGOVERN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. McGOVERN. I yield.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that John Carbaugh and James P. Lucier, of my staff, have the privilege of the floor during the discussion of this measure and votes thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, the first point I would like Senators to keep in mind before they vote on this amendment is that we really have been using a misnomer when we talk about an embargo against Turkey. There is no embargo in the real sense of the word. What there is is a stigma against Turkey, but they are permitted, regardless of how we vote here this afternoon, $175 million in foreign military sales credit.

So the issue of arms to Turkey is sort of phony. The arms are flowing to Turkey, without regard to how Members of the Senate vote on this so-called embargo today.

What we have had for the last 2 or 3 years are two policies that are neutralizing each other, so that we end up without any clear and meaningful policy at all with regard to these issues that separate Greece, Turkey, and Cyprus.

We have had an administration policy that supports the sale, under military credits, of some $175 million to Turkey.

We have had a congressional policy that says it is an embargo but which permits those arms sales to go forward.

And the result is simply an insult to Turkey that has produced nothing but a stalemate on the question that we should be looking at, and that is the question of how we can best encourage negotiations of the issue of Cyprus.

I have heard Senators who have taken the same position that I have in the past, that the so-called embargo might encourage that negotiating process, argue here in the Chamber that we have not had any progress on negotiations and, therefore, we should continue the policy.

It seems to me just the opposite conclusion should be drawn, that we have been pursuing a course that has produced very little in the way of negotiating success on Cyprus and how that leads us to the conclusion that we should continue that ineffective policy in the future escapes me.

I think that those Senators who have argued the intransigence of the Turks over the last 2 or 3 years are simply making the case for those of us who argue that maybe we should experiment with a different more practical and feasible course.

To whatever extent we have had intransigence on the part of the negotiating parties, the argument should be made that a change in American policy is in order.

What is proposed by the amendment now before us is that instead of two contradictory policies that neutralize each other we have one policy in which Congress and the President agree on a statement of principles and procedures that is going to govern our actions henceforth with regard to Turkey, Greece, and Cyprus, and that that policy should be pointed in the direction of results rather than rhetoric on the question of Cyprus.

Just a matter of information, having conceded the fact that there has been too much intransigence on the part of all sides on this issue for those who are looking for some sign that there could be flexibility on the part of Turkey if we lifted the so-called embargo, I point to the fact that the Turkish Cypriot leader for the first time in recent days has offered the return of some 35,000 Greek Cypriots to the city of Verosha under United Nations supervision. That is the first time that kind of concession has been made, and the Turkish Cypriots have said that will be possible as soon as the intercommunal negotiations take place. He also said that once negotiations get underway the Nicosia airport could be opened to commercial traffic and for whatever it is worth the troop occupation on Cyprus which at one time stood at some 45,000 men is now down to about 25,000.

So there have been some indications that a little more flexibility on our part might encourage a greater degree of flexibility on the part of the Turks.

I just wish to add this final——

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's 5 minutes have expired.

Mr. CHAFEE and Mr. EAGLETON addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, it seems to me that much of the discussion on this subject by the opponents of the amendment is directed toward seeing that there is sufficient punishment for Turkey rather than achieving the objective which is a peaceful settlement in Cyprus. It does not seem to me to do any good to wrap one's self in the terms of principle when we are not achieving the goals that are being sought. It is like the ticket holder on the Titanic who bought passage from London to New York and on a matter of principle he is not going to get off until he gets delivered to New York. And that is the situation we are in.

This is absolutely poisoning the relationship of the United States with its ally Turkey and, as a matter of fact, is producing nothing toward assisting the settlement in the area on the island of Cyprus.

So it seems to me in our best interests of settling that matter let us try something different. What we are doing is not succeeding.

Second, Mr. President, I rebut those who say it does not make any difference to the U.S. interests what is taking place in Turkey, that we are not really losing anything. There has been adequate discussion as to whether NATO is suffering or not. I think that is very clear from the statements of General Hague and from every former living supreme allied commander of NATO.

They all say that the effect on NATO, on Turkey's capacity to operate in NATO has been seriously eroded.

But I wish to direct my remarks to the interests of the United States not solely in NATO but our own direct interests outside of NATO.

As Senators know, we are involved in a very difficult situation with the Soviets now that does not appear to be growing any easier. The SALT negotiations are upon us. The whole matter of verification, the whole subject of collecting adequate intelligence on the Soviets is a very pressing problem. It is very clear, Mr. President, that "the intelligence derived from U.S. bases that we had in Turkey was extensive, important, and often unique," and that is from Admiral Inman, head of the National Security Agency. And he said: "Unless the U.S. capability is restored, namely, the bases in Turkey, we will continue to lose this valuable information and U.S. ability to counter Soviet weapons systems will continue to be hampered."

Of course, the Director of Central Intelligence says the same thing: "Some of these contributions from Turkish bases were unique and not replaceable."

So, Mr. President, it seems to me not only toward settling the situation in Cyprus but more especially in the own direct interest of the United States it behooves us to vote for the lifting of this embargo so that we can restore some sort of tranquility with our relations with Turkey and indeed in our relations with Greece.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SASSER). The Senate will be in order.

Mr. EAGLETON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

Mr. CHAFEE. I yield back whatever time I have remaining to the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield me 3 minutes?

Mr. CASE. I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I rise to speak in opposition to the Byrd-McGovern substitute.

Mr. President, at first blush this is sort of an intriguing little gem, but it does not wear very well on second blush.

The first impression is, well, this is some kind of a halfway compromise. We are really not lifting the embargo, and then again we really are, and we are going to sort of tell Turkey we are going to be looking at them, so on and so forth.

The truth is, Mr. President, stripped of all its coquetry and pious words, the Byrd-McGovern substitute is, pure and simple, a lifting of the embargo. I must disagree with the observations made with respect to the embargo by one of the amendment's principal sponsors, Senator MCGOVERN. He stated that this embargo, or limitation on sales of arms, was an insult to Turkey and that he was going to shed deep tears for this great insult to Turkey.

I say, Mr. President, to lift this embargo is an insult to Congress, because it is Congress that imposed the restrictions on the transfer of arms to Turkey. It is Congress, by the Foreign Military Sales Act, and other legislation, that stipulated that arms that we ship to allies are not to be used for aggressive acts against their neighbors.

It is not only Congress that is insulted, but the Presidency of the United States is insulted because it was President Johnson in 1964, when he sent George Ball to Turkey, and President Johnson again in 1967 when he sent Cyrus Vance to specifically warn the Turks, who were in both of those instances contemplating an invasion of Cyprus, that if they did so with American equipment they would be foreclosed from further arms from the United States.

Turkey was never surprised, Mr. President, when this embargo was imposed. The only thing which surprised them was that it took so long to do it, that it was not until February of 1975 that we finally did it, because they had been warned by Ball, by Vance, indeed by Sisco himself in 1974 when, despite Sisco's warnings and despite his objections, the Turks went ahead with the August invasion in 1974.

So if any insult is to be gleaned from this debate today, if we lift this embargo, then the insult, Mr. President, is heaped upon ourselves, not upon the country of Turkey.

I am a little curious about all of these recent acts of great magnanimity by Mr. Denktash. We learned just a couple of days ago that he was going to say something with respect to Varosha, sometimes called New Famagusta. What did he say? He really did not say anything, Mr. President. He said he was "prepared to discuss" Varosha with the Greek Cypriots. Those are the words from his communique. Is that not marvelous? After 4 long years with New Famagusta under Turkish occupation, Denktash is "prepared to discuss" New Famagusta. I say that is not much concession at all. In fact, I say one has to question its timing just a few days before this debate.

Then it is pointed out, "Well, you know, at one time there were over 40,000 troops on Cyprus, and you know what great progress they are making there now. Why, they have drawn it down to 25,000 troops." Well, goodie goodie. They still occupy close to 40 percent of the island, and 25,000 troops on Cyprus are are equivalent of having about 500,000 troops stationed in Washington, D.C. Twenty-five thousand foreign troops on Cyprus constitutes a massive military occupation.

Turkey has not budged one bit, and we are now being asked to budge, to eat the restrictions in our laws, to tear up the bilateral agreements into which Turkey freely entered, and to go back on what we have done in this Congress in saying that we believe that the rule of law and the principle of law are very important to sustain.

Bear in mind that if we lift this embargo we are saying to all other countries in the world that buy our weapons that hereafter bilateral agreements with the United States and existing U.S. law do not apply. We are saying to the Shah of Iran, who buys a lot of U.S. weapons, and wants a lot more—specifically, the Shah wants a lot of F–14's right now—"Shah, use them any way you want. Use them in any endeavor that you may desire because any restrictions that we have on our arms transfer were repealed when we told Turkey to go on her merry way with respect to Cyprus." The same message could be received by Saudi Arabia which has just purchased 60 F–15's from us. Are we not, by acting to repeal the Turkish arms embargo, saying to all current and prospective arms purchasers, "Take your pick without fear of restriction."

There is a lot involved in this debate, Mr. President, and I hope my colleagues will bear some of these points in mind.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from New Jersey.

I rise in support of his proposition and that of my friend, the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON) to emphasize two points, which, in effect, have been made by Senators who do not share our view, but who nevertheless evidently share our information.

The distinguished Senator from South Dakota said that it is a misnomer when we speak of an embargo. He said, and I quote, "Arms are flowing to Turkey."

If that is the case, then what is the urgency of the administration's request for us formally to renounce the principles upon which those arms were provided in the first place?

It is a simple fact that it is precisely our willingness to incur a strategic cost as the price of principle which defines the unique character of American foreign policy. In any given age, Mr. President, there are two, at most three, nations in the world which can presume to define their foreign policy in moral terms—because they have choices. It is the capacity to make choices that is the capacity to make a moral choice.

We are not ruled by necessity, but rather by principle, and the principle we lay down—that American arms are to be used for self-defense only—is what is at issue in this debate.

I would remind the administration of what the Senator from Missouri, in effect, alluded to. We were told the F–15's sold to Saudi Arabia could be used only in self-defense. Will the Saudis conclude we really mean that if they observe a willingness to ignore the same principle in the Turkish instance? Let us consider the larger implications of not taking our own principles, our own declarations of policy, with sufficient seriousness.

This is a moral Nation. We have held the support of the American people for a policy braced upon moral principle. This is the fact we face in this vote today.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. CASE. I yield the remainder of the time to the Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it would seem to me that if the administration argues in favor of lifting this embargo against Turkey, why should we not lift the embargo against Rhodesia? Even though circumstances are different, the basic concept is the same. How can the administration argue, on the one hand, with reference to Rhodesia, that by maintaining a total embargo, economic and military, we are neutral, but somehow we are biased and imperiling peace and security by not lifting the embargo insofar as Turkey is concerned?

It would seem to this Senator, as pointed out by others on the floor, by the distinguished Senator from Missouri, that there are 25,000 Turkish troops there, and that one way to make certain that we do address that would be to defeat the so-called Byrd-McGovern amendment, and then the Senator from Kansas would be prepared to offer an amendment which would say, in effect, that we would permit the resumption of sales to Turkey when "the armed occupation forces of Turkey are removed from Cyprus." That would be a step in the right direction.

It would seem to me that the amendment, the perfecting amendment, the so-called compromise, does little to move the parties closer together towards peace or successful negotiations with reference to Cyprus.

So I would hope we could vote down the Byrd-McGovern compromise and then take up an amendment that would have, I think, some merit. It would, in effect, say to the Turks, "If you are sincere you can demonstrate that by withdrawal of troops and then we can resume U.S. arms sales."

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of the time to the Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES).

Mr. SARBANES. How much time do we have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Five minutes are remaining.

Mr. SARBANES. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I will be very brief. I just wish to reemphasize a point eloquently made by the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN). It is a point that has troubled me, as I mentioned earlier this afternoon, very, very much.

A few weeks ago the Senate voted to allow substantial arms sales to the Middle East. I voted with the majority in that case. But we voted for it on the basis that the United States would continue control over those arms, that any time we could embargo their use if they were used contrary to the agreement with the United States.

Mr. President, we cannot stand here today and set a precedent which says that is a most flexible embargo. We cannot say that we are being honest in the Middle East if we are also lifting this embargo on Turkey.

Mr. President, I yield back to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) who has been such a very articulate spokesman on this issue.

Mr. PELL. I thank my colleague.

We really have four points to remember here. First and foremost in importance is that we allege we are a Nation governed by law, the rule of law. We seek to remedy mistakes we have made in the past, be they with the Indians or anybody else, always referring to law.

Here is a clear violation of the law that it is proposed should be condoned, apparently because it has been continued. It is as if an offender in the lower court said, "Well, I have done it for 4 years, let me do it for the next 14, or the next 20."

The second point is human rights. We are very concerned about human rights in the Soviet Union. We have been through a great deal of discussion about them. We have condemned them, and properly so.

We are concerned about human rights in right-wing countries, too, be they Brazil, Argentina, or Korea. But are we not concerned about human rights also in Cyprus and the fact that there the Turks are being condemned for their abuse of human rights?

The third point is the question of settlement in Cyprus. The last time there was a modification of the embargo, the point of the administration at that time—I do not recall if it was this one or the previous one—was that if they had the modification then there would be movement on the part of the Turks.

What did that movement mean? Nothing, until very recently, when because of this debate, the Turks have offered to give up occupying 40 percent of the land and occupy only 39 percent.

Fourth, and I think most important, is the effect on Greece. If we go ahead with this, we fill find that Greece will move down from its present course of skepticism of America to outright hostility. She may well pull out of NATO and, while we wring our hands as to what would happen if Turkey pulled out of NATO, let us think of what would happen if Greece did, too.

Finally, I would ask my colleagues who may have any doubts on this vote to go to the northern section of Cyprus, as I have done, and see the Turkish soldiers there, enforcing their occupation by the use of American arms, in clear violation of their agreement with us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 2 minutes have expired. Who yields time?

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, the vote we are about to take, which involves the limited embargo on arms to Turkey which has been in effect since the Turkish aggression, or since the summer of 1975, is a matter of great importance to our interests as a Nation. Members ought not to delude themselves into thinking that a lifting of the embargo can be done without, in effect, condoning that aggression and undercutting very important American commitments and principles as a Nation. The Senator from New York discussed this point very cogently. It really goes to what kind of a country we are, and how we function as a Nation.

The fact is that we have a choice, and the ability to make a moral choice. No one is being stiff necked in this situation. There have been repeated efforts to come to an accommodation. Some arms have gone through.

But there has not been one relinquishment of the fruits of the aggression committed on the Island of Cyprus—an aggression that took place when the parties were in peace talks in Geneva, when the United Nations had assumed jurisdiction over the island, when a cease-fire had been negotiated, when the military junta had collapsed in Greece and democracy had been restored. It was in that context that this aggression took place, and American law is very clear. That law ought not today to be written off the books of this Nation, with all the foreign policy connotations that will carry with it. We ought to continue to stand for the principles involved in this law, which form the basis of a decent and coherent foreign policy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, we are faced today with the question of whether or not the U.S. arms embargo on Turkey should be lifted. This is one of those very difficult foreign policy issues which lends itself to persuasive arguments on both sides. Moreover, it is widely perceived as a question which requires us to choose between two valued allies—Greece and Turkey. This perception is both untrue and unfortunate.

None can deny the human tragedy which has resulted from the longstanding conflict between Greeks and Turks. It continues today in the Aegean and on Cyprus. I was a member of the U.S. delegation to President Markarios' funeral last year and witnessed firsthand the misery which war between these two peoples has brought.

This misery is a direct result of actions taken by all the participants in the dilemma. The immediate blame for events in July 1974 must be shared by those Greeks and Greek Cypriots who instigated the coup against President Makarios and in favor of enosis or union between Cyprus and Greece. This coup attempt had the support of the then Government of Greece. It put at risk both Greek and Turkish Cypriots. The blame must also be shared by Turkey, which, in responding under the 1960 Treaty of Guarantee to the Greek-instigated challenge, could not curb its military actions once the restraints of peace were withdrawn.

Our judgment on this issue, however, cannot be based on the past. It must be based on a perception of American as well as of Greek or Turkish interests. Plato put it very wisely: "There can be no affinity nearer than our country." We must now demonstrate that affinity in our actions.

What then is the interest of the United States? Clearly, a primary American interest, especially when the climate of United States-Soviet relations appears to be deteriorating, is the strength of NATO's southern flank. Napoleon Bonaparte said almost two centuries ago, "Essentially the great question remains: who will hold Constantinople?" That question remains valid today.

Turkey, a member of NATO and an ally of the United States, controls Istanbul and the exit from the Black Sea. We need a strong friend on the Dardanelles. At the same time, Greece, through its northern border, prevents access by the Warsaw Pact to the Aegean. We must maintain firm ties with this cradle of Western democracy.

Ultimately, NATO's strength in this area depends on Greek-Turkish cooperation. The distinguished Greek Defense Minister, Evangelos Averoff, was certainly right when he observed that NATO is measurably stronger when both Greece and Turkey are active and cooperating members. Together, they tie down approximately 26 Warshaw Pact divisions. Secretary of Defense Harold Brown pointed out in his testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee in July that—

> Without Greek participation in NATO, Turkey would be physically isolated from its nearest NATO ally by 700 miles.

Similarly, Brown emphasized:

> Without Turkey in NATO, Greece would stand exposed practically on all sides.

Unfortunately, the southern flank of NATO is in disarray. Greece withdrew from the NATO integrated military command structure in 1974. Turkey remains in NATO, but its forces are greatly weakened by the effects of our embargo. Moreover, the United States is denied certain base facilities in Turkey which are of considerable importance to us. We risk losing these facilities permanently. As a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, I have some real appreciation for what their loss could mean for U.S. national security.

I do not believe that we can deal productively with any of our allies through pressure of the sort embodied in this arms embargo. No one's interest is served by our forcing Turkey to seek alternatives to its American connection. Five former Supreme Allied Commanders of NATO wrote to me recently expressing their fear that—

> Should Turkey, as a result of the embargo, turn away from this country and reduce or terminate its commitment to NATO, the whole of Southeastern Europe and the Middle East would become more vulnerable to Soviet military pressure.

I share their fear. Not only NATO's security, but Greece's as well, would be undermined.

Essentially, we have three choices. We can intensify the embargo on Turkey, removing the exceptions permitted in recent years. I cannot believe that this would be a very productive exercise. Second, we can continue as is—refusing to lift the embargo completely. This, I believe would simply mean continuing a policy which all agree has not worked. We made our point by imposing it. It has not resulted in the actions the proponents of its continuation have sought. The third option, the one I favor, is to work constructively with our allies Greece and Turkey toward a settlement of their outstanding differences. This can only be done in the absence of the threat to Turkey implicit in our continuation of the embargo.

We must, therefore, restore a healthier climate to our relationships and this requires that we lift the embargo on Turkey. At the same time, we must make completely clear that this is a positive action intended to help NATO, not an anti-Greek or anti-Cypriot move. I believe that the amendment initiated by Senators BYRD, MCGOVERN, CHAFEE, and BENTSEN underlines the commitment of Congress to vigorously support a settlement of Cypriot and Aegean issues. Clearly, all the parties to the conflict must be far more forthcoming. I am hopeful that direct negotiations will result in progress. Both Greek and Turkish Cypriots have made some preliminary proposals which must be pursued. If all concerned can be made to realize the community of their interests, a settlement of differences is possible. Such a settlement is a pressing U.S. interest as well as in the interests of Greece, Turkey, and Cyprus.

I submit for the RECORD the text of the letter I received from the five former supreme allied commanders of NATO.

The letter follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., June 1, 1978.

Hon. CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, JR.,
U.S. Senate,

DEAR SENATOR MATHIAS: As former Supreme Allied Commanders of the North Atlantic Alliance, we are deeply concerned by the damaging consequences of the U.S. arms embargo on Turkey for United States and NATO security. We view with alarm the deterioration in NATO's southern flank caused by the sharp decline in Turkish military capabilities and the increasing alienation of Turkey from the United States. Should Turkey, as a result of the embargo, turn away from this country and reduce or terminate its commitment to NATO, the whole of Southeastern Europe and the Middle East would become more vulnerable to Soviet military pressure.

Turkey is vitally important to our Western collective security in that it (1) controls the passage of Soviet war vessels from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean; (2) houses large numbers of strategically important U.S. and NATO facilities, some of which are uniquely situated for collecting intelligence on Soviet military activities; (3) provides an air defense warning critical to the operation of our Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean; and (4) provides a major contribution of army forces to NATO. The continued adherence of Turkey to the West is particularly important to Greece. If Turkey were detached from NATO, Greece would be surrounded by neutral and Communist states and would be less able to deter or prevent Soviet political or military advances.

It is imperative, therefore, to stimulate a resolution of the differences between our two Eastern Mediterranean allies, Greece and Turkey, and to promote a just and humane Cyprus settlement in a way that does not undermine U.S. and NATO security. Our need for our Western defensive alliance is now greater than ever in light of the ominous Soviet military build-up in Europe of recent years. We, therefore, strongly support the lifting of the embargo on arms for Turkey.

Sincerely,

ANDREW J. GOODPASTER,
LYMAN L. LEMNITZER,
ALFRED M. GRUENTHER,
LAURIS NORSTAD,
MATTHEW B. RIDGWAY.●

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, the emergency of Cyprus as a sovereign state in 1960 was but one of many indicators of the end of the colonial period. However, the problems and historical antagonisms which predate colonialism amongst the Greek and Turkish communities on that island have continued unabated. The artificial institutions established under the treaty of guarantee—1959—have been unable to withstand those strains and violent conflicts have erupted in 1963, 1967, and the summer of 1974. These crises have raised profound difficulties for the United States because of the involvement of NATO allies and have damaged American bilateral relations with each nation.

In November of 1974, Congress passed an arms embargo which was to take effect in 90 days if negotiations were not successful. We remain today at essentially the same point we found ourselves at during that year. Little has changed in the Aegean since the second Turkish invasion of Cyprus in August 1974. Turkey, initially invaded only after Archbishop Makarios' legal government was overthrown by Greek Cypriot forces favoring enosis—union—with the Greek military regime. Such a development was seen as a serious threat by Turkey. The invasion, the emergence of a more moderate Greek Cypriot leader, Clerides, and the formation of Greek civilian government followed one another in rapid order. But after negotiations involving Britain, both Cypriot communities, Greece and Turkey fell apart—Turkey moved to establish control over 36 percent of the island.

It is not my intent here to debate whether the Turkish invasion was justified given earlier actions by the Greek junta, or the wisdom of the imposition of an embargo at that time. What is at question here today is the wisdom of continuing an embargo.

The legal and philosophical issues which have created an impasse in U.S. relations with Greek and Turkish allies remain unabated. Turkey refused to negotiate seriously on Cyprus so long as the embargo is in place. Bilateral relationships with both countries deteriorated. The administration has refused to proceed with a defense cooperative agreement with Turkey. There can be no denying the moral and legal truths that Turkey did invade Cyprus using U.S. arms and that this is a violation of our law.

Previous efforts to relax the embargo have not resulted in the ensuing years in a more flexible Turkish position on Cyprus.

In May 1975, the Senate voted to lift the arms embargo as a gesture toward encouraging peaceful resolution. In July 1975, the House defeated a similar measure and the Turkish Government retaliated against Turkish-American defense installations, from which we received important intelligence information regarding the Soviet Union. Then on October 3, 1975, as an ameliorating measure, Congress approved the resumption of limited commercial military sales and the release of $185 million in military sales contracted prior to the February 1975 cutoff. In fiscal year 1977, the United States provided $125 million in FMS credits. In fiscal year 1978, the United States provided $175 million. Presidential certifications noting these funds were required to fulfill NATO obligations, were received. These measures, however well intended, produced only limited change in the Turkish positions on Cyprus and joint base facilities.

The classic dilemma for American foreign policy, moralism against security interests, is nowhere more apparent today than in this issue and in the continuing debate over the role of human rights in U.S. foreign policy. Should a security relationship override these other issues? The answer to that question must be the result of careful analysis of each situation and country.

To lift the embargo solely because of a perceived need to reopen four bases for intelligence purposes, or to attain greater cohesion in NATO may obscure another point. This is quite simply that Turkey is an important ally of the United States, that Greece is an important ally of the United States, and therefore, that the role of the United States in this matter must be that of an honest broker between these two states, moving them both toward the resolution of their disputes pertaining to Cyprus and the restoring of some sort of agreed upon federated community. For it is only such a solution that will give impetus to the allieviation of other problems which confront both of our allies in the Aegean.

To act, however, solely on the basis of narrow military dictates would be simply to postpone the next crisis over Aegean oil or the next eruption on Cyprus. Such a decision would, in my opinion, be unwise and ultimately bring into play indigenous political forces harmful to our interests of peace and stability in the region.

Prime Minister Ecevit of Turkey has recently finished extensive consultations here in Washington. Yet Turkish proposals for a solution to the Cyprus problem were considered inadequate. We must frankly thank Greek President Kyprianou for avoiding a refusal to return to the conference table. That active statesmanship leaves Dr. Waldheim the United Nations free to continue to search for peace and to reconvene the stalled U.N. peace talks.

It is, after all, in everyone's interest—ours, Greeces, Turkeys, NATO's and above all, the unfortunate refugees of occupied and divided Cyprus—that a settlement be reached soon. For more than 4 years Cyprus has been divided and with every passing month the realities of occupation and zonal divisions become more intractable, more intolerable, and less amenable to change.

The Turkish proposals submitted in February 1977, envisioned the creation of a bicommunal federal republic under a central government. The Turks have proposed to surrender land to the Greeks in six regions along the cease-fire line, but this only 3 percent of the island territory. The Turks have also proposed to open the towns of Famagusta—Varosha—to its former inhabitants once the talks proceeded. It is envisioned that a federal legislature would offer equal representation to both sides and that a presidency might rotate between leaders of the two communities. The federation government would be a creature of minimal powers designed primarily, as the Turks put it, "for the purpose of maintaining common services."

Unfortunately, the flat refusal of the Greek Cypriots to use this as a starting point for discussions has hampered progressive developments. Yet, their refusal is understandable since we are once again dealing with a situation where mutual trust was long ago the victim of violence. More than 50 percent of 190,000 Greek Cypriot refugees come from areas inside the current cease-fire line. Moving that line back a few miles would allow more than 100,000 refugees to return to their homes and live within a Greek area. They understandably do not wish to live as a minority in the Turkish sector. Obviously, there is a possibility of compensating these people and resettling them in the Greek sector. But that is an expensive and perhaps ultimately unsatisfactory proposition. Moreover, given the disparities in populations, there is a reluctance to accept a genuinely federal constitution.

It seems to me, however, that only a bizonal government and constitution is an adequate and acceptable solution to the problem. Yet the current Turkish plan providing for two central banks, two assemblies, which would remain separate except in the event of a constitutional crisis, two defense forces with no joint command, and two states with the authorization to sign separate treaties with outside powers is not a formula for the establishment of a federated nation-state. It might be more properly characterized akin to our early Articles of Confederation which would have established a very weak confederation. Further, Turkish unwillingness to consider the settlement of refugees and their movement across the partition line are not encouraging. Some estimates I have seen indicate that the Turkish proposal would leave 18 percent of the population—Turkish Cypriots—in control of 35 percent of Cyprus. Obviously, the Greek Cypriots are unhappy over such proposals.

WHY LIFT THE EMBARGO?

In the light of this intransigence the question becomes why should Congress lift the embargo? I have considered that question at great length. Frankly, the only justification for lifting the embargo is the admitted failure of past U.S. policy. It has not worked. It may be true that Turkey has not formally annexed Cyprus or allowed those who desire to do so to seek international recognition. It is true that the Turkish Government habitually and routinely tells us that the progressive "transfer to the federal republic" will occur with further negotiations and the "growth of mutual trust, cooperation and confidence." Prime Minister Ecevit and Turkish Cypriot leader Denktash repeatedly hint that more concessions will come at the negotiating table. Can we rely upon this commitment?

No one knows the answer. Is Turkey stringing us along, or is the proud nation prepared to move toward peaceful negotiations once the political yoke that it now carries has been removed? This also remains unclear, but there are encouraging signs in the last fey days as Turkey has further reduced its military forces on Cyprus and have proposed that Greek Cypriots be permitted increased return to Varosha and Framaguata.

The United States is not omnipotent. We cannot dictate a solution, but only try to establish conditions which are most likely to encourage the immediate parties in the disagreement to negotiate their differences.

Thus, persuasion rather than coercion is the key to the peace table and a federated Cyprus. Turkey has endured an American arms embargo since 1974 and an almost unanimous censure from the United Nations. Yet, Turkey has not given ground on this issue. Peace and stability in the Aegean region depends upon an equitable resolution on Cyprus. Both Greece and Turkey suffer from political and economic strains, and NATO's vital southern flank is in tatters. The crucial question is whether lifting the embargo improves prospects for a just and lasting peace.

If Turkey now is to negotiate in full faith and to move toward the sort of bizonal federated community most analysts agree is necessary, she must be persuaded, not compelled, to do so. To this end I reluctantly conclude the embargo must be lifted. As the Cleveland Plain Dealer editorialized, lifting the embargo with more aid "promised after a settlement" would repair damage to NATO while maintaining pressure on Turkey.

As with so many decisions in international relations, the choices lie between varying degrees of individuality. So it is with this decision, but the hard choice is that this action appears to stand the best chance of moving the parties to the negotiating table and peaceful resolution of the tragedy that has been Cyprus.●

● Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I shall vote to remove the arms embargo against Turkey as the only action which is consistent with our responsibilities to NATO, to Greece, and the free world.

The arms embargo against Turkey is an issue set against the pressures of history, of geography, of strategic and tactical defense, and of friendship.

Our historical and philosophical ties with the people and the civilization of Greece are as deep as between any two nations in the world.

Our alliances with the people of Turkey stem from the more recent but nonethe-less powerful global threats to free nations, the threats of totalitarian expansion by the Red Chinese in Korea and the Soviets in the Middle East.

Because of geography, both Turkey and Greece are strategically and tactically vital to the defense of the free allies and their suppliers of petroleum.

Because of friendship, we are obligated to help both Greece and Turkey survive the threat of Soviet expansion and the threat of their historical animosity toward each other.

The arms embargo issue must therefore be considered against an integrated view of the past, the present and the future. Of these views, the present and near future must be deemed most critical.

The present strategic and tactical situation for the forces of freedom is growing steadily worse. Let us review this situation for a moment.

The new status of "rough equality" between the strategic forces of the Soviet Union and those of the free allies of the world has emboldened the Soviets in their expansion into Africa and Asia. The Soviets know that they no longer need to back down to us as was necessary during the Cuban missile crisis in 1963.

The clear quantitative dominance of the tactical ground and air forces of the Soviet Union arrayed against NATO serves to further intimidate the domestic policies of our NATO allies. The Soviets know and we know that whatever the final outcome, Europe and the Mediterranean nations would be devastated by conflict between NATO and the Warsaw Pact with little damage to the Soviet homeland.

The new size, capability and offensive character of the Soviet naval forces and their distribution across the trade routes of the free allies has added a new strategic threat to the long-term struggle between us. An aggressive "blue water" navy is a major and historically significant departure from the traditionally defensive Soviet naval policy.

The continuing Soviet sponsored efforts to surround the oil-rich Middle East and thus control the free allies' principal source of energy, are reaching crisis proportions with the recent events in Lybia, Ethiopia, South Yemen, Afghanistan, and Turkey. In the absence of a policy to relieve the free allies' dependence on imports of energy and other strategic resources, this Soviet activity will further reduce our policy options.

Against the darkening backdrop of the strategic balance between the free allies and the Soviet Union, there is continuing difficulty between Greece and Turkey; two allies along NATO's critical southern flank and along the equally critical northern flank of the Middle East oil reserves.

Our purpose today is to decide if we can take positive steps toward resolving the difficulties between Greece and Turkey and toward rapidly strengthening the NATO and Middle Eastern position of the free allies.

Our historic ties with both countries carry great weight in this debate in spite of the conflict between them. Whatever our decision today, we must reaffirm our commitment to help these friends find the basis for friendship and accommodation between themselves.

Mr. President, as I view this total panorama of history, of geography, of strategy and tactics, and of friendship, I must conclude that on all grounds it is time to lift the arms embargo against Turkey.

There is no question that Turkey violated their agreement with us on the use of arms supplied them. For this they have rightfully been punished to the point where further punishment will do no one any good.

From a NATO perspective, Turkey has become militarily enfeebled to the point where they must look toward the possibility of accommodations with the Soviets, a circumstance that would undermine NATO, our friends in the Middle East, including Israel, the security of the Middle Eastern oil reserves and free access to the Mediterranean Sea.

Greece, as the NATO partner of Turkey, would find her political as well as her military position untenable if there was an accommodation between Turkey and the Soviets. As bad as the present Greco-Turkish confrontations on Cyprus and in the Aegean may be, it would be much worse if the Soviets became Turkey's partner, however, reluctant such a partnership might be.

The military deterioration of Turkey, and the corresponding estrangement between NATO and Turkey, has seriously threatened NATO defenses elsewhere. By maintaining an alliance with the United States and NATO, Turkey forces the Soviet Union to commit a substantial number of troops to the 1,300 mile border between them. At the present time, this involves approximately 26 Warsaw Pact divisions. Should Turkey become any less of a threat to the Soviets, either by leaving NATO or through a weakening of its military, the Warsaw Pact divisions could be deployed to other areas, particularly the Western European front.

Mr. President, continuation of the punishment of Turkey will only begin to punish ourselves and our allies throughout the world. It will almost certainly force Turkey away from us and closer to the Soviets. Any accommodation between Turkey and the Soviet Union that removed Turkey as a barrier to Soviet expansion would be disastrous.

The geographic location of Turkey has made it a strategic area throughout history. As the crossroads of Europe and Asia and controlling first the sea, land, and now, the air routes into the Middle East, the strategic value of Turkey cannot be overestimated.

Traditionally, the West thought of Turkey as the nation which controlled the Dardanelles and the Bosporus Straits. This is still important and serves to check Soviet activity throughout that part of the world. The Soviet fleet is both limited and exposed to Western intelligence as it moves between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean. In the event of heightened conflict or crisis, constriction on Soviet activity takes on even greater importance.

In today's accelerated pace of events, the air routes over and into Turkey means that Turkey plays a major role in determining the outcome of any new crisis in the Middle East and Africa. Whether the Soviet Union can or cannot overfly Turkey may determine the extent and timing of Soviet influence in a particular situation.

Turkey lies athwart of Soviet ambitions in the Middle East. The loss of Turkey to the cause of freedom would undermine the continued independence of not only Greece, but also Israel, Egypt, Iran, Saudi Arabia and other nations to whose continued free existence we are fully committed. There should be no doubt about the Soviets' strategic designs on the oil and peoples of this region.

Finally, Mr. President, we must not forget the strategic value to all free nations of the intelligence gathering potential that arises from a Turkey that is firmly allied with us. The success of any future arms control agreement, however complete it may be on paper, will only be possible if Soviet compliance can be verified. Future Turkish cooperation will play an important, possibly critical, role in such verification. Since the arms embargo was imposed, such cooperation has been withheld.

Mr. President, I hope we will lift the arms embargo against Turkey. However, I also hope that we will be firm and imaginative in our search for a solution to the Cyprus question. All parties should understand our resolve in this, including the use of the U.S. 6th Fleet as a police force if necessary. The development of friendly relations between Greece and Turkey is as vital to the existence of the free allies throughout the world as is Turkey itself.●

● Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, I am strongly opposed to lifting the partial embargo on security assistance to Turkey because I feel that we need to enforce our laws pertaining to unauthorized use of U.S. weapons if we are ever to exercise any restraining influence over the skyrocketing conventional arms race. Also, I see little point in lifting the embargo as an inducement for good behavior by the Turks on Cyprus or to encourage a more active involvement on their part in the defense of NATO's southeastern flank. Indeed, I am afraid that if we do raise this embargo, we may not only be giving the green light to any nation wishing to violate U.S. laws pertaining to use of conventional weapons systems, we may even be arming the Turks against the Greeks.

The Defense Department projects that U.S. arms sales overseas will total $13.2 billion in 1978 and increase to $13.5 billion in 1979. In the Third World alone in 1977, more than $8 billion in major arms transfers took place—three times the level of 1970, and more than four times that of 1960.

It is true that some of these figures need to be treated with a certain degree of caution. Dollar values, although credited to the year in which the order is placed, often involve very long lead times. Dollar value figures also frequently ignore currency conversion problems, varying inflation rates and credit terms, particularly when attempts are made to compare U.S. arms sales with those of other nations.

Even so, the overall figures are disturbing. During the campaign and after his election, President Carter rightly expressed serious concerns about the consequences for peace of this spiraling traffic in deadly weapons. Witness his statement on May 19, 1977:

> The virtually unrestrained spread of conventional weaponry threatens stability in every region of the world. Total arms sales in recent years have risen to over $20 billion, and the United States accounts for more than one-half of this amount. Each year, the weapons transferred are not only more numerous, but also more sophisticated and deadly. Because of the threat to world peace embodied in this spiralling arms traffic, and because of the special responsibilities we bear as the largest arms seller, I believe that the United States must take steps to restrain its arms transfers.

But now Mr. Carter is proposing to lift one of the few existing restraints on the uncontrolled transfer and use of U.S. weapons systems: the partial embargo on Turkey. I submit that this administration cannot have it both ways. It cannot simultaneously seek to restrain the conventional arms trade and lift one of the few sanctions which we have imposed against unrestricted use of those weapons.

In 1975, Secretary of State Vance made my point. As a private citizen, he told the House International Relations Committee that lifting the Turkish arms embargo—> would create a widespread impression that no nation that has acquired arms from the United States need any longer pay attention to the conditions on which those arms were made available, but would be free to use them in pursuit of its own interests in local conflicts.

As my distinguished colleague from New Jersey, Senator CASE, has noted in the Foreign Relations Committee hearings on this matter, the embargo is more symbol than substance. What is more, it has not hindered Turkey from fulfilling its NATO obligations. In theory, Congress is supposed to be punishing the Turks for using U.S.-supplied weapons in the 1974 invasions of Cyprus. In fact, through a provision of section (620)(x) of the 1961 act which allows Turkey to receive assistance for purposes of fulfilling its NATO obligations, Turkey received $125 million in FMS credits in fiscal year 1976, $125 million in 1977, and $175 million in 1978. All told, if one includes $184.9 million in FMS material trapped by the imposition of the embargo in the pipeline, and subsequently released, and the $175 million in FMS credits requested for fiscal 1979, again to fulfill NATO obligations, Turkey has received $784.9 million in security assistance since February of 1975.

The argument has been offered that concessions on the embargo will entice the Turks to be more conciliatory on Cyprus, but that simply has not happened. The initial imposition of the embargo was delayed from the end of 1974 until early 1975, in hopes of encouraging Turkish moderation. In October of 1975 the embargo was relaxed, commercial sales were allowed, and the FMS material was released to conciliate the Turks. In fiscal 1978 allowable FMS credits were raised 40 percent from $125 million to $175 million, again to entice some concession on Cyprus. Each successive step was billed as an inducement for the Turks to be conciliatory about Cyprus. But have they? Why should we expect that the administration's proposal to lift what little remains of the embargo will succeed where all of these earlier concessions have failed?

Turkey purports to be a close friend and ally of the United States, seeking only access to U.S. weapons in order to become a major obstacle to Soviet expansion into the Mediterranean and the Near East. Yet during the 1973 Mid-East war, Turkey permitted Soviet overflights and land convoys to reinforce Syria and Iraq, but refused U.S. overflights. Turkey has allowed passage of the carrier cruiser Kiev through the Dardanelles in 1976, despite a clear violation of the Montreaux Convention and strong protests from NATO officials. Finally, Turkey, by clear admission of Prime Minister Ecevit, sees no threat to security from the Soviet Union and thus deploys its largest corps—the First Army—not against Russia, but against Greece. To a large extent, therefore, lifting the embargo would not only signal our lack of interest in conventional arms restraint, it could also send U.S. weapons to Turkey for use against Greece.

The strategic and political importance of Greece as a NATO ally should not be underestimated as we debate the possible lifting of the embargo on Turkey. Our Sixth Fleet is dependent on bases in Greece which are not easily replaceable. Greece controls the sea lanes of the eastern Mediterranean, which if lost to the West would leave Turkey outflanked both geographically and politically. And while most of this debate has focused on likely actions by Turkey in the event the embargo is not lifted, I believe this body should also be conscious of possible repercussions in Greece if it is.

As the main Greek opposition leader, Mr. Panadreou, put it, the lifting of the arms embargo is a "direct threat to Greece's territorial integrity." He urged that if the embargo were to be lifted, Greece should immediately close all U.S. bases on its soil and put an end to all talks about returning to the military wing of NATO.

Mr. President, whether the Greek Government would actually go this far is impossible to say, and for the United States to be caught in the middle of a hot dispute between two strategically important allies is most regrettable. But if we are at all serious in our desire to restrict conventional arms transfers, and if we are firm in our resolve to keep our allies from one another's throats, then I do not see how any of us can support lifting the partial embargo on Turkey.●

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I support repeal of the Turkish arms embargo. I support repeal for two reasons. First, the embargo has not worked. Second, its continuation threatens United States and NATO security interests in the eastern Mediterranean.

The original intent of the Congress in imposing the embargo on Turkey in 1975 was twofold: to punish Turkey for allergedly violating U.S. arms transfer laws, and to compel Turkey to make concessions on the Cyprus question which would lead to a settlement of the long-standing Greek-Turkish dispute over that troubled island.

Mr. President, the embargo has now been in effect for 3 years. Yet Greece and Turkey are no closer to a Cyprus settlement than they were when the embargo was enacted. Although the Turkish proposals of last April 13 represent a limited advance over the positions that the Turkish Cypriots have assumed in previous negotiating sessions, and although Prime Minister Ecevit and Turkish Cypriot leader Denktash have manifested an increasing flexibility with respect to certain settlement issues, it is clear that a wide gulf continues to separate Greek and Turkish visions of a satisfactory resolution of the Cyprus question.

It is equally clear that our arms embargo against Turkey has not facilitated progress toward a settlement. On the contrary, it can be persuasively argued that the embargo has impeded a settlement because it encourages recalcitrance on both sides of the negotiating table. The Turkish Government is reluctant to make legitimate concessions for fear of domestic popular outcry that it is succumbing to illegitimate American pressure. Greek negotiators, perhaps still confident that the embargo will eventually force Turkey's hand, have little incentive to adopt a more compromising stance. Moreover, as Secretary of State Vance has testified, the embargo is "harmful to our—own—role as a potential contributor to a Cyprus settlement."

Mr. President, the ultimate test of any policy is whether it achieves its objective. As an instrument designed to achieve the objective of a satisfactory settlement of the Cyprus question, the embargo is demonstrably a failure. Indeed, recent representations by Prime Minister Ecevit suggest that Turkey's willingness to entertain more encouraging Cyprus initiatives is contingent upon the embargo's repeal.

Mr. President, I believe that the national interests of Greece, Turkey, and the United States will be served by an equitable settlement on Cyprus encompassing removal of Turkish troops remaining on that island, and the establishment of guarantees for the security and well-being of the Greek and Turkish communities on the island. I look forward to any settlement which once and for all will remove Cyprus as a festering sore in the eastern Mediterranean which for decades has sapped the political and military energies of two of our oldest and most trusted allies. I am convinced that progress toward such a settlement will be enhanced by repeal of the arms embargo which the Congress imposed on Turkey in 1975.

However, there are other reasons for repealing the embargo. The most insidious fruit of the embargo has not been the degree to which it has hindered a Cyprus settlement, but rather the extent to which it has compromised our own national security interests and those of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The embargo has militarily weakened our most powerful NATO ally in the eastern Mediterranean.

The embargo has provoked that ally to suspend our right to conduct many vital military and intelligence fathering activities on her own soil, some of which cannot be conducted from any other country.

The embargo has forced that ally to contemplate removal of all U.S. forces from her territory, to seek increasingly closer ties with other nations—including the Soviet Union, and to consider the possibility of withdrawing from military participation in NATO.

The embargo has also endangered the security of Greece, since that country is indefensible against a Warsaw Pact attack on the absence of a coordinated defense with a strong, militarily resilient Turkey.

Mr. President, at a time of gathering Soviet naval might in the Mediterranean and of increasing political and military disarray along NATO's southern flank, it is inconceivable to me that the Congress could refuse to repeal an embargo which has abjectly failed to foster our interests with respect to Cyprus and which is severely jeopardizing vital Western interests in the region as a whole. As Secretary of Defense Harold Brown recently testified before the House International Relations Committee:

> Unless our security relationship with Turkey is returned to a sound footing, Turkey's sense of isolation will continue to grow, and nationalistic pressures will edge it toward a search for possible non-NATO sources to satisfy its defense requirements. Such an eventuality . . . would not be in Turkey's best interests, nor the U.S. interests, nor the interests of NATO, nor those of Greece.

Mr. President, prudence, commonsense, and loyalty to the best interests of the United States demand repeal of the embargo.●

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, the issue before us is of critical importance to our national security interests, for its in our own best interests to do all we can to insure a strong NATO force and to get our relations with two valuable allies back on track. I have become convinced that our policy in the eastern Mediterranean over the last several years has severely weakened our defense capabilities on the southeastern flank of NATO, and, therefore, I will be voting today for a change in that policy.

I voted with a majority of my colleagues back in 1974 to impose an arms embargo against Turkey for its illegal use of U.S. arms in its invasion of Cyprus. The embargo was a legitimate response to the illegal use of our arms, and to use as a lever to try and bring about a solution to the Cyprus issue. While there has been some progress in the last 4 years, there has been no substantial movement or concessions by either side. So it seems to me that now is the time for our country to try a different approach to encourage all sides in the dispute to work out a peaceful solution.

The Byrd amendment seems to me a reasonable and effective approach in trying to maintain a strong NATO alliance, while providing inducements for substantial progress on Cyprus. The amendment makes it clear that, "the continuing presence of a major Turkish force is inconsistent with the legitimate status of Cyprus as a sovereign republic" and that the United States will continue to push for the negotiation of a just settlement on Cyprus that includes the restoration of full Cypriot sovereignty, and full protection for the human rights of all Cypriots.

The amendment sets forth certain goals for U.S. policy in the eastern Mediterranean: Opposition to the use of force in settling disputes, the allowance of arms transfers to Greece and Turkey for defensive purposes only and to strengthen our NATO forces, commitment to a just solution on Cyprus, and continuing review of progress toward that goal. To insure that these goals are carried out, the President would be required to report to the Congress every 60 days on progress made on negotiations for a solution to the Cyprus problem, and would condition any future military or economic aid to the region on a presidential certification that these goals have been achieved, or would contribute to their achievement.

So here with this amendment, the United States would be establishing concrete steps to monitor progress on Cyprus, and would provide specific enducements for all sides to reach a settlement.

The bill before us also provides considerable military assistance to Greece and Turkey. The Foreign Relations Committee has recommended $175 million in military sales credits and $50 million in security supporting assistance to Turkey. The amendment would increase the recommended $140 million in military sales credits for Greece to $175 million.

These levels are an indication of our commitment to helping to meet the military need of our allies.

We have tried the embargo. It has not worked. It has not worked on Cyprus, and its continuance would not make for a strong Turkey or a strong Greece. By adopting this amendment, by lifting the embargo and by setting out concrete steps to take on Cyprus, I am convinced that we will have adopted a policy that is fair to all, and that will strengthen our NATO alliance.

I would like to add that I have been encouraged by the progress which has been made in recent days on Cyprus. Last week I was pleased to see that Turkish Cypriot leader, Rauf Denktash, had presented a proposal for the resettlement of Greek refugees in Varosha. An interim administration would be created in that city under the care of the United Nations, and the early return of some 35,000 Greek-Cypriot residents would take place. The Turkish-Cypriots have urged that negotiations on this proposal be initiated promptly. I was further pleased to see in this morning's paper that the Greek Cypriots have agreed to further meaningful negotiations if Turkish troops are indeed withdrawn from Famagusta and the 35,000 residents are allowed to return. These developments, coupled with continuing troops withdrawals by the Turks over the last several months, are cause for hope on Cyprus.

● Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the compromise amendment on the Turkish arms embargo offered by the distinguished majority leader, Mr. BYRD of West Virginia, appears to be a reasonable middle ground in meeting this difficult issue.

Rather than lift the arms embargo outright, the Byrd amendment would require that any future economic as well as military assistance to Turkey be dependent upon that aid contributing to a solution of the Cyprus problem.

Further, the President would have to submit to Congress his certification that such a solution has been achieved or that such aid would be supportive of a solution.

Mr. President, the Byrd compromise is also appealing in that the President would be further required to submit reports to Congress every 60 days on progress towards a negotiated solution of the Cyprus problem. Congress still retains the power to reimpose the embargo if no progress is made toward a settlement on Cyprus.

As a final feature, the Byrd amendment recognizes the needs of the Greek military in that an additional $35 million in foreign military sales credits are extended to the Government of Greece over and above the $140 million already in the bill.

Mr. President, I feel this approach offers the best hope of getting Turkish troops out of Cyprus. After considering all aspects of this issue very carefully, I believe this compromise is the wisest course to follow at this time.●

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, after listening carefully to the comprehensive debate that we have heard here this afternoon, I have, with some reluctance, decided to support the substitute amendment offered by the distinguished majority leader.

I think that all of us in the Senate understand more deeply the extent of the legitimate concerns which have passionately aroused the feelings of the people of Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey. We also understand much better the pivotal role which both Greece and Turkey play in the NATO defenses of Europe and the West.

It would be a tragedy, indeed, if the bitterness which has arisen in those three countries should make impossible negotiated settlement of the impasse; for the overall impact of this deeplying fear and animosity would be to weaken their own defenses against Soviet imperialism, as well as those of the Western allies.

What is needed in the present circumstances is a method which will allow the resupply of our NATO partner, Turkey, while at the same time allay the scarred memories of the war now festering on Cyprus. The majority leader's plan is intended to meet both these needs. It permits the President to send the arms to Turkey which are needed for NATO. At the same time, it puts a tight rein on the shipment of those arms, tied to positive improvements toward a negotiated solution to the Cyprus problem. Indeed, regardless of arms shipments, the President must transmit reports to Congress every 60 days concerning such progress. But when the shipment of arms to Turkey is anticipated, then the President must send special notification and justification to Congress, setting forth how the shipment would contribute to the achievement of peace and human rights. Moreover, such shipments will also fall under the general authority of the Arms Export Control Act, which gives either House of Congress a veto over such shipments if the Senate or the House acts within 30 days. Thus not only will the President be making detailed reports of the situation on Cyprus; the Congress too will be keeping a watchful eye, and can cut off shipments to Turkey within 30 days.

Mr. Rresident, it appears to me that this is a humane and at the same time practical solution to a knotty problem. Like all such solutions, both sides will undoubtedly be disappointed at some aspects of this arrangement; yet in the long run, this will contribute to the lessening of emotions, and work toward a stable peace. While I have voted over the past 4 years to sustain the arms embargo against Turkey, I think that the time has come at least to try this good faith attempt to seek another solution to the problem. If it does not prove successful, I will support the renewal of an embargo.●

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN) yield me 30 seconds?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have asked that tally sheets be distributed to all Senators. I ask that the Chair keep the well cleared, and I ask that the clerk repeat, after each name that responds, the vote of that Senator so that everyone can hear what happens.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Groner of my staff be accorded the privilege of the floor during the debate and rollcalls on this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Joseph of my staff have the privilege of the floor during the remainder of the debate and votes on this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I make the same request for Mr. Horner of my staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD) to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN). The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 57, nays 42, as follows:

NOT VOTING—1

Weicker

So amendment No. UP 1492 was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENTSEN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is now on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama as amended. The yeas and nays have not been ordered.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENTSEN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is open for further amendment.

Who yields time?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I want to say to the Members that it is the hope of the leadership that the Senate will complete action on this bill tomorrow, which means that we shall probably have to go into the evening some today and possibly even tomorrow in order to complete action. I hope that a Senator will call up an amendment at this time.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1493

(Purpose: Technical amendments)

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARK-MAN) proposes unprinted amendment numbered 1493:

On page 2, line 5, of the printed bill delete the word "agent" and insert in lieu thereof the word "officer".

On page 2, lines 5 and 6, delete the words "Drug Enforcement Administration".

On page 2, line 8, add the word "such" before the word "officer".

At the end of section 3, add the following: "The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to the activities of the U.S. Armed Forces in carrying out their responsibilities under applicable Status of Forces arrangements."

On page 3, line 3, after the word "country," add the words "and export licenses for crime control and detection equipment may not be issued to a country."

On page 3, line 14, add the words "to the appropriate committees of Congress" after the word "writing".

On page 6, line 20, add the words, "of Part I of this Act" after the words "Chapter 1".

On page 9, line 1, add the word "that" after the word "provide".

On page 9, line 5, strike the words "subsection 498B(b)(4)" and add in lieu thereof the words "this paragraph".

On page 11, lines 18 and 21, and on page 12, line 19, add the words "to be appropriated" after the word "authorized".

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President. these technical amendments correct small imperfections in the bill.

Items (1) through (4) deal with International Narcotics Control. They make the first sentence of the paragraph in section (3) consistent with current law. They also insure that U.S. military police will be able to carry out their normal drug enforcement duties overseas with regard to personnel employed by the U.S. Armed Forces.

Item (5) makes clear the intent of the committee that crime control equipment can neither be given nor sold to countries that display a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights.

Items (6) through (12) are purely technical.

Item (13) retains a reporting requirement deleted from the Foreign Assistance Act by the International Development Assistance Act. The committee expects to continue to receive reports in the same form as those previously required under section 657 of the Foreign Assistance Act.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Do all Senators yield back their time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield back my time.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I yield back my time on the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All time is yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is open for further amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. STEVENSON. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Robert Russell of the Banking Committee staff be granted the privilege of the floor during consideration of this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK. I ask unanimous consent that Bruce Van Voorst of my staff and Pauline Baker of the staff of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations be granted the privilege of the floor during consideration of this measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Kalicke and Mr. Parker of my staff be accorded the privilege of the floor during the remainder of the discussion on this matter.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I believe unanimous consent has already been granted for Allyn Kreps and Christie Cohagen to have the privilege of the floor. If not, I so request.

I also ask unanimous consent that Ryan Conroy have the privilege of the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I have no other requests for time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments? If there be no further amendments——

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent that it be charged to neither side.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

AMENDMENT NO. 3264

(Purpose: To express the sense of the Senate with respect to policy changes affecting the United States-Republic of China Mutual Defense Treaty)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk for myself and Mr. STONE, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. MORGAN, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. TALMADGE, Mr. HAYAKAWA, Mr. HATCH, Mr. SCHMITT, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. BELLMON, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. HELMS, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. TOWER, Mr. GARN, Mr. BROOKE, and Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD and ask for its immediate consideration.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), for himself and others, proposes an amendment numbered 3264.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

UNITED STATES-REPUBLIC OF CHINA MUTUAL DEFENSE TREATY

SEC. 27. (a) The Senate finds that—

(1) the continued security and stability of East Asia is a matter of major strategic interest to the United States;

(2) the United States and the Republic of China have for a period of twenty-four years been linked together by the Mutual Defense Treaty of 1954;

(3) The Republic of China has during that twenty-four-year period faithfully and continually carried out its duties and obligations under that treaty;

(4) the United States-Republic of China Mutual Defense Treaty is integral to the broader North Asian security arrangements between the United States, the Republic of Korea, and Japan; and

(5) it is the responsibility of the Senate to give its advice and consent to treaties entered into by the United States.

(b) It is the sense of the Senate that any proposed policy changes affecting the continuation in force of the United States-Republic of China Mutual Defense Treaty shall be a matter for prior consultation with the Senate.

CHINA AMENDMENT TO SECURITY ASSISTANCE AUTHORIZATION BILL

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, President Nixon's historic visit to mainland China in 1972 set in motion a dynamic series of developments in our China policy. It is a process which is still evolving, and which is still uncertain insofar as an ultimate destination and timetable are concerned.

Many of us in this Chamber maintain an active interest and concern with respect to changes in our China policy. Certainly, there are several critical issues which are called into question when we discuss fundamental changes in our national policy toward the two governments which claim to represent China. One significant issue, of course, is the matter of selecting which of the two contending governments merits formal recognition by the United States. The Senator from Kansas, along with others in this body, has expressed himself on this issue may times. I have indicated that the Republic of China, positioned on the island of Taiwan, continues to merit diplomatic recognition unless and until the People's Republic of China, positioned on the mainland, agrees to certain specific policy preconditions vital to American interests.

There are many in this body who share this Senator's opinion on the recognition issue. Others favor immediate recognition of the mainland government, without any reservations or preconditions. But I suggest that the amendment being offered today by myself and the distinguished Senator from Florida (Mr. STONE), addresses itself to a related—but separate—issue affecting future American policy toward China. It is an issue which must be analyzed and resolved on its own merits, without regard to our differing opinions on the question of diplomatic recognition.

This separate issue—the fate of our mutual defense treaty with Taiwan—is a matter around which a consensus of this body can be built, regardless of the fact that we disagree individually about where the actual seat of Chinese Government is positioned. I suggest this for two reasons: First, the question of abrogating our mutual defense treaty with Taiwan involves constitutional questions and issues of congressional prerogative that transcend the China matter; and second, the defense of Taiwan and the security of the western Pacific region is itself a matter of general policy agreement within this country and, I think, within this Chamber.

So, for the purpose of this debate, I respectfully suggest to my colleagues that we set aside our differing opinions about diplomatic complexities of the China question, and concentrate instead on the more immediate questions at hand, involving the separation of powers in our own Government and the future security of the western Pacific.

THE TREATY

The mutual defense treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of China was promulgated in 1954, in the wake of the Korean War, when the security and stability of the Asian Pacific region was as much a vital concern of the United States as it is today. Then, as now, a strong and visible American military commitment to the region was seen as the most effective method for curbing the growth of Communist influence in the area. Reaffirming our desire "to strengthen the fabric of peace in the west Pacific area," and to defend the region "against external armed attack," we reached agreement with Taiwan that "an armed attack in the west Pacific area against the territories of either of the parties would be dangerous to peace and safety" and that each of our countries "would act to meet the common danger in accordance with its constitutional processes."

For the purposes of this treaty, the protected territory includes Taiwan and the Pescadores Islands, lying just a few miles to the west of its coast. As negotiated by our two governments, the treaty was to remain in force indefinitely, with the understanding that "either party may terminate it one year after notice has been given to the other party."

THE AMENDMENT

The amendment being offered today by myself and my colleage from Florida, and which is cosponsored by Senators GOLDWATER, MORGAN, CURTIS, and HAYAKAWA, addresses itself to a potential abrogation of the treaty by our Government, at our own initiative and without any violation of the treaty by the Republic of China. We suggest that it is the sense of the Senate that "any proposed policy changes affecting the continuation in force" of the treaty should be "a matter for prior consultation with the Senate." It is designed specifically to correct any misconception that the treaty would automatically "lapse" if the administration recognizes Peking's Government, and to ensure that the Senate will be given an advisory role if the President should decide to abrogate the treaty by a unilateral initiative. By so doing, we can be sure that the security considerations affecting American and Japanese interests in the Western Pacific area—which motivated the 1954 defense treaty and which remain important today—are fully taken into account before any policy changes are undertaken.

TERMINATING THE TREATY

Top-ranking leaders of the People's Republic of China have stated repeatedly that abrogation of our mutual defense treaty with Taiwan is an indispensable "precondition" to normalization of relations between mainland China and the United States. Many of those in this country who favor relations with the mainland openly advocate the unilateral cancellation of the 1954 treaty for that reason. In fact, some in this Chamber have suggested that we break our longstanding security relationship with Taiwan, and rely instead on "creative diplomacy" to guarantee the future security and well-being of Taiwan's more than 16 million people. In my opinion, such conclusions are unfortunately naive.

But what particularly concerns this Senator, and many others as well, is the faulty assumption that the mutual defense treaty with Taiwan would somehow automatically "lapse" once the United States establishes diplomatic ties with the Communist government on the mainland. This conclusion not only denies reality, but ignores the clear constitutional and legal arguments to the contrary.

The scenario, according to those sources, would go something like this: Our Government announces that "we hereby recognize the People's Republic of China; we hereby derecognize the Republic of China; and by the way, since in our eyes the Republic of China no longer exists, it follows that any treaty obligations we happen to have had with it have also vanished from the face of the Earth." A simple scenario—no mess, no fuss, no hand wringing about legal complications.

Fortunately, it simply is not that easy. In the first place, the 1954 Treaty clearly provides, in article X, that "this treaty shall remain in force indefinitely. Either party may terminate it 1 year after notice has been given to the other party." There is no way the U.S. Government can legally or morally circumvent that provision. Significantly, no President of the United States has ever unilaterally abrogated a treaty with any foreign government in violation of the provisions of that treaty.

CONSTITUTIONAL RAMIFICATIONS

The Constitution of the United States makes no specific provision for the abrogation of treaties with other nations. It does, however, declare such treaties to be "the supreme law of the land" and therefore subject to the full support of the President and Congress. Constitutionally, only Congress has the power to repeal Federal laws.

Even though no single procedure for treaty abrogation is clear from historical precedents, the weight of those precedents which do exist lean heavily in favor of Senate or congressional coparticipation. In a detailed "staff report" prepared for the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in November 1977, which was widely distributed among all Senate Members during the Panama Canal treaty debate, it was determined that:

> Neither practice or opinion give the President exclusive power to terminate treaties . . . most scholars agree that a strong case can be made in principle for the view that treaties should be terminated by the treaty-making power—that is, the President with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Our colleague, Senator GOLDWATER, did extensive historical research into precedents of treaty termination by the U.S. Government. In his recent publication, "China and the Abrogation of Treaties," our colleague notes appropriately that "the first treaties ever to be declared null and void by the United States were cancelled by Congress alone," in 1778, and that after that, "the joint resolution, followed by Presidential notice to the other country, would become the general vehicle for removing our Nation from treaties that we no longer could or wished to enforce." The Senator from Kansas cannot, in a few moments, begin to reiterate the many points of history and constitutionality covered in Senator GOLDWATER'S informative monograph, which supports the congressional advisory role, and I commend it highly to all of our colleagues for additional background on the subject.

However, I do want to reiterate a very crucial point made by our colleague in the study, which I think bears careful reflection:

> The United States has never repudiated a defense treaty with a friendly nation. Nor has any President terminated a treaty that was not breached by the other party, was not in conflict with or supplanted by a later act of Congress or another treaty, or that did not become impossible to perform due to circumstances not of our own making.

This amendment concerning the Taiwan defense treaty, then, seeks to maintain historical consistency, preserve a traditional congressional role, and seeks to clarify uncertainty about the future status of this specific treaty. It does not, however, attempt or pretend to establish a comprehensive edict covering all future treaty termination issues.

SECURITY FOR THE WESTERN PACIFIC

Apart from constitutional considerations, a congressional role in determining the future of our mutual defense treaty with Taiwan is particularly important because of security interests in the western Pacific. The security interests of the United States, as well as those of Japan, the Philippines, and South Korea, are inherently tied to the future of the Taiwan defense treaty. Clearly, our mutual defense treaties with Japan, South Korea, and Taiwan complement each other, and if one leg of this tripod is removed, it will have inevitable effects upon the other two. At a time when it is this administration's announced policy to withdraw all American ground troops from South Korea and to phase out U.S. military bases in the Philippines, any talk of abrogating our treaty with Taiwan must be carefully reviewed by Congress for all its security implications.

It seems likly that treaty abrogation would adversely affect our relations with Japan. The Japanese Government has become uneasy in recent years about the determination of our Government to remain actively involved in Asian affairs and to continue safeguarding Japan's security. This administration's policies have heightened that concern. There can be no doubt that termination of the 1954 treaty would indicate continued erosion of American strength in the region, causing our allies to reassess their traditional close relationships with us and to look towards new measures to guarantee their security. Major alterations in the balance of power in east Asia are probable. Tension will increase, and aggression and instability will be encouraged.

Of course, the security of Taiwan itself will be placed in immediate jeopardy. Peking's growing nuclear, air, and naval capabilities pose a direct threat of assault against Taiwan, which will increase during the coming years. During the past quarter century, administration after administration has committed itself to guarantee Taiwan's security. During the 1976 Presidential campaign, Mr. Carter himself commented that:

We are bound by a treaty to guarantee the freedom of Formosa, Taiwan, the Republic of China. I would like to improve our relationships—diplomatic relationships with the PRC, mainland China, hopefully leading to normalization of diplomatic relations sometime in the future. But I wouldn't go back on a commitment that we have had to assure that Taiwan is protected from military takeover.

Hopefully, that pledge will be honored.

A number of public opinion polls within the past several months indicate strong popular support for maintaining our defense treaty obligations with Taiwan. A public opinion survey conducted by Potomac Associates, Inc., in April 1977, showed 61-percent opposed to severing military ties with the Republic of China. A survey administered by Brown University during July and August 1977 showed 56 percent of "opinion leaders" in the United States—political leaders, top executives, and mass media specialists—favor maintaining all treaties with Taiwan now in force.

Beyond Taiwan's own interest in her security, her defense serves our own interests as well. Taiwan occupies an important position astride the major communication lanes in the western Pacific and has provided the United States with important bases for military operations in Asia. Important oil supply routes from the Middle East to Japan will be affected by policy decisions.

For all these reasons, Mr. President, we must insist upon our right in the Senate to exercise advice regarding disposal of the Taiwan defense treaty.

Having made those preliminary statements I now yield to the Senator from Florida (Mr. STONE).

Mr. STONE. I thank the distinguished Senator from Kansas.

This amendment has another phrase that deserves attention.

Paragraph 3 states:

The Republic of China has during that twenty-four-year period faithfully and continually carried out its duties and obligations under that treaty;

Paragraph 4 reads:

The United States-Republic of China Mutual Defense Treaty is integral to the broader North Asian security arrangements between the United States, the Republic of Korea, and Japan; and

What this amendment says is not simply that the Senate should be consulted before any drastic or major change in Asian policy. This amendment asserts and affirms that the Republic of China and the United States of America have been good and faithful allies, each to the other, not for a year but for more than 20 years.

In a very well thought-out and reasoned editorial in the Washington Star of February 11, headlined "What's the Hurry on China?" the editors point out that normalization with the People's Republic of China does not in any way have to be carried on by the abrogation of solemn commitments and faithful performance of treaties between old and trusted and good allies.

I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT IS THE HURRY ON CHINA?

There's a touch of "Send in your dollar before it's too late!" psychology in the latest Ted Kennedy-Leonard Woodcock urgings of full diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China. We're told that time is running out; that there is danger of an opportunity slipping away. The implication is that the United States is a supplicant, with much of value to be gained if we succeed in setting up a full-scale embassy in Peking, much to be lost if we don't.

And why is it so important to normalize Peking? All it costs is a break with Taiwan. Because you can't ignore 900 million people. Because, without full ties, the U.S. might stumble into war with China—over Korean reunification, perhaps. Because China is a counterweight to the Soviet Union.

Besides, why shouldn't we recognize Peking? All it costs is a break with Taiwan.

This, of course, is what it's really all about.

The meaning of diplomatic formalities has changed greatly for all nations in this century. For example, nobody finds it necessary to declare war before starting to fight any more. Similarly, Embassy Row protocol isn't the beginning or the end of relations between governments. There can be both political negotiations and economic trading with a minimum of it—even the military and industrial technology the Chinese would like to have from us could be arranged without an American ambassador in Peking.

Yet as a symbol, our recognition of the People's Republic would have great importance. Mostly negative, from our point of view, since it would look like abandoning an old ally under pressure and withdrawing a step farther from our former influence in Asia. Mr. Woodcock's warning about the danger of an accidental war over Korea is ironic; it is easier to imagine challenges to an American ally in Seoul after our dissociation from Taiwan than before.

Those urging recognition most strongly play down the impact on Taiwan. We could maintain political and economic ties without recognition or a formal defense treaty, they say, and we could come out against forced changes in Taiwan's status while emphasizing that the U.S. will not oppose a voluntary change.

This would presumably make it embarrassing for the Hua government to annex Taiwan by invasion. Besides, sending troops across the Formosa Strait would run the risks of failure and a bad press that any invasion runs.

Still, the Hua government's stated goal is to make the former Chinese province part of the People's Republic; the question is how. Peking has never been much for plebiscites, and it's hard to imagine the Taipeh government volunteering a merger.

What's not hard to imagine is a "war of national liberation" somehow springing up. One the U.S. would stay out of.

There is a little time to contemplate this cost/benefit equation before the big push comes for recognizing Peking and jettisoning Taipeh. Despite their note of urgency, Mr. Woodcock's strong words and the warnings of Sen. Kennedy and Sen. Alan Cranston are preliminary rumblings. It is widely agreed that the real drive won't come until the Panama treaty issue is settled. Presumably a second gesture that could be construed as global disengagement might intensify fears for American security in the international community, to the point where neither the Panama agreement nor the breaking of relations with Taiwan would be accepted.

This is not to say there should never be full diplomatic relations between Washington and Peking. Or cultural exchanges, or trade, or even economic aid.

There is much to be said for all of them. There are practitioners of realpolitik who feel a buildup of Chinese power is vital to American interests as a way of counter the Soviet expansion so conspicuous everywhere in the world. They argue that having the Chinese dependent on the U.S. for technological equipment would be a good idea. Meanwhile, people who feel strongly about human rights hope that closer connections with the West might make the Chinese regime less repressive.

The message is that, however desirable rapprochement may be, it does not have to come on Peking's terms. The Hua government has at least as much to gain from closer ties with the United States as we could possibly have. The courting of influential groups, such as the Kennedy entourage—a show of hospitality reminescent of Fidel Castro's kindnesses to American decision makers—shows how well this is understood in Peking.

There is no real reason why we cannot have every benefit of full relations with the People's Republic of China without giving up anything in Taiwan. It has been said that continued recognition of the Republic of China treats a pretense as a fact. Who really believes the Taipeh government speaks for all Chinese or can hope to control the mainland again? Yet how many untenable situations do keep going! Think of West Berlin.

It is also useful to think of what else there is to be defended in Taiwan besides American prestige and strategic interest: a country that is giving 16 million people a prosperous and relatively free life. Taiwan is no civil liberties utopia compared with the United States. But, compared with the People's Republic of China, it is.

All worth remembering before we yield to the coming hard sell on recognizing Peking.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, there is a subtle effort being made in double-think, to wash away a country and a government, which is the Republic of China and denominated "the people on Taiwan." The people on Taiwan are citizens of the Republic of China, not merely an entity, not merely an autonomy, but the legal and legitimate government known as the Republic of China, a treaty partner of ours, diplomatically represented in the United States by an able Ambassador, and in which the United States is represented in Taipei by a full embassy and an Ambassador.

Any effort on the floor of the Senate to wish away a nation and a country and a government by referring to something called "the people on Taiwan" is invidious. It short circuits the appropriate constitutional processes which are owed not merely to the Senate, but also to an ally of the United States of America—the Republic of China.

So this amendment states what is an obligation and should be a well-welcomed obligation of the United States to a valued ally—a major trading partner, trading with the United States in the billions every year, and importing as well as exporting—which is that the Senate affirms that before any change be attempted in our relationship with the Republic of China, the Senate be duly consulted.

There is no indirect effort in this amendment to change the existing status and standing of our relationshp. In other proposals that I have seen and which have been circulated to Members of the Senate, there is a subtle but definite attempt to wipe away and wash away a country, a nation, and a government faithfully allied to the United States. That should not be done, and certainly it should not be done by some casual amendment offered not through the processes of the Foreign Relations Committee and the appropriate committees of the Senate, properly staffed out and heard and considered, but, rather, offered ad hoc on the floor of the U.S. Senate as an amendment.

Therefore, in urging support of this amendment and commending it to the Members of the Senate, I suggest that this amendment states the situation as it is and as it should be.

I reserve the remainder of my time. If the Senator from Arizona desires time, I yield to him.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator from Florida. I will not need more than 10 minutes.

I compliment the Senator from Florida for stating his case succinctly.

Mr. President, it is my pleasure to rise in support of the amendment being jointly authored by Senators DOLE and STONE, which I am cosponsoring.

The amendment is simple. It would reaffirm the role of the Senate in deciding upon our Nation's future treaty relations with the Republic of China on Taiwan.

I am disturbed to say that news reports have indicated that some officials in the Carter administration are advising the President he can cancel the defense treaty with the ROC unilaterally, without coming to the Senate for its advice and consent.

One such article appeared in the Washington Post of August 16, 1977, which claimed a State Department legal opinion says the withdrawal of diplomatic recognition from the Taiwan Government would end the defense treaty without need to come to the Senate.

Mr. President, all the Dole amendment would do is to express the opinion of the Senate on this issue.

The Dole amendment says that before any proposed policy change is made affecting the continuation in force of the defense treaty with Taiwan, the matter should be brought to the Senate for its prior consultation.

This means the President should not take any action which he believes changes the effect of the defense treaty, unless he first consults with the Senate.

It means that the Senate will at least be informed of the possible event, before it happens.

By being informed in advance of whatever action is planned, the Senate then will be in a position to take whatever steps it feels is proper and within its constitutional prerogatives.

But, Mr. President, let me clarify that the amendment itself does not subject the status of the defense treaty to the approval of the Senate. It merely calls upon the President to inform the Senate of the possibility that the treaty may be affected, and it asks that we be consulted.

Now, I do not see how anyone in this body can possibly object to that. With all the talk about an imperial presidency in recent years and with the increased preoccupation of the Senate and Congress in protecting our independent powers, I should think that a request for information and prior consultation, on such an important matter as the possible abrogation of a defense treaty, would be universally accepted in this Chamber.

Mr. President, I will say that it is my opinion that the Senate clearly shares a role in the termination of a treaty. The Senate was a partner to the original ratification of that treaty.

Since it is a part of the treatymaking power, it also must play a part in the ending of that treaty.

In other words, the President needs the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, or the approval of both Houses of Congress, to end a treaty. The President cannot himself unilaterally break a treaty.

I might remind you that over 40 treaties that were terminated by our country, came to an end pursuant to authority given by the Senate or Congress. In fact, the first treaties that were ever annulled by the United States, the French-American treaties, were canceled by a public law in 1798. This action reflected the understanding in the 18th century by both Congress and the President that some form of legislative participation is required in order to terminate a treaty.

Now, it is true that Congress has gone along with permitting the the President to consider treaties at an end in certain narrow situations. One of these is the outbreak of war, where changed conditions not of our own action make it impossible to perform a treaty. Another exception is where the other party has already committed a serious breach of the treaty. And a third situation is where Congress enacts a law, or the Senate ratifies a treaty, which the President interprets as having superseded an earlier treaty.

None of these narrow exeptions, which are far outnumbered by the instances where congressional approval was required, apply to the situation of Taiwan.

Nor, might I add, does the President have any basis for asserting power to annul a treaty by virtue of his recognition power. Recognition of a government is one thing. Ending treaties is another.

My office has made an extensive research of this issue, and we have found that it is clear as can be that internanational law does not provide that a treaty ends when a government is derecognized, so long as the same authorities with whom we entered into the treaty continue in control of the particular territory involved.

In this case, should the President ever take the unwise step of switching diplomatic relations from the Republic of China, that would not change the authorities on Taiwan. The Nationalist Government on Taiwan, with whom we concluded the Defense Treaty in 1954, would still remain there. Thus the treaty would continue in effect, unless our Government made the decision to end it.

This decision would be a political one, which under our Constitution would require joint action by the President, together with the Senate or Congress.

Therefore, even the recognition power does not confer upon the President a power to end the defense treaty with the Republic of China, without the advice and consent of the Senate or a new law conferring that authority upon him.

But, Mr. President, I repeat that the pending amendment does not go as far as the concept I have just addressed. The amendment does not reach the matter of whether the approval of the Senate is required. It merely seeks to have the Senate informed and consulted, before such a drastic step would be taken.

If the President should ever attempt to terminate a defense treaty with a friendly ally, without at least consulting beforehand with the Senate, it would be a totally unprecedented grab for power, without any basis in our history or Constitution. I cannot see how anyone in this body would welcome such a development, and I urge support for the Dole amendment.

True, it is the treaty with Taiwan that is involved today; but the principle applies with respect to each and every treaty that we have, and if we do not make our feelings known to the executive branch now, we may not have a chance tomorrow once the precedent is established.

Mr. President, I might say that the paper I referred to as having been developed by my staff, which unfortunately carried my byline, "China and the Abrogation of Treaties," is probably the most thorough work ever done on this, and I know it upset the State Department quite a bit, because they were ready to advise the President that it had the power of abrogation without any question.

So, Mr. President, so that my colleagues might be aware of this paper, and it is not too long, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

CHINA AND THE ABROGATION OF TREATIES

(By BARRY M. GOLDWATER)

INTRODUCTION

Little or no public debate has occurred on the role of Congress in the abrogation of treaties. Yet, this subject is at the forefront of one of the critical foreign policy issues of the 1970's, our government's China policy.

Before Secretary of State Cyrus Vance went to the mainland of China last August for talks with the new triumvirate ruling that territory, he was urged by Senator Edward M. Kennedy to simultaneously recognize the People's Republic of China (PRC) and consider our defense treaty with the Republic of China on Taiwan (ROC) as having lapsed. That President Carter could so terminate the treaty at his own discretion was assumed, the theory being that after the United States cuts diplomatic relations with Taiwan, we can consider the defense treaty at an end because there is no government to deal with.

This was not the first time I had heard of the concept under which the defense treaty would be considered as having died a quiet death upon diplomatic recognition of the Communist regime. A high official has informed me that the Legal Adviser's Office in the Department of State was studying this contingency even before Senator Kennedy's trial balloon, and it is apparently a view held by several subordinate officers at the Department.[1]

Whether Secretary Vance or any of the officials accompanying him to Peking actually broached this contingency in talks with the Communist Chinese is unknown, but the subject requires careful scrutiny because it represents the latest turn in thinking of those persons who are bent upon granting recognition to the PRC on its own terms.

It is known for certain that one of the announced indispensible requirements for a so-called normalization of relations between the PRC and the United States is abrogation of the Mutual Defense Treaty with Taiwan. PRC Vice Foreign Minister Yu Chan and Vice Premier Li Hsien-nien each made it clear to visiting editors of the Wall Street Journal in October 1977 that the Communist government is "absolutely inflexible" on this principle. In view of the unyielding position among PRC leaders and the seeming willingness of some American officials to accept the demand, it is urgent that a public debate be initiated on the threshold question of whether or not the President has constitutional authority to do, on his own, what the PRC is demanding.

And, although the immediate question arises in connection with the defense treaty between the Republic of China and the United States, it is also important to explore the principle involved because it touches every one of our nation's treaty commitments. If the President can break the treaty with Taiwan on his own authority, then he can withdraw from NATO or pull out of any other treaty without consulting Congress or getting its consent.

At the outset, it should be clarified that my argument is not intended to cover executive agresments or international agreements other than formal treaties. My concern at this time is only with treaties in the constitutional sense of compacts between nations or other international entities which have been formally signed, submitted for advice and consent to the Senate and ratified after having received the necessary two-thirds approval by the Senate. Since the defense treaty with the ROC is exactly such a constitutional treaty my discussion of the treaty termination power will address only that species of international instrument.

Nor shall I make any brief for the Senate or Congress as possessing the power to compel the President to denounce or abrogate a treaty, although there is strong evidence that such a legislative power exists. Again, that proposition is extraneous to the matter at hand, which is not an effort by Congress to break the treaty with Taiwan, but a proposed assertion of power for the President to arbitrarily force a decision upon the Congress as a fait accompli about which it can do nothing.

Also, let me record my strong opposition to any policy of normalization with Communist China that calls for a break in our relations with the free Chinese on Taiwan and the repudiation of our defense treaty with them. I am convinced such a policy of kowtowing to the PRC would dishonor the United States, increase the risks of a world conflict and run counter to constitutional provisions demanding a role for Congress in the treaty process.

Today, Taiwan has almost 117 million people, more than Ireland, Norway, and 120 other countries of the world. Its economy ranks second only to that of Japan in the Pacific. The ROC is currently America's 13th largest trading partner. Two-way trade between the United States and Taiwan totaled $5.5 billion in 1977, compared with $374 million between the United States and the PRC.[2]

Acceptance of the Communist Chinese demands would be unprecedented in American history. No President of the United States has ever unilaterally abrogated a treaty with any foreign government in violation of the provisions of that treaty. Actually, we have a remarkable record of morality in keeping our treaty promises. The motto that "our word is our bond" has been a matter of faith for the American people and for foreign nations with whom we have dealt. If President Carter were now to accept the proposal of advisors who recommend that we recognize the PRC and abrogate our defense treaty with Taiwan, it would leave a permanent stain on our history.[3]

CHAPTER 1—OVERVIEW: INTENT OF FRAMERS

Admittedly, treaty abrogation is a rather novel subject. There are virtually no court cases and very few academic papers on the subject. What we do have to go on is our history as a Republic, several statements by the Founding Fathers, and common sense.

From these, my own reading of the Constitution is as follows:

No President can terminate a treaty unless he first obtains the consent of Congress.

The Constitution demands a role for Congress in the abrogation of treaties, either in the form of joint action by the President and two-thirds of the Senate, or by the President acting together with both Houses of Congress.

Any President who would violate the Constitution on such a major matter as breaking faith with the nation's treaty obligations would run the risk of impeachment.

In Foreign Affairs and the Constitution, one of the few works to consider the question, the noted authority Louis Henkin states:

"In principle, one might argue, if the Framers required the President to obtain the Senate's consent for making a treaty, its consent ought to be required also for terminating it, and there is eminent dictum to support that view."

Yet, Henkin adds:

"In any event, since the President acts for the United States internationally he can effectively terminate or violate treaties, and the Senate has not established its authority to join or veto him." [4]

It is true the President could, under his power of general control over foreign policy, effectively weaken the credibility of our national commitment under a defense treaty, such as NATO, by ordering a withdrawal of most American military forces from the foreign area involved, but he cannot unilaterally destroy the international legal obligations of our country under a formal treaty without the consent of the Senate or Congress. Indeed Henkin does not claim the President can legally terminate or violate treaties. He writes only that the President has the ability to "effectively" breach treaties. This distinction would be of critical importance in any impeachment proceedings instituted by a Congress which considered the President to have violated the limits of his constitutional discretion. It also would have overriding weight in any judicial action challenging the legal validity of the President's purported denunciation or abrogation of a treaty.

In observing that the Senate has not "established its authority" to join or veto the President, Henkin is no more than restating the fact that there has not yet been a definitive court decision squarely settling a conflict between the Executive and Senate in the Senate's favor.

Henkin would agree, I presume, that it is for the judicial branch to say what the law is, not for the President to create law by fiat until the courts speak. And, as we shall see, there is no basis in historical practice for claiming the President has established his authority to denounce or abrogate treaties without legislative participation in his decision. To the contrary, the overwhelming weight of precedents supports a role for the Senate or Congress in treaty abrogation.

The records of the Constitutional Convention and the State ratifying conventions contain little discussion of how a treaty is to be rescinded. But it is well-known that the Framers were concerned with restoring dependability to our treaties and were anxious to gain the respect and confidence of foreign nations. It would hardly instill confidence in other nations if a single officer of our government could abrogate a treaty at will without any check from another branch of government.

Also, it is beyond dispute that the Framers were worried the treaty power could be exercised to damage sectional interests. Repeated flareups occurred at the Constitutional Convention in which various delegates expressed fears that their region might be harmed if treaties could be easily made.

In particular, treaties of commerce, peace and alliance were mentioned. Spokesmen for the western settlers were afraid navigation rights on the Mississippi would be given away by a treaty, and George Mason suggested the treaty-making power could "sell the whole country" by means of treaties.

Thus, the Framers sought to give each section of the country an influence in deciding upon treaties because of their possible adverse effect upon strong economic or political interests of particular States or areas. It is logical to assume the Framers were as interested in protecting these same regional interests by making it difficult to revoke useful treaties as they were in protecting those interests by guarding against harmful treaties.[5] George Mason alluded to this situation when he warned against allowing one treaty to abridge another by which the common rights of navigation had been recognized to the United States.

This is not to say that the Framers would have been as excited about a defense treaty with a small republic 6,000 miles away as they were over treaties involving local fishing or boundary rights, but it is to indicate that the 1954 treaty and all other U.S. treaties are protected by the same procedural safeguards as those treaties about which the Framers were especially sensitive. Since the text of the Constitution makes no distinction between different groups of treaties—it does not single out those commercial or boundary treaties, which the Framers did not want to have discarded without the check of legislative deliberation, from treaties of all other kinds—the obvious conclusion is that treaties of whatever nature are covered by the same protective mantle before cancellation. If any one group of treaties is secured against repeal without legislative consent, then surely all other treaties enjoy the same security absent any textual or historical evidence to the contrary. All treaties were to be dealt with in the same way.

Proof that the Framers meant for treaties to be kept and not broken at pleasure is found in their emphasis on gaining respect for the new nation among other countries by being faithful to our treaties. James Madison, John Jay and James Wilson each recognized that the ease with which treaties could be and were being broken under the Articles of Confederation was a major defect causing injury both to our respectability and power abroad. Madison, in the preface to his notes on debates in the Constitutional Convention, specifically identifies this failing as being one of the deformities of the Articles which the Constitution was designed to correct. John Jay pinpoints this disease in number 22 of The Federalist Papers. Wilson regarded violation of the "sacred faith of treaties" as "wicked" and contrary to our interests in gaining respect among other nations.[6] Thus, the Farmers wanted to make it more difficult to violate treaties, not easier. Surely they would not have attempted to remedy the fault by substituting for the previous system one that was equally susceptible to abuse by a single official as the earlier one had been to the whims of individual states.

Another sign of the purpose of the Framers is in their creation of a system of checks and balances. In this age of concern about what is described as the Imperial Presidency, it is remarkable that anyone would contend the President is unchecked and unaccountable in a matter of such grave importance as breaking our treaties with other countries. We have seen that they wanted the nation to keep its treaties. Therefore, it is difficult to believe that the Framers, who created the President and Senate as checks upon each other in completing a trreaty, did not intend a similar check in the reverse situation, the revoking of a treaty.

As the scholar-jurist, Supreme Court Justice Joseph Story wrote in his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States in 1833:

"It is too much to expect, that a free people would confide to a single magistrate, however respectable, the sole authority to act conclusively, as well as exclusively, upon the subject of treaties . . . there is no American statesman, but must feel, that such a prerogative in an American president would be inexpedient and dangerous."

Story adds:

"The check, which acts upon the mind from the consideration, that what is done is but preliminary, and requires the assent of other independent minds to give it a legal conclusiveness, is a restraint which awakens caution, and compels to deliberations."[7]

The same fundamental principle that guided the Framers in providing that the President can make treaties only with the added deliberation called for when a branch of the legislature must jointly decide the question applies with equal force to the power of annulling treaties. To use Story's words about treaties, "this joint possession of the power affords a greater security for its just exercise, than the separate possession of it by either [the President or Senate].[8]

In my opinion, the Framers assumed the President would not attempt to break a treaty on his own, since Article II of the Constitution clearly requires that the President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." In other words, the President must uphold the laws because the Constitution tells him to do so.

As we all know, Article IV of the Constitution spells out the fact that a treaty is every bit as much a part of "the supreme Law of the Land" as a statute is. Therefore, the Framers undoubtedly expected future Presidents to carry out treaties in good faith and not to break them at their pleasure.

It is true the President is "the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations." So said John Marshall in 1800 as a member of the House of Representatives. Marshall's quote has been recited by federal courts on many occasions. At most, however, in the context of unmaking treaties this means it is the President who must communicate the message notifying another country that a treaty is void, and, as we shall see, even this much was denied by the 5th Congress which enacted a statute annulling three French treaties without providing for any notice by the President. It does not mean the President alone can make the decision to give that notice. Surely the President's implied power over foreign relations does not give him power to repeal the express provision of the Constitution that requires him to faithfully execute the laws. Nor does it override the system of balance of powers and accountability that the Framers have so carefully imbedded elsewhere in the Constitution. The people would lose the security of deliberation upon the subject of unmaking treaties, no less than they would lose that security in the making of treaties, if no check by Congress or the Senate were put upon the power of termination.

The general rule might be stated as follows: As the President alone cannot repeal a statute, so he alone cannot repeal a treaty. My colleagues in the Senate will find the truth of this expressed in a book that most of us keep on our desks, the Rules and Manual of the Senate. Our rules still include a precedent set forth by Thomas Jefferson, who compiled the first manual of rules and practices of the Senate when he was Vice President of the United States.

Jefferson writes: "Treaties being declared equally with the laws of the United States, to be the Supreme Law of the Land, it is understood that an act of the legislature alone can declare them infringed and rescinded."[9]

This also was the belief held by James Madison, who wrote in 1791, less than four years after the Constitutional Convention, of "the same authority, precisely, being exercised in annulling, as in making, a treaty."[10]

Historical practice supports Madison and Jefferson. Far more often than not the Senate, or the whole Congress, has exercised power to approve the termination of treaties. As a matter of fact, Presidents have usually come to Congress for its approval before giving notice of withdrawing from any treaty.

There are exceptions, but none supports a wide open power of the President to annul any treaty he wishes. In particular, the United States has never repudiated a defense treaty with a friendly nation.

Nor has any President terminated a treaty that was not breached by the other party, was not in conflict with or supplanted by a later Act of Congress or another treaty, or that did not become impossible to perform due to circumstances not of our own making.

CHAPTER 2—TERMINATING TREATIES: THE EARLY PRACTICE

It is a little known fact that the first treaties ever to be declared null and void by the United States were cancelled by Congress alone. These were the three French-American Treaties of 1778. Congress, acting through a public law, deemed them to be no longer binding on this country because they had "been repeatedly violated on the part of the French Government."[11]

This step followed attacks by French warships on unarmed American merchant vessels and the infamous X Y Z Affair in which the French sought to extract bribes from American peace negotiators.

The Abrogating Act of July 7, 1798, was approved by President Adams and it is true that to that extent there was presidential consent. However, the statute did not call upon the President to give notice of abrogation and it appears from the legislative debates that Congress assumed no further act was necessary on his part.

In 1887 the U.S. Court of Claims upheld the statute as having terminated both the domestic and the international aspects of the Franco-American treaties. In Hooper v. U.S. the court said:

"We are of the opinion that the circumstances justified the United States in annulling the treaties of 1778; that the act was a valid one, not only as a municipal statute but as between nations; and that thereafter the compacts were ended."[12]

This early precedent represents the clear admission by President Adams of a legislative role in the abrogation of a treaty, since he signed the law. It also is a concession by the Senate that, in at least some circumstances, the power to void treaties belongs to Congress as a corporate body, and not exclusively to the President and Senate.

The first instance of terminating a treaty by presidential notice did not occur until 1846, 57 years after the government started operations. The agreement rescinded was the convention allowing Great Britain to share joint occupation with America of the Oregon Territory. In response to strong pressure from the House of Representatives, President Polk recommended to Congress that he be given authority by law to give notice of the convention's annulment. The issue was heatedly debated in 1846, with the majority position being that the abrogation of a treaty is clearly a legislative duty that cannot be performed constitutionally by any other power than the joint power of both Houses of Congress. And so a joint resolution was enacted granting the requested power.

The third time we withdrew from a treaty was by the will of the President and Senate acting together as the treaty making power. In the Resolution of March 3, 1855, two thirds of the Senators present advised and consented to remove our commerce from what we believed were burdensome and oppressive duties under a commercial treaty with Denmark. The resolution authorized President Pierce to give Denmark notice, as required in the treaty for its termination, and it was in response to the expressed wish of the President for such power. President Pierce later publicly acknowledged he had given the notice "in pursuance of the authority conferred" by the Senate resolution.

Curiously, our government used three different methods the first three times it withdrew or denounced treaties as void. While the measures differed, the significant thing is that each approach required some form of legislative participation in the decision to cancel a treaty.

In practice, an Act of Congress would never again be used without anticipating presidential notice as the means of communicating our intention to annul a treaty to the foreign government concerned and a Senate resolution would be used only once more. As we shall see, the joint resolution, followed by presidential notice to the other country, would become the general vehicle for removing our nation from treaties that we no longer could or wished to enforce. On rare occasions, Congress would also consent to adopt and ratify presidential decisions after they had been proclaimed.

Senate committee claims joint power

Publicity of the method used in abrogating the treaty with Denmark aroused a storm in Congress. Doubt was even raised in the Senate itself. But the controversy was not over whether the Senate had invaded a presidential prerogative. Rather, the issue was whether the treaty should properly have been annulled by the full Congress.

In response to this debate, the Foreign Relations Committee issued a report on April 7, 1856, strongly claiming for the Senate, acting together with the President, competence to terminate a treaty "without the aid or intervention of legislation" by both Houses of Congress. Pertinent to the Taiwan treaties, the committee asserted that "where the right to terminate a treaty as discretion is reserved in the treaty itself, such discretion resides in the President and Senate." [13]

The committee reasoned as follows:

"The whole power to bind the Government by treaty is vested in the President and Senate, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring. The treaty in question was created by the will of the treaty-making power, and it contained a reservation by which that will should be revoked or its exercise cease on a stipulated notice. It is thus the will of the treaty-making power which is the subject of revocation, and it follows that the revocation is incident to the will.[14]

The committee conceded that in certain cases it would be wise to have the concurrence of the House of Representatives in order to make the decision to annul a treaty appear more impressive upon the other government. Thus, the committee took the position:

"Although it be true, as an exercise of Constitutional power, that the advice of the Senate alone is sufficient to enable the President to give the notice, it does not follow that the joint assent of the Senate and House of Representatives involves a denial of the separate power of the Senate." [15]

In May of 1858, the Foreign Relations Committee boldly reaffirmed its position by changing a proposed joint resolution, authorizing the President to give Hanover the notice required for the termination of a treaty, to a mere Senate resolution.

Congress rebukes Lincoln

The first time a President openly attempted to terminate a treaty without any prior legislative approval was late in 1864, when President Lincoln notified Great Britain of our withdrawal from the Rush-Baggot Convention regulating naval forces upon the Great Lakes. This episode does not serve as a precedent for unilateral presidential action because Congress rushed to defend its prerogative by passing a joint resolution deeming Lincoln's conduct invalid until ratified and confirmed by Congress. Some persons argue the the Rush-Baggot accord was an executive agreement, not a treaty, since it originated in an exchange of notes between Canada and the United States. This would further deprive the incident of any value it may have as a precedent.

Senate debate was dominated by senators who argued that the act of the President was wholly invalid until adopted by Congress. The prevailing view was expressed by Senator Garrett Davis of Kentucky, who said: "It is indispensably incumbent and necessary, in order to secure the termination of this treaty, that it shall be terminated, not by the action of the President, but by the action of Congress." [16]

Senator Charles Sumner of Massachusetts agreed that "the intervention of Congress is necessary to the termination of this treaty. . . ." He explained that the legislation embodied the conclusion that since a treaty is a part of the law of the land, it is "to be repealed or set aside only as other law is repealed or set aside: that is by act of Congress." [17]

Congress did not wait long to reaffirm its position. The joint resolution of January 8, 1865, charged President Lincoln with the duty of communicating notice of termination of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 with Great Britain. The same legislative formula was used in June of 1874, when Congress enacted a law authorizing President Grant to give notice of termination of our Treaty of Commerce and Navigation of 1857 with Belgium.

Two years later, the same President sent a curious message to Congress appearing to acknowledge the need for a legislative role in the termination of treaties while asserting power to decline enforcement of a treaty he thought has been abrogated by the other party.

Grant's message of June 10, 1876, regarding the extradition article of the Treaty of 1842 with Great Britain, said:

"It is for the wisdom of Congress to determine whether the article of the treaty relating to extradition is to be any longer regarded obligatory on the Government of the United States or as forming part of the supreme law of the land." [18]

He added, however:

"Should the attitude of the British Government remain unchanged, I shall not, without an expression of the wish of Congress that I should do so, take any action either in making or granting requisitions for the surrender of fugitive criminals under the treaty of 1842." [19]

At most, this is a precedent for presidential authority to consider a breach of a treaty as having suspended it by making enforcement impossible, subject to the correction of the President's judgment by Congress.

Hayes vetoes law, but concedes legislative role

In 1879, President Hayes recognized the joint power of Congress in terminating treaties, although it was in the process of vetoing an Act of Congress. The legislature had passed a statute seeking to require him to abrogate two articles of the Burlingame Treaty of 1868 with China. His veto rested on the ground that the legislation amended an existing treaty by striking out selected provisions of it.

The power to amend treaties, he said, is "not lodged by the Constitution in Congress, but in the President, by and with the consent of the Senate. . . ." [20]

Hayes also conceded that the "authority of Congress to terminate a treaty with a foreign power by expressing the will of the nation no longer to adhere to it is . . . free from controversy under our Constitution." [21] Thus, he made no claim of power for the Executive to annual a treaty without legislative approval. but rather upheld the traditional joint role of the President and Senate together to make or modify treaties.

In 1883, Congress passed another joint resolution reaffirming a legislative role in the termination of treaties. This law, the Act of February 26, 1883, flatly directed President Arthur to give notice of the termination of several articles of an 1871 treaty with Great Britain.

Occasionally, Presidents have given notice of our nation's withdrawal from a treaty on the basis of their interpretation of congressional intent. This occurs when Congress passes legislation in conflict with a prior treaty, but does not specifically direct our withdrawal from the treaty.

Since the President cannot enforce two equally valid laws which are in conflict, he is compelled to select the one which reflects the current will of Congress. While the President may seem to be using his own power, he actually is fulfilling his duty to faithfully execute the laws by enforcing the latest expression of Congress on the subject.

An interesting example of this principle in practice is found in the events leading up to denunciation of certain parts of the 1850 Commercial Convention with Switzerland. Following enactment of the Tariff Act of July 24, 1897, the United States entered into a reciprocity agreement with France under authority specifically granted to the President by that law. The Swiss government promptly claimed a right under the most-favored nation clause of the convention to enjoy the same concessions for Swiss imports as we had given French products.

We responded that it was our long-continuing policy not to construe the most-favored nation clause as entitling a third government to demand benefits of a special trade agreement purchased by another party with equivalent concessions. In other words, we told the Swiss they could not receive something for nothing. If we made an exception in their case, it would embarrass us in relations with all other trading partners.

Moreover, the 1897 Tariff Act had reaffirmed this historic policy. Section 3 specifically provided that the President is to negotiate commercial agreements "in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions may be secured in favor of the products and manufactures of the United States." The President lacked authority to conclude agreements in which the other country made no concessions, and if he had yielded to the Swiss demand it would have been out of line with the clear policy of the law.

Thus, in the face of Switzerland's refusal to renegotiate the contested articles of the agreement, the State Department notified her that the provisions were arrested. Although the State Department would later claim this action served as a precedent for independent presidential power, it would have been inconsistent with the trade policy set by Congress in the 1897 law if Switzerland had been granted privileged treatment without making any compensating concessions. In any event, President McKinley did not act in the total absence of any pertinent supporting statute as proponents of abrogating the defense treaty with Taiwan are urging President Carter to do.

Another action mistakenly asserted in support of Executive treaty-breaking is the effort of President Taft to head off passage by Congress of what he considered an inflammatory resolution calling for abrogation of the Commercial Treaty of 1832 between the United States and Russia. Disputes had arisen with Russia as early as then over the treatment of Americans of the Jewish faith, and in December 13, 1911, the House of Representatives passed a strongly-worded joint resolution demanding termination of the treaty. In order to beat action by the Senate, President Taft informed Russia on December 15 of our intention to terminate the treaty.

On December 18, the President dutifully gave notice of his action to the Senate "as a part of the treaty-making power of this Government, with a view to its ratification and approval." [22] He openly recognized the need for the Senate and the President to act together in order to end an existing treaty and made no claim that his diplomatic notice would have an validity without legislative approval.

Both Houses of Congress passed a joint resolution, which the President signed on December 21, just three days after his message to the Senate. The House vote was 301 to 1, and the Senate vote was unanimous, proving that the President's advance notice to Russia was a concession to recognized congressional power, rather than a sign of independent authority of the President.

Wilson challenges Congress, but concedes joint role

Congress again asserted its power in the Seamen's Act of March 5, 1915. This law ordered President Wilson to notify several countries of the termination of all articles in treaties and conventions of the United States "in conflict with this act." The notices were duly given and the authority of Congress to impose this obligation on the President was upheld by the Supreme Court in a case discussed below. Twenty-five treaties were affected.

Then, in the Merchant Marine Act of 1920, Congress directed President Wilson to give blanket notice of the termination of all provisions in treaties which imposed any restriction on the right of the United States to vary its duties on imports, depending upon whether the carrier vessels were domestic or foreign. This time President Wilson rebuffed the legislature by announcing that he must distinguish between the power of Congress to enact a substantive law inconsistent with entire treaties and the power to piecemeal call for the violation of parts of treaties. This law was not an effort to terminate treaties, he contended, but to modify them, which Congress could not do.[23]

A memorandum prepared by Secretary of State Hughes for President Harding in October of 1921 also conceded the power of Congress to terminate entire treaties if it so provided in clear and unambiguous language. While Congress had called only for a partial termination in the Merchant Marine Act, the law would have the practical effect of a total termination. If Congress actually intended to abrogate entire treaties, Hughes reasoned, it must say so in plain language.[24]

The positions taken by Presidents Wilson and Harding were a refusal to interpret a law as conveying an intention by Congress to violate numerous treaties outright. There was no presidential denial of the power of Congress to direct the abrogation of treaties when "its intention is unequivocally expressed," and especially absent was any claim for the President of a power to terminate treaties without the shared responsibility of the Congress.[25]

Evidence of President Wilson's recognition of the essential role of Congress in the treaty annulment process is found in the fact that he first sought the advice and consent of the Senate before attempting to withdraw from the International Sanitary Convention of 1903. Only after two-thirds of the Senate present resolved to "advise and consent to the denunciation of the said Convention" on May 26, 1921, by which time Harding had become President, did the United States give notice of its intention to withdraw.

CHAPTER 3—TERMINATING TREATIES: MODERN PRACTICE

This brings us up to more recent practice, some of which at first impression may appear to break with the almost universal prior practice of terminating treaties, and giving notice of intent to terminate, only following legislative approval or ratification. Starting in 1927, there are nine instances in which Presidents have given notice of the termination of treaties without receiving accompanying congressional authority or seeking ratification.

Upon close examination, however, the recent record does not support an untrammeled power of the President to annul any treaty he wishes. In two instances the notice of termination was withdrawn and the United States did not denounce the treaties. Two other treaties were abrogated because they were inconsistent with more recent legislation of Congress and one was plainly superseded by our obligation under a later treaty. The remaining four appear to have been annulled or suspended after it became impossible to effectively carry them out. In addition, there are five recent instances where notice has been given pursuant to Acts of Congress.

The following treaties are involved: In 1927, President Coolidge gave notice that the 1925 Convention for Prevention of Smuggling with Mexico was terminated. At the time, United States relations with Mexico were the subject of emotional debate in Congress regarding alleged religious persecution and the confiscation of American-owned private and oil lands in Mexico. In the disruptive situation of the period, it appears to have been impossible to implement the Convention.

In 1933, President Franklin Roosevelt gave notice of termination of an extradition treaty with Greece. But the notice was withdrawn and the treaty was not abrogated. The incident was triggered because Greece had refused to extradite an individual accused of fraud. Thus, the President's proposed action was based on the fact the treaty had already been voided by breach of the other party.

Also in 1933, President Roosevelt terminated the 1927 Traffic Convention as having a restrictive effect on the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933. Then, in 1936, he terminated the 1871 Treaty of Commerce with Italy because its provisions would limit the President's ability to carry out the Trade Agreements Act of June 1934. In both these cases the treaties were inconsistent with prevailing legislation.

In 1939, President Roosevelt notified Japan of our nation's intent to terminate the Commercial Treaty of 1911. Although the Department of State argued broadly that "the power to denounce a treaty inheres in the President of the United States in his capacity as Chief Executive of a sovereign state," President Roosevelt's authority clearly stemmed out of acts of war by Japan toward allied nations.[26] In fact, it was persuasively argued in the Senate that the President was compelled to denounce the 1911 Treaty with Japan because of our obligations under a later treaty, the Nine Power Agreement, committing the United States to respect the territorial integrity of China. After the invasion of China by Japan, we would have aided in the violation of that obligation by adhering to the Japanese treaty.[27]

On October 3, 1939, the State Department gave notice of our intention to suspend operation of the London Naval Treaty of 1936. Our stated reason was the changed circumstances resulting from the earlier suspension by several other parties to the treaty. In view of the state of war then existing in Europe it was impossible to carry out a treaty that was supposed to limit naval armaments and promote the exchange of information concerning naval construction.

The next precedent occurred in August of 1941, when the International Load Line Convention governing ocean shipping was suspended by President Roosevelt. He relied on the opinion of Acting Attorney General Biddle that, as in the case of the Naval Treaty, fundamental changes in the circumstances created an impossibility of performance. Accordingly, Roosevelt suspended the convention for the duration of the war emergency because of aggression then being waged by Germany, Italy, Japan and the Soviet Union.

It is interesting that the opinion of the Acting Attorney General declared: "It is not proposed that the United States denounce the convention . . ., nor that it be otherwise abrogated. Consequently, action by the Senate or by the Congress is not required."[28]

From this, it is obvious the incident cannot be considered as support for independent presidential action. To the contrary, it appears to be an admission by the Acting Attorney General that some legislative approval is normally required for the abrogation of a treaty.

A recent, but not the latest, assertion of the abrogation power by Congress occurred in 1951. In that year, Congress enacted the Trade Agreements Extension Act instructing President Truman to terminate trade concessions to Communist countries. Most of them were granted by executive agreements, but two, those with Poland and Hungary, involved formal treaties. The required notices were promptly given by President Truman.

A fundamental change in circumstances resulting in an actual impossibility of performance was again invoked by the United States in announcing our withdrawal in 1955 from the 1923 Convention on Uniformity of Nomenclature for the Classification of Merchandise. The U.S. notice specifically observed that the convention had been "rendered inapplicable" since a fundamental component, the Brussels nomenclature of 1913, had itself "become outdated."

An aborted incident occurred in November of 1965, when the United States announced its planned withdrawal from the Warsaw Convention, relating to recovery of damages by international air passengers who suffer death or personal injury. One day before the effective date of the withdrawal, the United States withdrew its notice. At least two legal commentators reacted with publication of articles condemning the power grab by President Johnson as unconstitutional.[29]

Next, we furnished notice of terminating the 1902 commercial convention with Cuba. This step was an integral part of the U.S. economic embargo of Castro's Cuba, declared on February 2, 1962, in which we were joined by the Organization of American States. The notice, given August 21, 1962, preceded President Kennedy's naval blockade of Cuba by only eight weeks.

The President acted under provisions of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Export Control Act of 1948. Also, he had ample authority to impose a trade embargo under the Trading with the Enemy Act and Mutual Assistance Act of 1954, known as the Battle Act. Notice of terminating the commercial convention was a mere formality mandated by a national policy authorized and sanctioned by Congress.

Termination of the convention also was in accordance with the Punta del Este Agreement of January 1962 by which the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of most American nations resolved, by application of the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance of 1947, to embargo trade with Cuba in arms and implements of war of every kind and to study extending the embargo to other items. Article 8 of the 1947 treaty specifically contemplated such a "partial or complete interruption of economic relations."

Finally, Congress may be said to have ratified the decision in September of 1962, if any ratification were needed, by enacting the joint resolution known as the Cuban Resolution. This legislation recognized broad authority in the President to take whatever means may be necessary to prevent Cuba from "exporting its aggressive purposes" in the hemisphere and to prevent establishment of a Soviet military base. Thus, the termination was at one and the same time ratified and authorized by legislation and in accordance with a treaty later in time.

The most recent incidents of treaty termination followed enactment of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976. This law establishes a 200 mile-limit fishery conservation zone within which we shall exercise exclusive management authority over nearly all fish and extends our exclusive authority even beyond the zone.

Section 202(b) of the law directs the Secretary of State to initiate the renegotiation of any treaty which pertains to fishing within these management areas and is "in any manner inconsistent with the purposes, policy, or provisions of this Act, in order to conform such treaty to such purposes, policy, and provisions." The section also declares "the sense of Congress that the United States shall withdraw from any such treaty, in accordance with its provisions, if such treaty is not so renegotiated within a reasonable period of time after such date of enactment."

Pursuant to this express statement of national policy by Congress, the Department of State has given notice of our withdrawal from the 1949 International Convention for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries and the 1952 International Convention for the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean. Notice regarding the former convention was given on June 22, 1976, and notice regarding the latter agreement was made on February 10, 1977. These two annulments, the latest on record, may fairly be classified as having occurred pursuant to specific congressional authorization and direction.

A number of other treaties have been terminated by ratification of new treaties on the same subject. This form of treaty abrogation does not have bearing on purported Executive independence, except that it obviously follows affirmative action by the Senate.

None of this type of treaties, usually covering technical subjects, has been included in the above listing and they are mentioned here only to prevent confusion arising from a failure to identify them. In these cases, the Senate in effect advises and consents to the termination of one treaty and its substitution by another in the very act of agreeing to ratification of the new treaty, it being a well settled diplomatic practice that a later treaty supersedes or revises an earlier one on the same subject.[30]

The historical usage described above upholds the general position asserted by the late Professor Edward Corwin, one of this century's foremost authorities on the Constitution, who wrote:

"(A)ll in all, it appears that legislative precedent, which moreover is generally supported by the attitude of the Executive, sanctions the proposition that the power of terminating the international compacts to which the United States is party belongs, as a prerogative of sovereignty, to Congress alone."[31]

The only clarification I would add to Professor Corwin's statement is that the abrogation of a treaty also can be made by the exercise of the treaty-making power itself, meaning the President together with two-thirds of the Senate, or possibly if Congress goes along, by prompt congressional ratification of a Presidential initiative.

Also, it may be conceded for purposes of the situation at hand, our treaty relations with the Republic of China, that history indicates the President may, if Congress raised no objection, determine whether or not a treaty (1) has been superseded by a later law or treaty inconsistent with or clearly intended to revise an earlier one, (2) has already been abrogated because of its violation by the other party, or (3) cannot be carried out because conditions essential to its continued effectiveness no longer exist and the change is not the result of our own action.

It is important to note that none of the exceptions recorded above applies to the Republic of China. She has faithfully adhered to all our treaties with her and has not given us any cause to consider them void.

Nor could impossibility of performance be raised as an excuse, because we would be the party at fault. As proposed by the sympathizers of Communist China, our break in treaty relations with Taiwan would follow recognition of the mainland regime. The basis for our annulment of the treaty would be our own voluntary action in breaking diplomatic ties with Taiwan.

It is clear international law forbids a nation from raising a change in circumstances as the ground for terminating a treaty where that change results from an action of the party invoking it. This is spelled out in the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which the United States has signed, but not yet ratified.

Article 61 of that Convention reads:

"Impossibility of performance may not be invoked by a party as a ground for terminating, withdrawing from or suspending the operation of a treaty if the impossibility is the result of a breach by that party either of an obligation under the treaty or of any other international obligation owed to any other party to the treaty."

Article 62 of the same Convention also provides that a "fundamental change of circumstances may not be invoked as a ground for terminating or withdrawing from a treaty . . . if the fundamental change is the result of a breach by the party invoking it. . . ."

Thus, it would not only be a dishonor to the United States and a violation of the Constitution if the President should unilaterally break our treaties with Taiwan, but it would be a violation of international law as well.

In the words of the Department of State itself at an earlier time in our history: "Such a course would be wholly irreconcilable with the historical respect which the United States has shown for its international engagements, and would falsify every profession of all belief in the binding force and the reciprocal obligation of treaties in general."[32]

CHAPTER 4—TERMINATING TREATIES: THE NATURE OF U.S.-REPUBLIC OF CHINA RELATIONS

This leaves the question of whether a treaty can be entered into with a government that we do not recognize. If, for the sake of argument, the United States should break relations with Taiwan, can we still have treaties with her?

Yes. We can. Although we have never before withdrawn recognition from any friendly country, we have had dealings in the past with powers whom we have not recognized so long as they have exercised practical control over a particular area. Mainland China is a case in point.

The past international experience of our own and other governments bears out the validity of this practice. For example, the Netherlands at one and the same time recognized the official government of Spain while entering into formal treaty relations with the government of the Franco regime in 1938. And, in the 1950's, Egypt concluded several treaties with East Germany and Communist China without recognizing those countries.

As to the United States, we not only currently have a liaison office in Communist China, but we dealt with the Communist regime once to negotiate the armistice in Korea and again during the 1954 Geneva Conference on the reunification of Korea. Also, in 1962, the United States concluded an international agreement on Laos to which Communist China was an official party.

Other precedents involving the United States include the Postal Conventions of 1924 and 1929 to which both we and the Soviet Union became parties, even though the United States did not then recognize the USSR. Then there is a well-known political treaty, the Kellogg-Briand Pact of 1929 for the renunciation of war. The United States, which did not recognize the Soviet Union, nevertheless agreed to invite her to become a party. We even went so far as to send Russia a diplomatic note reminding her of Russian obligations under the Pact, again prior to having diplomatic relations with her.

Another example is the Nuclear Weapons Test Ban Treaty of 1963, which appoints three depositories for new members in order to enable both Communist China and Taiwan, and East Germany, to become parties along with nations that do not recognize them. The United States, which does not recognize Communist China, extended an invitation to it to come into the agreement.

The question of having dealings with a non-recognized power was examined in the context of our China policy by Stanford University law professor Victor Li in a 1977 study sponsored by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Professor Li concluded that there are no legal impediments to considering Communist China as the de jure government of China, while the Taiwan authorities are regarded as being in de facto administrative control of the territory and population of Taiwan.

If the Taiwan authorities were regarded as having practical power over a territorial entity, whether or not it is called a state, Professor Li writes that international law contemplates the possibility "that treaties applying to territory actually controlled by Taiwan would remain in force even after withdrawal of de jure recognition."[33]

Professor Li concludes his paper by specifically declaring:

International law does not require that treaties affecting only the territories controlled by the Taiwan authorities must lapse. On the contrary, there is strong support for protecting on-going relations, especially those involving commercial affairs and private rights.[34]

In his authoritative book, Nonrecognition and Treaty Relations, Dr. Bernard R. Bot agrees that derecognition of a government does not automatically suspend or terminate treaties previously entered into by that government. To the contrary, he argues:

"A nonrecognized state can be a party to international agreements provided that its de facto authorities carry on, even if only as agents, the external relations and can avail themselves of the resources of the territory and control the population if necessary, for the purpose of observing treaty obligations assumed."[35]

Moreover, Dr. Bot finds "that nonrecognition of states and governments does not necessarily impede the latter's capacity to conclude bilateral treaties."[36] He adds, "it becomes increasingly clear that the criterion for participation in multilateral treaties is no longer the recognition status, but the issue of political desirability."[37]

Thus no impediments exist in international law which would prevent the United States from dealing both with the People's Republic of China as the legally recognized government of China and with the Republic of China on Taiwan as the separate authorities in control of a portion of the Chinese state.

The recognition power differs from treaty abrogation

Another matter to be resolved is whether the recognition power itself gives the President the power to terminate treaties. The one power does not follow from the other, although Alexander Hamilton once argued that in special circumstances they do.

In the course of his famous debates with James Madison over the constitutionality of President Washington's Proclamation of Neutrality among warring France and Britain in 1793, Hamilton, writing as Pacificus, claimed:

"The right of the executive to receive ambassadors and other public ministers . . . includes that of judging, in the case of a revolution of government in a foreign country, whether the new rulers are competent organs of the national will, and ought to be recognized, or not; which, where a treaty antecedently exists between the United States and such nation, involves the power of continuing or suspending its operation. For until the new government is acknowledged, the treaties between the nations, so far at least as regards public rights, are of course suspended." [38]

Hamilton was writing of a situation where only one government, that of the rebels, survived a revolution. He was not considering the situation where there are two competing powers demanding recognition, one representing the former legitimate authorities and the other the insurrectionists. In particular, Hamilton made no reference to a setting in which the United States had continued recognition of the original authorities following a revolution and had even entered into a treaty with that same government after the revolution, as is true in the case of the ROC.

Far from this being an instance where all treaties between the nations were suspended, as in Hamilton's supposition, here the Mutual Defense Treaty was concluded years after the revolution. For us to renounce that treaty by switching recognition after a quarter of a century's adherence to it would be a new development of our own making, not an immediate and unavoidable result of a revolution. Thus, Hamilton's argument is inapplicable to present Sino-American relations.

It would be sheer legal gimmickry for anyone to argue that the recogition power carries with it the power to abrogate our treaties with the ROC. It might as well be claimed that recognition includes the power to make formal treaties independently of the Senate.

As discussed above, should the United States now decide to drop relations with the ROC, the question of whether treaties and other international agreements with her would continue in effect would be left up to mutual agreement between the United States and the still de facto government of Taiwan.

Thus, it is clear that should we switch embassies from Taipei to Peking, no rule or tradition of domestic or international law would require the President to consider treaties with the authorities on Taiwan as having lapsed. Rather this would become a political decision to be determined by political reasons, not by legal theory or grounds. And since, as we have seen, the Constitution demands a legislative role in such a political decision, a presidential act of derecognition could not annul those treaties absent the separate, concurring decision of Congress or the Senate.

The removal power cannot be equated with the treaty termination power

At a recent Washington, D.C. seminar on China, the main speaker, one of the leading proponents of immediate recognition of the mainland China regime, attempted to justify his opinion that the President may terminate a treaty without the consent of the Senate or Congress by drawing a curious analogue to the removal power. Since it is well settled that the President can remove cabinet members and other high officials of the Executive Branch, who have been appointed "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," without returning to the Senate for its further consent, so it is claimed the President can remove treaties which have been made "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

This line of argument is totally unsatisfactory for the following reasons. First, it is nonsense to equate the President's relationship to subordinate officials of his own Administration with the relationship of this country to other sovereign nations. Allowing the President to dismiss officers whom the Constitution has plainly under him is one thing. But allowing the President to discard a formal treaty entered into between our government and our legal peer under international law, another sovereignty, is quite a different matter. There is simply no factual ground on which to make a parallel between the two powers.

Second, unlike the case of the removal power, there is a specific constitutional provision which conflicts with any inference of the power to terminate treaties. As we have seen, the President is directed by the Constitution to faithfully execute the laws. Another provision of the Constitution tells us that a treaty is a law. Thus, the President would run afoul of express provisions of the Constitution if he should attempt to unilaterally terminate a treaty. The novel doctrine that a power to annul a treaty can be implied where it runs squarely into express provisions of the Constitution on the basis that a power to remove officers has been implied where there are no conflicting express provisions of the Constitution cannot be sustained.

Third, the need for application of the checks and balances feature of the Constitution is still acute in the case of the proposed termination of treaties, but is not felt in the case of removing Executive officers. The presidential power of removing officials who are placed under this direction is not surprising. The power aids in the smooth performance of his conduct of the government without the potential sabotage or disruption of his program caused by inferior officers who disagree with his policy or are discovered to be incompetent.

In contrast, his decision to annul a treaty or allow a treaty to lapse is a decision of the highest national importance. Instead of aiding in carrying out the laws, it does just the opposite. It has the effect of breaking or negating a law. Such a decision is surely the kind of public action which the Framers did not want taken until it had received great deliberation. The termination of a formal compact with another sovereign nation is exactly the type of situation where the checks and balances doctrine has its fullest force and effect. The added deliberation called for, if the decision must be sent to the Senate for its advice and consent before its completion, offers security to the people that an action of major consequences will not be taken lightly or without an opportunity for adequate consideration. Thus, the removal power is not comparable to the treaty termination power.

To this point I have emphasized the clear logic of the Constitution itself and the lessons to be drawn from historical usage. Judicial precedents have not been cited because there simply are no court holdings squarely deciding a conflict between the President and the Senate or Congress over the treaty abrogation power.

What few related cases exist can be discussed briefly. First, there is a 1913 Supreme court decision, Charleton v. Kelly,[39] which some commentators argue supports a discretion for the President to interpret whether a treaty is void in circumstances where the other party violates it. But the case has no application to the situation where the President, without legislative approval, seeks to declare a treaty void when no breach has occurred. Moreover, Charleton involved an extradition treaty with Italy which neither the Executive nor Congress wanted to void. Since the treaty was not denounced, the case is not even a decisive ruling for the single situation where a breach occurs.

A second case is Van der Weyde v. Ocean Transport Company in 1936.[40] Here, the Supreme Court decided that since Congress had directed the President by the Seamen's Act of 1915 to give notice of the termination of treaty provisions in conflict with that Act, "it was incumbent" upon him to determine the inconsistency between the law and a treaty with Norway.

The Court expressly avoided any question "as to the authority of the Executive in the absence of congressional action, or of action by the treaty-making power, to denounce a treaty. . . ." [41] But it did appear to recognize the power of Congress to require the President to interpret whether a treaty is inconsistent with a statute.

A third case involving treaty abrogation is Clark v. Allen,[42] where the Supreme Court examined the question of whether the outbreak of war necessarily suspends or abrogates treaties. On its face, this 1947 case involved a construction of national policy expressed in an Act of Congress, the Trading with the Enemy Act.

Although it is dicta, the pertinent part of the opinon for our analysis comes from the favorable use by the Court of a statement made by then New York State Court Judge Cardozo: "[The] President and Senate may denounce the treaty, and thus terminate its life. Congress may enact an inconsistent rule, which will control the action of the courts." [43]

By favorably quoting this interpretation of the treaty abrogation power, the Supreme Court seems to have approved the proposition that either the Senate or Congress must participate in the annulment of a treaty.

Two other voices from the bench add weight to the power of Congress in this field. In an opinion he published with the case of Ware v. Hylton in 1796, Supreme Court Justice Iredell twice emphasized his belief that Congress alone has "authority under our Government" of declaring a treaty vacated by reason of the breach by the other party.[44] Although his statements were dicta to the Court's decision, they are significant as an 18th Century understanding of the annulment power by one of the original members of the first Supreme Court.

In his Commentaries on the Constitution, Justice Story declared that the treaty power "will be found to partake more of the legislative, than of the executive character." [45] He also explained it is essential treaties "should have the obligation and force of a law, that they may be executed by the judicial power and be obeyed like other laws. This will not prevent them from being cancelled or abrogated by the nation upon grave and suitable occasions; for it will not be disputed that they are subject to the legislative power, and may be repealed, like other laws, at its pleasure." [46] (Emphasis added.)

From what few judicial pronouncements exist, there is no basis for Executive power over treaty abrogation and some, but not definitive, authority for congressional power. Although the issue is ultimately a legal one, the answer lies in history and the Constitution, not in earlier cases.

Breach of ROC treaties would affect private rights

Not only the Mutual Defense Treaty is involved in the scheme to allow our treaties with the ROC to lapse. The 1977 Department of State publication Treaties in Force lists at least 59 treaties and other agreements now in effect between the two nations. If the United States were to adopt the approach put forward on behalf of the Communist Chinese, every one of these agreements would fall, not just the formal treaties.

It should be observed that this group of international agreements concerns such important subjects as shoe and textile quotas, aviation landing rights, tariffs on imports and exports, guarantees of American investments of private capital in Taiwan, safeguard of nuclear materials, and protection of rights of American citizens located in Taiwan.

It is irresponsible to propose that all these agreements shall be simultaneously extinguished upon recognition of Communist China, yet this is the logical extension of the policy being urged upon President Carter. As indicated, many of these agreements establish rights for private individuals and businesses. Considering them as having lapsed would create serious political and economic consequences and open a flood of litigation by private parties whose interests are adversely affected by such a government policy.

Impact upon other treaties

Another potential implication of presidential discretion to void treaties which has not been considered, publicly at least, by proponents of the concept, is its effect upon the basic meaning of the rule of law to a free people.

If a President can violate any treaty he wants, what becomes of the order and stability in which law is supposed to operate?

If a President, independently of Congress, can withdraw from the Universal Copyright Convention, for example, what happens to private rights that were protected by this Convention?

If a President chooses to violate the Outer Space Treaty, which prohibits our nation from placing in orbit around the earth any objects carrying nuclear weapons, what effect would this have upon world stability?

The fact that the defense treaty with Taiwan includes a provision regarding duration in no way adds to presidential power. A moment's reflection will confirm that judgment. Remember, the defense treaty with Taiwan does not stand alone. Nearly every treaty this nation has with other countries contains a provision similar to the one in our treaty with Taiwan.

It is true that section X of the 1954 treaty states: "Either Party may terminate it one year after notice has been given to the other Party."

It is also true that this provision is repeated in similar terms in nearly all our bilateral or multilateral treaties. For example, NATO, the Test Ban Treaty, the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, the Biological Weapons Convention, the Universal Copyright Convention, and the Outer Space Treaty all contain provisions expressly laying down agreed ways the parties can terminate them with one year's or less notice having been given to the other parties. If the Taiwan defense treaty were interpreted as allowing the President alone to provide such notice, each of the above treaties would be hostage to the sole discretion of the Executive. This news would undoubtedly come as a surprise to the Senate which has advised and consented to each of these documents without being informed of any such design.

Without fear of contradiction, I can predict an uproar among my colleagues, for example, should any President assert power to unilaterally, without giving an opportunity for prior deliberation in the Senate or Congress, violate the Nonproliferation Treaty by transferring nuclear warheads to South Africa.

The truth is that were the shoe reversed, many Americans who are falling all over themselves to give in to every demand by Communist China, would be the first to condemn unilateral presidential action of a kind they do not like. They have not thought through the possible implications of the legal theory they are asking President Carter to adopt, and if they would, the fallacy in their proposal would be obvious.

Moreover, an examination of each of the formal treaties described above which have been denounced or terminated by the United States in the past reveals that nearly all included provisions allowing withdrawal upon notice.[47] The fact that Presidents have generally interpreted provisions regarding duration as still requiring them to seek congressional or at least senatorial approval before giving notice to the other party proves that inclusion of such a provision in a treaty does not change the domestic constitutional arrangement of powers between the Executive and Congress.

As shown above, Congress has heretofore collaborated in the termination of over 40 treaties by enacting a joint resolution, agreeing to a Senate resolution or by Act of Congress. Congress obviously believed it retained a role in the treaty abrogation process in each of these instances, all but three of which involved the annulment of treaties having duration provisions. There is no record to the contrary showing that the existence of such provisions in treaties has any relation to the powers of the President and Congress.

It may belabor the subject to point out the obvious, but treaties never say they can be terminated after notice given by "the President" or "head of state" of any government. Rather the customary phrase specifies that when notice is made it shall be given by one of the "parties" to the treaty.

The term "party" means the government of the state or international personality involved, which compels a reference to the constitutional processes of that government in order to determine the manner in which the decision to give notice shall be made. In our case, this brings us back to the fact that under the Constitution the power is a joint one shared by the President and Senate or Congress.

Conclusion

In conclusion, no President acting alone can abrogate, or give notice of the intention to abrogate, our existing treaties with the government on Taiwan. Of course, neither the Senate, nor Congress, will agree to dropping those treaties.

It is the clear instruction of history that the President cannot give valid notice of an intention to withdraw from a treaty, let alone void a treaty in violation of the formalities required by any provision it may contain regarding duration, without the approval or ratification of two-thirds of the Senate or a majority of both Houses of Congress. Any President who would seek to thwart this constitutional mandate runs the risk of impeachment.

This is not a threat. It is a simple statement of fact which those who are unwisely urging this course of action upon the President should understand. They apparently do not know the consequence of what they are asking the President to do.

For it must be clearly understood that the check of impeachment is one of the safeguards provided by the Founding Fathers against political offenses, such as an irresponsible abuse by a President of a constitutional discretion.[48] In fact, a study made by the Library of Congress in 1974 on the abrogation of treaties concludes by observing that where a conflict arises between the President and the Senate or Congress over the question of abrogation of a treaty, and the President acts contrary to the wishes of the Senate or Congress, the President "might be impeached."[49]

This answers the too clever reasoning of the legal adviser of the Department of State which surfaced in a 1936 memorandum to President Roosevelt. His argument contended that the failure of the Congress or the Senate to approve the action of the President in giving notice of intention to terminate a treaty would be of no avail because once the notice is given, the foreign government concerned may decline to accept a withdrawal of such a notice.[50] What the argument failed to note is that even if the foreign government is entitled and wants to rely on such a notice without inquiring into the constitutional authority of the President, this does not change the domestic constitutional situation of the President in relation to the Senate or Congress.[51] The President is still answerable to the Constitution and accountable to the Congress and people.

[30] This is not to infer that American territory or property can be ceded by a treaty which abrogates an earlier one under which such land or property was originally conveyed to the United States. both Houses of Congress before such a transfer is valid.

Pink*, 315 U.S. 203 (1941), upholding Presidential power to enter into an executive agreement assigning certain Soviet claims to the United States incident to recognition of Russia, contains sweeping dicta regarding the recognition power, but the case in no way relates to Presidential voiding of formal treaties and has been omitted from the above discussion. Pink involved the President's power to conclude an international agreement without the consent of the Senate, exactly the opposite of the present situation where it is proposed he break a treaty which has been ratified after he has received the advice and consent of the Senate. In brief, the Court held that the United States was entitled by the assignment to the New York assets of an insurance company nationalized by the Soviets, thereby protecting claims of American citizens against foreign creditors of the company.

Unlike Pink, where Justice Douglas said the "[p]ower to remove such obstacles to full recognition as settlement of claims of our nationals . . . is a modest implied power of the President," here it would be a major action of the gravest international consequences if the President should consider a treaty void where a friendly ally has given no cause and conditions do not render it impossible to perform. Douglas specifically tied his opinion to evidence that it was common practice for Presidents to conclude executive agreements and he also relied on a prior case by the Court which specifically determined that the Soviet assignment was valid. Here, on the other hand, there is no historical record showing that Presidents have routinely abrogated treaties by their own power and there is no prior case recognizing such a power in the President. Also, unlike Pink, here a specific provision of the Constitution directs the President to faithfully execute the laws, of which treaties are a part. Surely the President's implied power incident to recognition does not give him the power to repeal an express provision of the Constitution to the contrary.

[47] Only the three 18th century treaties with France entirely lacked any duration provision. One other agreement, the International Sanitary Convention of 1903, did not include such a provision in the text, but the process-verbal of the deposit of ratification conferred a right of denunciation.

[48] Several of the delegates to state conventions on adopting the Constitution argued that the President was to be subject to impeachment and conviction if he abused his treaty or diplomatic power. Elliot's Debates, III, 240 (Nicholas); III, 516 (Madison); IV, 124 (Spaight); IV, 276 (E. Rutledge); IV, 281 (C. C. Pinckney).

[51] Of course, in the case of the ROC, it may be presumed the authorities would not consider the defense treaty as void, but rather would continue to hold the United States responsible under international law for adhering to its treaty obligation and thereby preserve the opportunity for restoring the treaty to its full effectiveness at any time.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield the floor.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me a few minutes?

Mr. STONE. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from New York.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. METZENBAUM). The Senator from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I favor this amendment, and I am one of its cosponsors. And I wish to say why, without reiterating the points already very ably made by Senator DOLE, Senator STONE, and Senator GOLDWATER.

Mr. President, a key to my support of this amendment is contained in recital No. 4 of the amendment itself which reads as follows:

The United States-Republic of China Mutual Defense Treaty is integral to the broader north Asian security arrangements between the United States, the Republic of Korea, and Japan.

The point is, Mr. President, that these are peoples, to wit, the Taiwanese, the people of the Republic of Korea, and especially the people of Japan, have done superbly well economically and in the case of Japan have maintained democratic institutions. Japan is the centerpiece of our security position in Asia. And, Mr. President, Taiwan and South Korea are crucial flank positions of the Japan defense perimeter to which we as a Nation are so committed.

While the Taiwanese may have 15 million people, the Republic of Korea may have, let us say, 30 million, and Japan will over 100 million, the fact is that it is the aggregation standing together giving each other lateral support which is critically important for the United States in terms of our own national security and national well-being in the United States. All three nations are examples of true economic miracles achieved through the free enterprise system and all contribute to the collective strength of the western industrial camp.

The fact is that these three countries become critical together and lean on each other, and a very serious change in the condition of Taiwan, in my opinion, would seriously jeopardize the position of the Republic of Korea, and would seriously complicate the defense arrangements and requirement between Japan and ourselves upon which depends the fundamental question as to which way Japan will go in Asia, whether it will feel vulnerable to Russia or Chinese pressure or stay with us.

For that reason, Mr. President, in order to afford that lateral support and all of the considerations which that involves, I favor strongly this amendment and indeed hope that the committee might consider accepting it.

One other point, Mr. President: We cannot lose sight of the successful society in economic terms which the Taiwanese have developed on their island.

I ask unanimous consent that an article from the Washington Post of July 23, entitled "Taiwan's Anxious Boom," analyzing this economic success, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAIWAN'S ANXIOUS BOOM

(By Smith Hempstone)

TAIPEI.—It was, in some respects, an early summer mei yu (the plum season marked with showers) much like many others.

The muggy air, heavy with moisture and industrial pollution, smelled faintly of wood smoke, hibiscus, frying garlic and sweat. From the secret interiors of shuttered homes came the blare of television, and the softer but more insistent click of mah-jongg counters.

In this Year of the Horse, "Annie Hall" was playing the Majestic. Platoons of free-swinging (and big-spending) Japanese businessmen jammed the soggy golf courses by day and the discreet brothels of Peitou by night, driving the price of an evening's dalliance up to previously unthinkable highs ($20 for the first hour, $10 for each additional hour).

Security agents at Taipei's Sungshan International Airport, a madhouse which this year will handle an estimated 1.2 million visitors, confiscated $60,000 and more than 10 million Japanese yen (about $50,000) from the nose wheel housings of two China Airlines 707s bound for Hong Kong and Manila.

At the Imperial Book, Sound and Gict Co. on Lin Shan North Road, the pirated edition of H. R. Haldeman's "The Ends of Power," which sells for $12.95 in the United States, was going for $1.75 in hardback. It stood sixth on the nonfiction best-seller list, well behind the appropriate pacesetter, James E. Fixx's "The Complete Book of Running." At the Lincoln Center, Prof. Thomas Wang (M.A., Iowa State) was lecturing in Chinese on the writing of Saul Bellow.

Tourists from dozens of lands jammed Taipei's ornate red-and-gilt Grand Hotel (which deservedly makes many lists of the world's 10 best hostelries), picking over coral and jade at bargain prices in the basement arcade. Down on the Chung Shan North Road, tailors cut and sewed long into the night to turn out, on 24-hour notice, passable men's three-piece suits for $100.

Nearly 100,000 fiercely competitive high school students, aware that only a quarter of them will be accepted at Taiwan's 101 colleges, universities and research institutes, nervously registered for their entrance examinations; anxious parents consulted soothsayers and propitiated the gods at Lung Shan temple. At the drab American Embassy on Chung Shiau Road near the central railway station, U.S. Ambassador Leonard Unger, a Harvard-educated career diplomat, stared morosely out the window at the falling mei yu rain and wondered how long his job would last.

Not long, it would seem. Ever since the 1972 Shainghai communique, which committed the United States to "normalization" of its relations with Communist China, Washington has been putting as much distance as possible between itself and Taiwan's Kuomintang regime.

Secretary of State Cyrus Vance visited Peking last August, but until he found a few minutes last Sept. 10 to receive James C. H.

Shen, the Nationalist Chinese ambassador had been unable to wangle an appointment with an American secretary of state for nearly three years. When Vice President Walter Mondale made a 12-day, five-nation tour of Asia in May, Taiwan was omitted from his itinerary.

Two of Taiwan's four American libraries run by the International Communication Agency (successor to the United States Information Agency) closed down this spring for "financial reasons." The number of American military personnel here has shrunk from more than 9,000 in 1971 to fewer than 1,000 today, and more GIs are packing their duffel bags every day. There are long lines of Chinese waiting outside the consular section of the American embassy to complete visa applications, always—like the bank notes hidden in the 707 nose wheel housings—a sign of uncertainty about the future.

That uncertainty is not ill-founded. Since Peking was given the Chinese seat on the United Nations Security Council (and Tapei walked out of the General Assembly) six years ago, the number of nations that recognize Nationalist China has dwindled from more than 100 to 23—including such powers as Nauru, Swaziland, Haiti and El Salvador.

Of the dozen countries that have embassies here, only the United States and Saudi Arabia amount to much. Even the Vatican's nunciature has been manned only by a chargé d'affaires since Australian Archbishop Edward Cassidy went "on leave" in 1971, and somehow failed to reappear (he is in Bangladesh, although officially still accredited to Taiwan). No European nation maintains an embassy here, and South Korea is the only Asian country to do so.

Perhaps the worst recent diplomatic affront to Nationalist China was the timing of the visit of Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Carter's national security adviser, to Peking. Of all the days in the year he might have picked to do so, Brzezinski landed in Peking on May 20, the day 68-year-old Chiang Ching-kuo, elder son of the late Chiang Kai-shek, was inaugurated as third president of the Republic of China. Brzezinski added insult to injury by stopping in Seoul and Tokyo to brief those governments on his visit, but snubbed Taipei.

The most prominent American political figure to attend the low-key ceremony here (fireworks, but no parade) was Meldrim Thompson, New Hampshire's maverick governor, and he may have come to replenish his wardrobe: his testimonial adorns the show window of the tailor in the Grand from whom he purchased five suits.

Yet, worrisome as it obviously is to Nationalist officials, Taiwan's isolation is not as extensive as it appears. The island trades with 140 nations, and many keep in touch diplomatically through sub rosa organizations such as Japan's Interchange Association, a nonprofit corporation staffed by a former Japanese ambassador to the Philippines and a dozen "on leave" diplomats. Japan's trade with Taiwan actually has increased since it moved its embassy to Peking in 1972, climbing from $817 million in 1970 to $3.8 billion. Tokyo is in the anomalous position of being the second largest trading partner of a nation whose existence it denies.

But if Nationalist China is Asia's diplomatic pariah, it is rapidly becoming an economic mini-giant.

Under Japanese colonial rule (1895–1945), Taiwan had a backward agricultural economy based largely on sugar. While agriculture remains important today—Taiwan produces more snails than France, more oranges than Florida, more pineapple than Hawaii, more mushrooms than Pennsylvania and more bananas than Guatemala—its burgeoning export industries last year produced a healthy $850-million surplus, making Nationalist China the world's 22nd largest trading nation and the 12th ranking trading partner of the United States.

Foreign trade climbed from $1.4 billion in 1967 to $17.9 billion last year; this Holland-sized island's principal exports are textiles, electrical machinery, metal products, timber and plastics (sugar now ranks eighth). Trade with America in 1977 reached a record $5.6 billion; our trade with the mainland barely topped $300 million.

There seems almost nothing the Taiwanese cannot assemble or manufacture, from F5E jet fighters, color television sets and perky Yue Loong automobiles to luxury yachts, dollhouse furniture and luggage.

While Minister of State K. T. Li concedes light industry probably will remain the most important sector in the economy, Taiwan since 1975 has moved toward the creation of sophisticated capital-intensive industries, complete with the infrastructure to support them.

Of 10 major projects costing $6.6 billion, five have been completed, three more will be finished this year and the last two will come on line by 1981. Completed are the first of three nuclear power plants (oil imports cost Taiwan $1.3 billion annually), the Kaohsiung shipyard (which already has launched two 446,000-ton supertankers), an integrated steel mill capable of meeting the country's annual requirement of 6 million tons, a petrochemical complex and a new port at Taichung. Another port, a north-south superhighway and a new international airport for Taipei will be finished by the end of the year. A railway electrification project and construction of a new rail line will be completed by 1981.

Much of this new construction has been financed by more than $4 billion in external borrowing, most of it from the Export-Import Bank or the 12 American banks that operate here. These institutions, and the more than 200 U.S. corporations that have in excess of $500 million invested here, obviously have a stake in Nationalist China's political survival. More than 5,500 American civilians live here.

All this development has produced an annual growth rate of about 10 percent, with the gross national product climbing from $3.6 billion in 1967 to $19.4 billion last year. Because it has done so well, Taiwan has received no American aid since 1965. And, unlike the situation in most developing countries, much of this new wealth has filtered down to the island's 17 million people.

Largely because of full employment (only 1.4 percent of the country's 6 million workers were jobless last year) and land reform measures that restrict individual holdings to a maximum of 7.5 acres, per capita income has climbed over the past decade from $217 to $1,050. The top fifth of the population, according to a U.S. study, earns only four times as much as the bottom fifth, down from 15 times as much as recently as 1973.

The average Taiwanese's daily intake of 2,800 calories and 77 grams of protein is the highest in Asia, including Japan. Life expectancy has climbed from 58 years in 1953 to 71, and only a few households do not boast an icebox in the kitchen, a television set in the living room and a motorbike outside the front door.

This new prosperity and the passage of time have served to assuage much of the bitterness many of the 15 million Taiwanese once felt toward the 2 million mainlanders who still control the carpetbag Kuomintang government. More than half the members of the ruling party today are Taiwanese, and Chiang Ching-kuo, who appears to be genuinely popular, has gone out of his way to bring islanders forward (the new vice president, Shieh Tung-min, is Taiwanese).

Some political prisoners, estimated by diplomatic sources at "less than 400," remain and CCK, as Chiang Ching-kuo is referred to, tolerates only token opposition. The Kuomintang's most bitter opponents are to be found among Taiwanese living abroad, many of whom are out of touch with recent developments on the islands.

CCK's style is as down-home as his late father's was autocratic. "You can say one thing without fear of contradiction," asserts one diplomat. "He's the most popular mainlander on the island." When all is said and done, CCK will not likely be challenged politically while times remain relatively good.

What the Nationalists fear, of course, is that times will not remain good if the United States withdraws all its military personnel from Taiwan, transfers its embassy from Taipei to Peking, and unilaterally abrogates the 1954 mutual security treaty, all of which Peking demands as the price of "normalization" of relations with Washington.

Whether the Communists would immediately try to invade Taiwan is anybody's guess; probably not, given the bad state of their relations with the Soviet Union and their desire to acquire western military hardware.

Earlier this month, members of a U.S. congressional delegation returned from the mainland asserting that Vice Chairman Teng Hsiao-ping and other top Communist Chinese officials had hinted they were willing to negotiate directly with the Nationalists over the future of Taiwan. But in a Hong Kong press conference, the leader of the delegation, Rep. Lester Wolff (D-N.Y.), emphasized that the Peking officials neither ruled out the use of force to "liberate" Taiwan, nor drew back from their demands that the United States slash all ties with Taiwan.

Under the circumstances, many China watchers regard Peking's shift, if such it was, as tactical rather than substantive. The Nationalists have ruled out the possibility of any negotiations with Peking.

On Quemoy and Matsu, the offshore Nationalist Chinese islands, the defense of which brought Peking and Washington to the brink of war in 1958, a somnolent sitzkreig has evolved by unspoken mutual agreement. The Nationalists and the Communists lob leaflet-stuffed shells at each other for an hour on alternate days, launch plastic ducks and beachballs containing tracts and goodies on favorable tides, exhort each other to defect over powerful loudspeakers and float propaganda balloons in each other's direction

Gen. Chiang Wei-kuo, the generalissimo's German-trained younger son (President Chiang Ching-kuo was trained in the Soviet Union), who is president of the Armed Forces University, doubts the Communists are capable of launching a successful invasion at this time.

"They could put four divisions ashore by sea and one by air, but we'd cut them to pieces on the beaches before they could be reinforced," he asserts. With Nationalist China's 600,000 men under arms, backed by 2 million in the reserves, that's probably an accurate assessment.

What the Nationalists really fear is that, particularly if Washington transfers recognition from Taipei to Peking, Communist China's first step will be to use diplomatic and economic pressure to dry up Taiwan's sources of arms and spare parts, now entirely American.

The Nationalists, whose 700-plane air force includes 200 F5Es (a better plane than anything the mainland Chinese have), need a follow-on aircraft. The Carter administration has refused to sell Tapei jets more sophisticated than the F5E, but has indicated it would pose no objection to purchase of the Israeli Kfir. U.S. approval is necessary because the Kfir, an adaptation of the French Mirage, has an American engine.

If Peking can cut Taiwan off from its military supplies, the mainland's next move, the Nationalists fear, would be to seek a U.N. economic embargo, similar to that applied against rebel Rhodesia, to deny Taiwan access to essential raw materials and markets for its manufactured goods.

For a nation so dependent upon foreign trade for its existence, this could create such economic dislocation and political disorder as to force Taipei to seek an accommodation with Peking. Or bring to power an extremist group that might do one of two things Chiang Ching-kuo has pledged never to do: build nuclear weapons—Taiwan has the capability—or seek an alliance with the Soviet Union.

While it may bring other benefits, "normalization" of relations between the United States and Communist China on Peking's draconian terms, if it comes to pass, clearly could have a destabilizing effect elsewhere in Asia where the United States has treaty obligations that, like those with Taiwan, were freely entered into by the United States and have been scrupulously observed by the other contracting party.

Here in his modest rented home in Taipei, 77-year-old Paul Cardinal Yupin, a Manchurian of immense dignity who concedes he is likely "to see my tomb before I see Nanking, again," raises another point that is seldom discussed:

"I worry more about my second country, America, than I do about the Republic of China. Chinese history teaches that the present tyranny ultimately will collapse of its own weight. But it is not a good thing, morally, to betray an ally. In so doing, you destroy not only the ally but part of yourself. You lose your own self-respect, and the respect of others. Still, it is not my will or Mr. Carter's—and certainly not that of the Communists—that will be done. It is God's will."

To that, at least, one can say amen.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I shall read one sentence from that article:

The average Taiwanese's daily intake of 2,800 calories and 77 grams of protein is the highest in Asia, including Japan. Life expectancy has climbed from 58 years in 1953 to 71, and only a few households do not boast an icebox in the kitchen, a television set in the living room and a motorbike outside the front door.

What a sensation for Asia, and more power to it.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Or, else, I shall yield myself time on the bill.

Mr. STONE. How much time does the Senator from New Jersey desire?

Mr. CASE. The Senator from New Jersey has plenty of time on the bill. Who has time in opposition, so-called, to the amendment? I suppose we do have, do we not?

Mr. GLENN. We control that time.

Mr. CASE. May I have 1 minute then yielded to me?

Mr. GLENN. Certainly, such time as the Senator needs.

Mr. CASE. This is only nominally in opposition because I approve the amendment in its broad sweep. I do think it will be desirable to eliminate that subsection 4, which is I think the only real troublesome part of it.

It talks about interrelationship and intertwining of mutual security treaties, and so forth. If that comes out I should think it would be quite a desirable thing.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I can appreciate why the Senator wants it out, although I consider it the central reason why we should adopt the resolution. But the resolution is just as effective without it. The reason does not have to be stated in the resolution, and, so far as I am concerned, I can send it to committee.

Mr. STONE. If the managers of the bill would consent to accept the resolution with the omission of that paragraph, even though it is an important policy reason for those of us who authored and sponsored it, then I would recommend to my colleague, the Senator from Kansas, that that be done and that we get the amendment accepted by voice vote.

But if the managers of the bill are not prepared to make that agreement, then I think we should just go ahead with the amendment.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I understand that Senator GLENN and Senator KENNEDY have something in the nature of a substitute which has for its essential purpose the accomplishment of what I had in mind and, perhaps, it would be better, rather than attempting to deal with the managers of the bill at this point, to permit the Senators to make their suggestions and then, perhaps, we can all get together on a single resolution. It would seem to me that would make sense.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. GLENN. I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. On the amendment?

Mr. GLENN. On the amendment that time be equally divided between both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is os ordered.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time during this quorum call be charged against the bill and not against this particular amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Would the Senator seek to have it equally divided and charged against both sides?

Mr. GLENN. Equally charged against both sides on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

AMENDMENT NO. 3264, AS MODIFIED

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send a modified amendment to the desk and ask that in addition to the cosponsors listed therein the names of the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), and the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN)——

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will yield, also add the name of the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE).

Mr. DOLE (continuing). Be added as cosponsors to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. And that the name of the junior Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE) be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will state the modification.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 2 of the amendment, strike section (4) and renumber section (5).

Strike (b), and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b) It is the sense of the Senate that there should be prior consultation between the Senate and the executive branch on any proposed policy changes affecting the continuation in force of the mutual defense treaty cited above.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following new section:

UNITED STATES-REPUBLIC OF CHINA MUTUAL DEFENSE TREATY

SEC. 27. (a) The Senate finds that—

(1) the continued security and stability of East Asia is a matter of major strategic interest to the United States;

(2) the United States and the Republic of China have for a period of twenty-four years been linked together by the Mutual Defense Treaty of 1954;

(3) the Republic of China has during that twenty-four-year period faithfully and continually carried out its duties and obligations under that treaty;

(4) it is the responsibility of the Senate to give its advice and consent to treaties entered into by the United States.

(b) It is the sense of the Senate that there should be prior consultation between the Senate and the Executive Branch on any proposed policy changes affecting the continuation in force of the mutual defense treaty cited above.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I think it is fair to say that we have reached an agreement on the amendment, with the cooperation of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, and we believe that it states in its present form the purpose and the point that we intended to make with reference to the amendment.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a fact sheet summarizing the amendment.

There being no objection, the fact sheet was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FACT SHEET

1. The amendment simply confirms the historical and constitutional role of the Senate with respect to treaties. The Senate must ratify treaties; similiarly it should consider changes in treaties currently in effect.

2. The treaty itself calls for one year's notice before termination by either party, clearly providing time for full consideration of the political and strategic consequences of such termination by the Congress and the Administration.

3. During the 1976 Presidential campaign, Mr. Carter told a news conference: "We are bound by a treaty to guarantee the freedom of Formosa, Taiwan, the Republic of China . . . I would'nt go back on the commitment that we have had to assure that Taiwan is protected from military takeover." Before any change is made in this commitment, the Senate, having ratified the treaty, should be consulted.

4. Abrogation of this treaty could have serious military and strategic consequences;

a. It would create doubt among our allies, particularly Japan, South Korea, and the Philippines, as to our commitment to honor our obligations.

b. It could encourage the Soviet Union to expand its military influence in this critical region.

c. It could endanger the security of the oil supply route from the middle east to Japan.

d. It would seriously undercut the ability of Taiwan to defend itself against aggression.

In summary, this amendment merely requires prior consultation with the Senate before such a far-reaching step is taken. Your support is appreciated.

Mr. DOLE. I would only state that it seems to the Senator from Kansas that by making the changes we have, in effect, been able to garner unanimous support for the amendment; whereas, as originally drafted, on the other hand, the suport might have been fairly evenly divided. So I think we have accomplished a great deal.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I think the key word is "prior." Prior consultation; that achieves what we are after.

I agree with the Senator that a resolution like this is important for the unanimity of its support.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the Senator from New York for insisting that the word "prior" be added.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I just thought I would add a word in commendation to what the Senator has said of Senator DOLE, Senator CASE, Senator GLENN, Senator STONE, Senator GOLDWATER, and everyone who has had a hand in fashioning this compromise. I believe it is far more important for the Senate to show unanimity in expressing our belief that any fundamental change in policy in Asia, any change that would alter or affect an existing commitment, should take place only after close assessment and prior consultation with the Senate. That is proper, and we join hands across the aisle in making that assertion.

I think this has avoided a divisive debate and a divided vote on an issue that we can really agree upon when there is the good will to put together the proper formulation that this amendment now represents.

I simply want to join, as one Senator who has a great interest in this matter, in commending all those who have worked out this compromise and made the unanimity we expect to achieve possible.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the floor manager of the bill yield to me?

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I yield the Senator from Massachusetts such time as he may require.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my statement commenting on the differences between the approach of the Senator from Kansas and that of those who would have supported the substitute.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, this substitute amendment is cosponsored by Senators Byrd, Cranston, Church, Glenn and myself. It is strongly supported by Secretary of State Vance.

We are all agreed that the Senate should continue to be consulted on policy changes affecting our treaty relationships. In fact, our substitute provides for consultations not only on Taiwan, but on Korea and Japan with which we maintain vital security relationships. We believe that this represents an important improvement over the amendment offered by the Senators from Kansas and Florida, which highlights United States security treaties with Korea and Japan but fails to provide for consultations as far as they are concerned.

We believe that the second improvement in our substitute is that it does not state that our security treaties in East Asia are "inseparable" or integrally linked.

Our most important ally in the region, Japan, has repeatedly rejected linkages of Korea and Taiwan. The Japanese would be disturbed to hear from the Congress that our bilateral security relationship depends on our security relationship with Taiwan, or for that matter any other country. It is important in its own right, and contributes to the peace and stability of all of East Asia.

Moreover, the Communist world is fragmented, and each country in East Asia faces different threats from different sources. For example, Peking strongly supports the U.S.-Japan Security Treaty and is negotiating a Peace and Friendship Treaty of its own with Tokyo. Moscow opposes the Security Treaty and has long-standing territorial disputes with Japan. It would be simplistic, therefore, to suggest that Japan has the same security needs as Taiwan. Each security relationship should be considered in its own right, in terms of its own security environment—which is why a proposed Northeast Asia Treaty Organization failed to reach first base even at the height of the Cold War.

So, in recognition of the desires of our allies, as well as of the complex realities in East Asia, our substitute addresses each security relationship in its own right and finds that the continued peace and stability of the region as a whole is a matter of major strategic importance to the United States.

The third improvement in our substitute amendment is that it does not prejudge the negotiations between the parties on our future relations with Taiwan and the People's Republic of China. It does not suggest, as do the Senators from Kansas and Florida, that the mutual defense treaty with Taiwan must be maintained indefinitely. Nor does it suggest the reverse. It leaves the issue open until the Administration completes the negotiating process and consults with us on the results of that process.

The fourth and final improvement in our substitute amendment is that it makes clear that the United States does have an interest in a peaceful and prosperous future for Taiwan while moving toward normal state-to-state relations with Peking, which has governed the Chinese mainland for almost three decades. Again, we do not prejudge the form on our future relationships but reaffirm our interest in peace and prosperity for all of East Asia, including Taiwan.

In sum, we believe that our substitute amendment better reflects the realities of East Asia and better meets the interests of the United States and our allies, than does the amendment offered by the Senators from Kansas and Florida. As I stated at the outset, Secretary of State Vance and the Administration strongly agree, and assure us that they have and will continue to consult on any policy changes affecting our treaty relationships.

Mr. KENNEDY. I think the key understanding represented by our modification of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is that there will continue to be consultation between the executive branch and the leaders and concerned Members of the Senate. Beyond this, I welcome the deletion of the reference to linkages between the Mutual Defense Treaty and our other security commitments in Asia, which have not existed in the past and should not exist in the future.

It is quite clear, from the letter of the Secretary of State in support of our substitute language—and I ask unanimous consent that it also be printed in the RECORD—that the Administration has every intention to continue to consult with the Congress, as we move toward normal state-to-state relations with the People's Republic of China—an objective explicitly endorsed in the letter from Secretary Vance.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., July 25, 1978.

Hon. JOHN SPARKMAN,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Two amendments relating to our security commitments to the Republic of China, as well as to Japan and Korea, have been proposed to the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act, one by Senators Dole and Stone and another by Senators Byrd, Kennedy, Cranston, Church and Glenn. I would like to offer the Department's views on these amendments.

If an amendment is deemed necessary, we would strongly favor the one offered by Senators Byrd, Kennedy, Cranston, Church and Glenn. We take this position for several reasons. Three Administrations have been committed to the effort to improve our relationship with the People's Republic of China while maintaining the many mutually beneficial relationships which link us to the people of Taiwan. This Administration, like its two predecessors, believes that it is important for the maintenance of a stable balance of power and the preservation of world peace that we move to the normal state-to-state relationship with the People's Republic of China, but only in ways which do not endanger the well-being of the 17 million people on Taiwan.

This Administration has consulted and will continue to consult with Congress on developments affecting our security commitment to the Republic of China as well as Korea and Japan.

We are troubled by several aspects of the amendment proposed by Senator Dole. His amendment suggests linkages between the United States-Republic of China Mutual Defense Treaty and other U.S. security commitments in Asia which were not contemplated at the time these agreements were signed and which have not been agreed to by our allies. The form of our future relationships is best determined in the light of further negotiations rather than being prejudged in advance.

CYRUS VANCE.

Mr. KENNEDY. There has been consultation with previous administrations, with President Nixon and President Ford, and full consultation exists now with President Carter. Moreover, as stated by Secretary Vance, "Three administrations have been committed to the effort to improve our relationship with the People's Republic of China while maintaining the many mutually beneficial relationships which links us to the people of Taiwan."

But I welcome the chance to join with the Senator from Kansas on the understanding we all share—which is really the relevance of this amendment—that there will be consultation with the Congress on proposed changes of policy as they apply to Taiwan, the PRC, or really any of our treaty relationships in East Asia.

I think this is perfectly acceptable. I quite frankly think it would have been the attitude of this administration in any event, but I will vote in support of this amendment, because I think it confirms that particular point of consultation, and that is really the value, as I see it, of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I believe we are prepared to yield back any remaining time and have a vote.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Sylvia Castellanos of my staff be accorded the privileges of the floor during all stages of consideration of the pending legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Does the Senator from Ohio yield back his remaining time?

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I think with the unanimity on this on both sides of the aisle, I would hate to further prolong and waste the time of the Senate on a rollcall vote unless the Senator from Nebraska felt it was absolutely necessary. If he wishes, of course, that is his privilege.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no desire to inconvenience the Senate. On the other hand, I think this is a rather important pronouncement and a record vote is in the public interest. I decline to withdraw my request.

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, the amendment proposed characterizes the United States-ROC Mutual Defense Treaty as "integral" to our security arrangements with Japan and Korea. Now that terminology gives me three problems.

First, I am not entirely sure what "integral" means. The reader is left with a general impression that the treaty is very important, but in what way and to what extent is not at all clear. One can only speculate. And I do not believe the U.S. Senate should be that indefinite in its language.

My second problem comes when I try to take the next step. That is, when I speculate on just what "integral" does mean. The most reasonable interpretation, Mr. President, seems to me to be that the validity, the strength, the effectiveness of our security arrangements with Korea and Japan depend upon the treaty with Taiwan * * * that without the latter treaty we could not provide effectively for the security of Japan and Korea. But, Mr. President, that is clearly not the case.

Now the treaty with Japan, the productions base, the supply bases, and the overall military backstopping Japan provides our forces in Korea are clearly "integral" (if that means vital) to the security of Korea.

And likewise, geography dictates that the security of South Korea and consequently the treaty that establishes and legitimizes our presence in Korea are both "integral" to the security of Japan.

But, Mr. President, Taiwan is over 700 miles South of Korea, and our major base complex on Okinawa lies between Taiwan and either Korea or the Japanese main islands. Today we have something less than 1,000 military personnel on Taiwan. No matter how hard I look at the facts, I cannot truly characterize our treaty with the Republic of China as "integral" to the security of Korea or Japan.

That treaty is obviously important from the point of view of the Taiwanese. And in case of a war in Korea, there would probably be a certain convenience in having access to Taiwan's ports, airfields, and industry. No one denies that. But this is hardly the same as what is implied by the proposed amendment.

The third problem, Mr. President, is that the amendment oversimplifies the situation in East Asia. It implies that the only threat in the region, the only source of instability is the PRC, but clearly that is not the case. Indeed, today Peking acknowledges the importance of a continued U.S. presence. Our friends and allies recognize the complexity of the international situation. Although they may support the Republic of China, they have never defined the situation in the overly simplified manner reflected in the proposed amendment.

One of our longstanding goals has been to institute normal diplomatic relations with mainland China. The PRC is now reported to have 1 billion citizens. It hardly seems reasonable that the United States should not have normal relations with the government of almost one-third of the human race.

Another long-term U.S. goal has been to provide for a peaceful, prosperous, and secure future for the people of Taiwan. They have worked hard and have been remarkably successful in creating a prosperous community on their beautiful island. These two goals need not be incompatible. But their achievement will require adjustments and flexibility. Change always entails a certain amount of pain, because it involves uncertainty. But change is essential if we are to move ahead, if we are to adapt to new circumstances.

Mr. President, I must oppose the amendment as being of uncertain intent, simply inaccurate in its most likely interpretation, and not in accord with Asian realities.●

Mr. CASE. If the Senator will yield, I ask unanimous consent that Stephen Bryen of the committee staff be granted the privileges of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator withhold that?

Did I understand the Senator from Nebraska to withdraw his request?

Mr. CURTIS. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from New Jersey is granted.

Mr. GLENN. I yield back the remainder of my time unless any Senator has a further statement to make. If not, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. MORGAN), the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. NELSON), and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. MORGAN) would vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT) and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT) would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 94, nays 0, as follows:

So Mr. DOLE's amendment (No. 3264), as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, may I be recognized for 1 minute without the time being charged?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May we have order in the Senate so the Senator from West Virginia may be heard?

The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. GOLDWATER be permitted to lay down his amendment tonight without any time to be charged against it this evening, and then the Senate would proceed to the consideration of the amendment by Mr. GOLDWATER the first thing tomorrow morning, shortly after we come in at 9:30, then, in the meantime, this evening the Senate could take up the amendment by Mr. NUNN and two amendments by Mr. PERCY, which I understand are acceptable to the committee.

If this scenario is agreeable, then there would not be any more rollcall votes today.

Mr. BAKER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. I understand that arrangement is satisfactory and I further understand that the distinguished Senator from Illinois is not gathering up his papers and will be here shortly, so we should be able to proceed.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I have an amendment which will probably only take about 5 minutes. If the managers agree, I will have that called up now.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield so I might lay down my amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection of the Senator from West Virginia's request?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 3285

(Purpose: To strike out certain provisions imposing additional license procedures for the export of certain nondefense items having "political-military implications")

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk numbered 3285 to S. 3075 and I ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) proposes an amendment numbered 3285:

Beginning on page 30, line 14, strike out all through page 31, line 5.

On page 31, line 6, strike out "SEC. 26." and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 25.".

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, under the order, no time will be charged against Mr. GOLDWATER'S amendment, am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And it will be temporarily laid aside for the amendment by Mr. NUNN and two amendments by Mr. PERCY this evening. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is also correct.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1494

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I have an amendment I will send to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1494.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place, S. 3075 is amended to add at the end thereof the following new section:

"The President shall, within 120 days of enactment of this act, report in writing to the appropriate committees of Congress the results of the review conducted pursuant to Section 27 of the International Security Assistance Act of 1977."

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, more than 1 year ago, the Senate and House passed the conference committee report on the International Security Assistance Act of 1977. This measure contained a provision I sponsored requiring a Presidential review of all arms control regulations. Specifically, section 27 stated that this review be conducted for the purpose of defining and categorizing lethal and nonlethal products and for establishing the appropriate level of control for each category. The conference committee also stated that this report was expected within 120 days of enactment into law.

Mr. President, the 1977 measure was signed into law on August 4, 1977. Three hundred and fifty-five days have passed and no report has ever been submitted by the Carter administration.

This year-long foot dragging by the administration is typical of the lengthy delays experienced by the U.S. firms attempting to sell nonlethal military equipment through foreign military sales channels. The same offices in State and Defense responsible for preparing this report are responsible for the foreign military sales process. It is no surprise that U.S. firms are frustrated and plagued by bureaucratic redtape and costly delays. If these bureaucracies are not concerned about complying with the law, then they certainly do not worry about the adverse economic problems caused by the extensive delays prevalent in 1977 and the genesis for last year's law. These unreasonable delays have not improved and, therefore, I am offering the same provision with one adjustment. That adjustment establishes a mandatory 120-day reporting deadline for complying with last year's law.

Mr. President, my amendment reads as follows:

S. 3075 is amended to add the following new section—"The President shall, within 120 days of enactment of this act, report in writing to the appropriate Committees of Congress the results of the review conducted pursuant to Section 27 of the International Security Assistance Act of 1977."

The basic intent of the Arms Export Control Act of 1976 was to restrain the indiscriminate and often thoughtless transfer of large quantities of highly destructive armaments to foreign countries, many of whom are not allied with the United States.

However, the act itself failed to discriminate adequately between lethal weapons such as artillery, ammunitions, fighter aircraft, and explosives and nonlethal weapons such as unarmed naval vessels, ground vehicles, and trainer, utility or cargo aircraft.

The Congress amended the International Security Assistance Act of 1977 with the aim of resolving these inequities. The law states:

The President shall undertake a review of all regulations relating to arms control for the purpose of defining and categorizing lethal and non-lethal products and establishing the appropriate level of control for each category.

Last year's law did not reduce existing State Department and congressional control over the sale of U.S. military equipment overseas. It was designed to encourage a commonsense approach to those sales and the establishment of a meaningful criterion for distinguishing between those sales which directly contributed to a recipient country's combat capability and those which did not.

My amendment does not change last year's law; it specifies a 120-day deadline for a report that is already about 9 months overdue. I urge my colleagues to accept my amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the committee will accept the amendment by Senator NUNN. The executive branch report requested by the amendment was informally requested by last year's conference report but has never been received. I note that the report is to determine the feasibility of establishing a distinction between lethal and nonlethal products now listed on the U.S. munitions list and on appropriate levels of control for each.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the language in the conference report be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REVIEW OF ARMS SALES CONTROLS ON NONLETHAL ITEMS

The House bill contained a provision that directed the President to undertake a review of all arms control regulations for the purpose of defining and categorizing lethal and nonlethal products and establishing appropiate levels of control for each category.

The Senate amendment contained a provision that directed the President to develop definitions of lethal and nonlethal products and to establish procedures for the expeditious consideration of requests to export nonlethal products and to report to Congress within 120 days on the regulations and procedures to be applied to those systems determined to be nonlethal.

The committee of conference adopted the House provision. The committee of conference understands that the purpose of this review is to determine the feasibility of establishing a distinction between lethal and nonlethal product and appropriate levels of control and procedure for each. Further, the explanation of the purpose of the review in the provision is not intended to presuppose the results of the review. Although the committee of conference dropped the Senate provision with respect to the 120-day reporting requirement, it did so with the expectation that the President would make every effort to submit a report within that time period.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, the minority is very happy to accept this. It is further evidence of the initiative and sound thinking of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I agree.

Mr. NUNN. I thank my colleague from Alabama and my colleague from New Jersey.

I hope this amendment will send a strong message to administration that we expect the law to be complied with. We should be able to function without a mandate. This has been completely ignored by the administration.

I thank the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from New Jersey for accepting this amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. NUNN. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1495

(Purpose: To limit use of United States funds for the spraying of marihuana with paraquat in Mexico)

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, on behalf of Senator LEAHY, Senator ABOUREZK, and myself, I offer an unprinted amendment to S. 3075, the Security Assistance Act of 1978.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY), for himself and others, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1495.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the bill insert:

"Section 481 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended to add a new subsection (d) which shall read:

"The provisions of subsection (a) notwithstanding, no funds or assistance authorized in this Act shall be permitted to be used or shall be used, directly or indirectly, in connection with or to assist programs involving the spraying of herbicides to eradicate marihuana plants, if such herbicides are likely to cause serious harm to the health of persons who may use or consume the sprayed marihuana.

"The Secretary of State shall inform the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare of the use or intended use of any herbicide to eradicate marihuana by any country or international organization in a program receiving assistance under this Act. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, on the basis of scientific information and testing and after receiving comments from the Secretary of Agriculture and the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, shall promptly advise the Secretary of State if such herbicide is likely to cause serious harm to the health of persons who may use or consume the marihuana sprayed with such herbicide. If the Secretary of State is so advised as to any herbicide, the herbicide shall be deemed inappropriate for use in such spraying programs and no funds or assistance otherwise authorized under this Act shall be provided for such programs.

"The Secretary of State shall submit a comprehensive report to the Congress by January 1 of each year explicitly detailing all efforts he has taken to insure compliance with this provision and to prevent the spraying of marihuana with herbicides that may be harmful to human health."

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I have worked this language out with Senator CULVER, chairman of the Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee which oversees the Federal narcotics law enforcement effort, along with the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, on which I serve as the ranking minority member.

The amendment states that no funds authorized in this act shall be permitted to be used or shall be used, directly or indirectly, in connection with or to assist programs involving the spraying of herbicides to eradicate marihuana plants, if such herbicides are likely to cause serious harm to the health of persons who may use or consume the sprayed marihuana. The amendment also spells out a procedure whereby the Secretary of State shall apprise the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare of any intended herbicide use in a U.S.-assisted spraying program. The Secretary of HEW, in consultation with the Secretary of Agriculture and the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, is responsible for alerting the State Department as to any risk of serious harm arising from use of that herbicide.

The need for this amendment was prompted by the marihuana eradication program in Mexico and the use of the highly toxic herbicide, paraquat. After over a year of investigation into the effects of the U.S.-assisted marihuana eradication program, the following is clear:

According to U.S. Government estimates, as much as 36 percent of the marihuana entering this country from Mexico may be contaminated with the herbicide paraquat. This figure is even higher in some regions of the country, notably the Southwest.

NIDA tests now conclusively establish that the highly toxic paraquat is found in the smoke of sprayed marihuana which is inhaled into the human body.

Inhalation of paraquat-contaminated marihuana, particularly with prolonged exposure, may seriously impair the ability of the lungs to absorb oxygen, causing an irreparable condition known as fibrosis.

New Government estimates reveal that 16.2 million Americans smoke marihuana regularly and that 46 million have tried it.

Mr. President, I need not even mention the fact that we have had indications from the former highest drug official in the country—in the White House itself—that the use of marihuana, even in higher levels, is a real possibility, now perhaps being investigated by appropirate law enforcement officials. So for us to overlook this problem and just assume that it is not a problem of major proportion—particularly when I have seen the figures indicating the high proportion of our own Armed Forces that have used or are using marihuana—for us not to consider the serious damage we may be doing to the health and well-being of our own citizens would be shocking, indeed.

The U.S. Government has provided the Government of Mexico with millions of dollars—some $40 million over the last 3 years—for equipment and technical assistance related to the spraying of poppies with herbicides. Much of the funds have gone toward the purchase of planes and spraying equipment, the training of personnel, and repair and maintenance expenses—all, in turn, used by the Mexican Government not only for poppy eradication, but also for the spraying of marihuana fields. Mexican marihuana, which comprises about 60 percent of the hundreds of tons of marihuana brought into this country annually, is being sprayed with paraquat.

In May 1977, I requested information from Secretary of State Vance concerning the spraying of Mexican marihuana and the U.S. involvement in such programs. Pursuant to this request, an interagency meeting was held under the auspices of the White House Office of Drug Abuse Policy (ODAP), which included representatives from the National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA), the Department of State, the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), and the Department of Agriculture for the purpose of developing a plan for paraquat testing.

As an outgrowth of that session, tests were designed to determine if the smoking or consumption of paraquat-tainted marihuana posed a serious health hazard to a portion of the 16.2 million regular marihuana users in this country.

After 10 months, the National Institute on Drug Abuse released the results of these tests. Given the disturbing conclusions of the study, HEW Secretary Califano issued a warning in March of this year concerning the serious health risk of paraquat-tainted marihuana. He reported that, based upon samples actually seized at that time, approximately 21 percent of the marihuana coming into the country from Mexico was contaminated with paraquat. The maximum level of contamination which EPA currently allows in this country is 0.05 parts per million. Yet, the NIDA reports disclosed that some paraquat residues on Mexican marihuana were above 2,200 parts per million. That figure is 40,000 times the EPA tolerance level. The average contamination of the seized samples was 450 parts per million.

Although the provisions of the National Environmental Protection Act required that an environmental impact statement be prepared before this program became operable, one was never processed or submitted. Now, after 2½ years of noncompliance and considerable pressure from outside groups, the State Department has just begun work on an environmental impact statement on the domestic effects of this program and an environmental assessment of its effects in Mexico. Had NEPA's procedural requirements been followed from the start, we probably would not be faced with a current dilemma. Yet, even now, as the environmental impact statement is finally being prepared, the spraying of paraquat continues.

Knowing what we now know about paraquat, as a government we have a clear duty to warn the users of the danger. HEW Secretary Califano has done that. But we also have a duty, having provided the means and wherewithal for Mexico's spraying program, to urge Mexican officials to halt the spraying for the time being, while accelerating our own efforts to find a safer herbicide.

The NIDA findings clearly indicated the need for swift action on the part of this Government to insure the health and welfare of a significant number of our citizens. These citizens, mostly American youths, are endangered as a result of our own Government's involvement, however direct or indirect, in Mexico's program to spray marihuana fields with paraquat. The health risk is evident and it is serious: We cannot afford to wait for another protracted period before doing everything possible to induce the Mexican Government to terminate the use of paraquat in its spraying program, or to substitute a safer herbicide.

Such a safer herbicide does not now appear to be available. To wait any length of time before one is identified—without in the interim doing anything to urge Mexico to suspend its current paraquat spraying program—could needlessly endanger a large segment of our population. This administration, through the Department of State, should do everything possible to get the Mexican Government to act responsibly and with dispatch in this respect. Why it has not done so over these last several months utterly defies logic and sound public policy.

Mr. President, some of us who through the years have engaged in the interparliamentary work and meetings with the Mexican counterparts in their parliament have found them sympathetic, desirous of cooperating and working with us in this program. After their last meeting with us, they are much more conversant with the nature of the problem and the grave danger it poses than they were before coming to Washington.

I have been informed by the State Department that they have initiated an experimental program in Mexico to spray marihuana with a compound of paraquat mixed with the red dye, rhodamine-B. If successful, any tainted marihuana entering this country would be recognizable. This seems to be a step in the right direction. However, at the present time, officials do not know whether this red dye can be washed off the contaminated marihuana by devious traffickers and then ultimately peddled, undetected. Also, apparently no tests have been done to determine the health risks that the inhalation of rhodamine-B may involve. Until these questions are answered, red dye does not constitute an adequate solution to this problem.

A year ago, the paraquat spraying program was merely a bureaucratic dilemma. Now, in the face of a proven health risk to millions of Americans, the U.S. failure to urge the Mexican Government to halt this program has become a moral issue: We are using a weed killer to produce a killer weed, presumably on the basis of a distorted logic that we are out to protect young people.

Such a policy is wholly inconsistent with the avowed purpose of our drug eradication program. This program is designed to protect the health of American citizens, not to damage it further. The U.S.-assisted poppy-eradication program in Mexico, to its credit, has met this goal by significantly decreasing the amount of heroin entering this country. However, the continued involvement of the United States in the paraquat-spraying of marihuana can only generate deep distrust on the part of young persons for our public health programs as well as undermine the faith of all our citizens in the ability of this administration to govern wisely.

Since Secretary Califano's appropriate warning in March of this year concerning the serious health risk of smoking paraquat-tainted marihuana, laboratories that test for contamination have sprung up all over the country and are inundated with marihuana samples from concerned and frightened users.

I pay particular tribute to one Illinois company I know of, G. D. Searle & Co., whose chairman of the board and chief executive officer is Donald Rumsfeld, former Secretary of Defense for the U.S. Government, for offering this kind of service. They have been inundated with requests to test samples.

Students are protesting U.S. involvement in the spraying operations. Editorials urging a halt to the program have appeared in major newspapers across the country. The Michigan Legislature overwhelmingly passed a resolution condemning the U.S. support of the paraquat program.

One San Francisco doctor reports that he has treated 40 cases of burning throats, bloody sputum, and various lung problems among marihuana smokers. He attributed these symptoms to paraquat contamination. In Fresno, doctors have referred 37 patients with blisters of the mouth, throat ulcerations, and bloody sputum to the Center for Disease Control in Atlanta for further tests. Forty-six percent of the marihuana tested in Fresno has been found to be contaminated.

Indeed, the west coast is where most of the estimated 15 million pounds of Mexican marihuana smuggled daily into this country is sold. In San Francisco, where reports indicate that 33 percent of the marihuana is tainted with paraquat, former users are reported to be turning to harder drugs, like PCP and heroin, according to the Haight Ashbury Free Clinic, a drug treatment center.

Samuel Alba-Leyva, Mexico's deputy attorney general in charge of the drug eradication program, has charged that the reports of paraquat-tainted marihuana entering the United States from Mexico are merely propaganda generated by groups who are working for the legalization of marihuana. He is very much mistaken. I have been involved in this investigation since its beginning. The facts indicate that paraquat contamination is a real and significant problem. Furthermore, I am not an advocate of marihuana legalization. I oppose the use of marihuana. While for years I have urged the decriminalization for marihuana, I believe it entirely appropriate for authorities to impose up to a $100 civil fine for persons found using marihuana in public places. However, my disapproval of marihuana use does not blind me to the vast number of young Americans who regularly use the drug and whose health is, therefore, threatened by the alarming risks of paraquat poisoning.

I have limited the language of this amendment to the marihuana eradication program so as not to jeopardize the vital poppy-spraying program which is working admirably. That program has substantially diminished the flow of heroin into the United States. This amendment will specifically deal with the existing health risk posed by marihuana eradication, and should prevent its recurrence in the future. It makes clear what actions are required of the State Department and other agencies in the context of any herbicide spraying program on marihuana which this Government may promote or assist, however, directly or indirectly. It also insures that the kind of tests and assessment that recently revealed the dangers of paraquat will be conducted on any future herbicide that may be used in connection with the crop-spraying expenditures for equipment and training which this legislation authorizes.

We cannot afford to wait another year or another several months before responsible action is taken. The adverse effects of paraquat poisoning are cumulative, both to the health of millions of American citizens and to the morale of even more Americans who watch in disbelief as responsible officials in this country refuse to take action to urge understanding and a positive response on the part of the Mexican Government. Hopefully, with the provisions of this amendment, we will approach our drug eradication program with an awareness of the dangers we ourselves can produce, and thereby avoid the senseless poisoning of Americans in the future.

So that the background of this problem is clearly understood, I ask for inclusion in the RECORD my correspondence with the Department of State and the White House Office of Drug Abuse Policy; the warning issued by DHEW Secretary Joseph Califano upon being apprised by NIDA of the new, disturbing test results; and the preliminary report of DHEW, entitled "Contamination of Marijuana with Paraquat."

I also ask to be included: An excellently researched article by Jeffrey Smith, from the February 24, 1978, edition of Science magazine, entitled, "Spraying of Herbicides on Mexican Marihuana Backfires on United States" as well as Mr. Smith's followup article of April 28, 1978. Both these articles give a comprehensive overview of the herbicide paraquat, the history of its use, and general background information on the subject.

Press reaction to the U.S.-assisted paraquat spraying program has come from across the country. I also ask to be included in the RECORD at the end of my statement Ellen Goodman's syndicated column on this subject, appearing in the Washington Post on April 22, 1978, and editorials from the New York Times of March 18, 1978, the Chicago Sun-Times of March 29, the Boston Globe of April 3, the San Francisco Examiner of April 22, the Northern Virginia Sun of March 29, the Tacoma News Tribune of April 11, the Sacramento Bee on April 2, and from Rolling Stone magazine of June 29.

Finally, many legislators from around the Nation have expressed their concern over the continued involvement of the United States in the program and this Government's unwillingness to act responsibly in this regard. I note that Congressman HENRY WAXMAN and Congressman GEORGE MILLER intend to introduce a similar amendment to the Foreign Assistance Act when it comes to the House floor within the next few weeks.

COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS, PERMANENT SUBCOMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATIONS,
Washington, D.C., May 6, 1977.

Hon. CYRUS R. VANCE,
Secretary of State, Department of State, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY VANCE: For the past few years, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations has actively monitored the efficiency and effectiveness of federal drug law enforcement. As ranking minority member of this Subcommittee, I have aken a special interest in this subject.

In conjunction with the Subcommittee's continuing oversight of federal efforts to halt the flow of illegal drugs across the Mexican border, the Subcommittee is interested in the joint United States-Mexican program to cut off drug supplies at the source by spraying Mexican marijuana and poppy fields with chemical herbicides. In this regard, I would appreciate your providing me with the following information and any documentation pertaining thereto:

1. Please describe the United States government's oversight of the Mexican spraying operations. What role do American advisers play in the actual spraying operations and in the surveillance of those operations? How often are independent audits of this program conducted and when is the next such investigative trip scheduled? Specifically, does the State Department plan a review of the program by a multidisciplined team of experts, as recommended by Dr. Walter Gentner of the U.S. Department of Agriculture in the report on his Fall, 1976, study of the program?

2. How are the herbicides used for the program selected? What influence does the United States have over the choice of herbicides? Does the United States set standards and specifications for the purchase and handling of herbicides by the Mexican government?

3. Is the chemical herbicide paraquat (also known as gramoxone) still used in Mexico on opium poppy plants? If not, when and for what reason was its use halted?

4. Is paraquat still used for spraying purposes on marijuana plants? If not, when and for what reasons was its use halted?

5. Have any types of herbicides other than paraquat and 2,4-D been used in this program? Specifically, has 2,4,5-T been used on Mexican drug crops? If other herbicides have been used, why was their use halted?

6. Does the EPA currently consider paraquat safe for use in this program? Has the EPA shifted paraquat to its "rebuttable" list, indicating that there may be some reason to believe that it should not be registered for use in the United States? Has the U. S. Department of Agriculture strongly urged the United States and Mexican governments to discontinue use of paraquat on drug crops? If so, what action has been taken or is contemplated?

7. Has the U. S. government considered the toxic consequences of paraquat sprayed (1) on non-target Mexican food crops intended for local consumption or for export to the U. S. or elsewhere? and (2) on marijuana plants which are harvested after spraying, illegally exported into the United States, and subsequently smoked or consumed by American users or the drug?

8. What is the present position of the State Department on the use of paraquat in this program by Mexican authorities? Has the State Department made any effort to stop or urge discontinuance of the use of this chemical by the Mexican government? If so, please describe these efforts and the Mexican government's response to them.

Please transmit all State Department correspondence, cable traffic, agency memoranda, and other documents, from January 1975 to the present, concerning the use of herbicides on drug crops in Mexico. This should include but not be limited to all correspondence with the Department of Agriculture and the Mexican government.

Your prompt assistance and reply by Friday, May 13, 1977, will be greatly appreciated. Mr. Stuart M. Statler, Chief Counsel to the Minority, is available to provide all necessary assistance to your staff and can be reached at 224-9157.

Warmest personal regards,
CHARLES H. PERCY,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C. May 13, 1977.

Hon. CHARLES H. PERCY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR PERCY. Thank you for your letter of May 6 to Secretary Vance in which you asked for specific information and documentation about the Mexican Government's eradication program in which opium poppy and marihuana fields are sprayed with herbicides.

I have been informed that the Office of the Senior Adviser for Narcotics Matters has been in touch informally with members of your staff concerning these questions. While an initial response has been prepared by that office, a few of your questions will require more time to provide a sufficient reply.

The Department of State shares your concern that the means employed to control illicit drug abuse and international narcotics traffic do not result in individual suffering, or ecological damage. President Carter stated in his message to the U.N. Commission on Narcotic Drugs in February . . . We must combine deep compassion for the victims of addiction with a vigorous attempt to eliminate the world supply of illicit drugs through international cooperation . . .

The Mexican narcotics control effort is directed and controlled by the Mexican Government. The United States Government provides the Mexican Government assistance which includes equipment and technical advisory services, since success in the Mexican program will help reduce the supply of illicit narcotics for the United States market.

You requested a description of the U.S. Government's oversight of the Mexican spraying operations. In addition to oversight provided by the U.S. Embassy in Mexico and the Department's Office of International Narcotics under the Senior Adviser for Narcotics Matters, inspection of the program in Mexico is conducted by the General Accounting Office, the Inspector General of Foreign Assistance, the Drug Enforcement Administration, periodic audit by the Agency for International Development and various concerned Congressional committees.

The oversight definition varies from group to group. The Department of State is concerned with the effectiveness of the program as it relates to the use of the U.S. assistance provided to the Mexican Government, i.e., whether the program is helping to reduce the flow of illicit drugs into the United States. The spraying operation is the core of the eradication effort. All supplementary efforts are directed at insuring effective spraying of the poppy fields, which the Mexican Government has given priority over marihuana fields. Spraying of marihuana takes place primarily during the summer period between the normal harvests of poppies.

The role of the American advisers in the actual spraying operation consists of helping identify the location of poppy fields by the Drug Enforcement Administration's TDY personnel flying reconnaissance flights with Mexican pilots and spotters; U.S. contract flight instructors; maintenance and repair instructors; aviation systems advisers; and support advisory services in operation of multi-spectral poppy field identification systems. Concerning your question of surveillance of the operations, American advisers infrequently accompany Mexican spray flights and often accompany Mexican personnel on subsequent verification missions.

Independent audits of the program are conducted frequently and often overlap. At the present time, representatives of the Congressional Budget Office and the Inspector General's Office for Foreign Assistance are reviewing the program in Mexico. The Department's Inspector General's review of the program begins in a few weeks and the A.I.D. audit should begin in June. The extent to which each of the groups may focus on the detailed technical aspects of the type of herbicide used will vary.

Dr. Walter A. Gentner of the U.S. Department of Agriculture visited Mexico in 1976 when the transition phase between the outgoing and incoming administration took place. His recommendations have been passed to the new administration. To date, the new Attorney General has not desired U.S. technical assistance in developing the use of herbicides which he has stated must be effective in eradication, ecologically safe, and safe for the personnel who participate in the spraying.

Herbicides are selected for the program after these criteria have been examined by specialists from various ministries within the Mexican Government. The herbicides presently employed in the program have been approved by the Mexican Department of Agriculture and are used commercially in agriculture in various parts of Mexico. The United States does not have direct influence over the choice of herbicides. We have provided technical advisers to consult with the Mexican Government on herbicides and current planning exercises with the Mexicans may result in additional consultation. The Mexican Government purchases and procures the herbicides used in the program. No reimbursement arrangements exist to cover this cost. The United States cannot and does not set standards and specifications for the purchase and handling of herbicides by the Mexican Government. In response to a Mexican request for guidelines to assure safe handling of herbicides, general instructions were prepared on one occasion by the Narcotics Assistance Unit at the U.S. Embassy in Mexico City.

The U.S. Embassy reports that the chemical, paraquat, has been used in 1976 and 1977 only against marihuana, while 2,4–D is used only against opium poppies. We have been advised that in the future, only 2,4–D will be used against both poppies and marihuana because tests showed it was more effective and safer to handle. We will look into this issue further and will advise you.

We only know of the use of 2,4–D and paraquat in the program. It is possible that other herbicides or chemical variations have been used for limited testings.

We are making inquiries regarding the Environmental Protection Agency's position on paraquat. The U.S. Department of Agriculture has advised us informally that handling paraquat in its concentrated form can be harmful. This advice was passed on to the Mexican Government.

The possible toxic consequences of paraquat being accidentially sprayed on Mexican food crops, appears to be a remote possibility. The marihuana fields are located generally far from food crop fields. Reports from the Embassy indicate that marihuana sprayed with herbicides disintegrates quickly into a fine powder rendering it useless for smoking.

The State Department believes that herbicides used in any eradication effort should be safe for man and environment as well as effective in destroying the illegally grown plants. Some evidence is available that paraquat can be harmful to those who prepare and apply paraquat; therefore, we have supported informally the reported decision of the Mexican Government to use in the future only 2,4—D. We shall make inquiries on the progress of this decision and advise you.

Concerning your request for all State Department correspondence, cable traffic, agency memoranda, and other documents, from January 1975 to the present, covering the use of herbicides on drug crops in Mexico, we will begin the search immediately and provide the documentation within a matter of days.

Sincerely,

DOUGLAS J. BENNET, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary
for Congressional Relations.

SENATE PERMANENT
SUBCOMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATIONS,
Washington, D.C., July 18, 1977.

PETER G. BOURNE, M.D.,
Director, Office of Drug Abuse Policy, The White House, Washington, D.C.

DEAR DR. BOURNE: Over ten weeks ago, members of the staff of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, of which I am ranking minority member, called to my attention the possible hazards associated with the use of the herbicide "paraquat" on Mexican marijuana fields. The potential seriousness of this problem was immediately apparent. As you know, thousands of pounds of marijuana cross the Mexican border every month, and there is good reason to believe that a large portion of this marijuana, destined for consumption by U.S. citizens, may be tainted with this highly poisonous chemical. Although I do not condone the use of illegal drugs under any circumstances, I feel that the United States government has a responsibility to ensure that its actions do not foreseeably endanger the health and safety of any of its citizens, drug users included.

I understand that, under your direction, a meeting was held at the White House on May 27, to discuss possible means of resolving the uncertainties of paraquat use on drug crops. The outcome of this meeting was a decision to begin certain tests on paraquat and paraquat-treated marijuana, to be conducted under the auspices of the National Institute on Drug Abuse. On June 10, my office reecived assurances from the Deputy Director of ODAP that these tests would begin "immediately."

On July 8, Subcommittee staff contacted your office to check on the progress of these experiments. Staff was informed that the actual experiments had not yet been started and would not commence for another two weeks, even though six weeks had already passed since the decision to implement this effort.

It is most difficult for me to understand an eight-week delay in such a simple task as the planting of marijuana for test purposes, especially in view of the six to eight-week lead time required to grow the plants to maturity, which is a necessary first-step in this test effort.

I know you share my concern for the health and safety of all Americans. No one should be inadvertently poisoned through the actions or inactions of the United States government. In view of the delays in this project to date, I urge you to do whatever is necessary to expedite the conduct of these important experiments.

Sincerely,

CHARLES H. PERCY,

---

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D.C., August 2, 1977.

Senator CHARLES H. PERCY,
U.S. Senate,

DEAR SENATOR PERCY: Thank you for your letter of July 18 concerning research on Paraquat toxicity. Please be assured that we share your concerns and consider this an important research issue. I would like to detail for you the steps which have been taken and are planned to develop this project.

It was decided at our May 27 meeting to attempt to resolve certain questions concerning Paraquat's potential danger to marijuana smokers. To this end, I requested that the National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA) prepare a research plan which could be implemented to settle some of these concerns. The plan was presented on June 3, and I subsequently discussed the project with Mr. Dodson of your office on June 6. I decided, in view of the potential danger to U.S. citizens, that the project should be implemented and this decision was communicated to NIDA on June 7.

The research timetable called for an 18-week project to arrive at preliminary conclusions concerning the pyrolysis products of Paraquat on marijuana leaf—those chemical entities which appear in the condensed smoke after a marijuana cigarette is smoked. If safety cannot then be adequately addressed, toxicity studies in rats will be conducted on Paraquat-treated marijuana to access the potential toxic effects. If necessary, these studies would take an additional 12–14 weeks.

The timetable presented by NIDA is the period of time necessary to complete the project after all the individual stages have been arranged. Any delay is an unavoidable aspect of the need to supplement ongoing contract funding to cover this work, coordinate with the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) for plant-growing and treatment aspects of the project, and to work out the exact details of the experimental procedures necessary to carry out the work. If these details and plans are not carefully formulated at this initial stage, more questions than answers will result from such a project.

You might be interested to learn that scientific representatives of USDA, NIDA, and the Environmental Protection Agency have agreed to the type of marijuana to be used on the experiment and the methods of application and quantity of Paraquat to be applied. Initial experimental details have been worked out and sources established for actual homegrown Mexican marijuana which is necessary for the project. It has also been agreed that Chevron Corporation will supply the Research Triangle Institute with radio-labeled Paraquat for the project.

The appropriate contractual proposals have been solicited and the seeds (Mexican varieties), which were obtained from the University of Mississippi after agreement was reached on varieties of plants necessary and numbers of plants required, planted.

Two modifications have been made to the project as originally conceived at our May 27 meeting. The first is that the confiscated material will be analyzed at the University of Mississippi for the presence of Paraquat. Depending on the amount of Paraquat that is detected on this random screening of marijuana samples from all over the United States, the potential of exposure to Paraquat by a U.S. smoker can be assessed in preliminary fashion. Secondly, the pyrolytic experiments to be carried out will be done initially on manicured (harvested) plant material after application of Paraquat to it. This is not growing plant material, but presumably the data collected on its pyrolysis will carry over to the live plant situation. Since this material is available now, initial data can be generated prior to the availability of the mature grown plants.

To summarize where we stand at this moment:

1. Plants are growing which should be ready for harvest by the end of August.

2. Chemical analysis of the confiscated samples at the University of Mississippi will commence as soon as chemical supplies arrive (2 weeks from now), and some data should be available on these analyses by the end of August with a total of 200-300 analyses completed by the end of September.

3. The contractural arrangements with the Research Triangle Institute of North Carolina are in negotiation, and their full efforts should begin in about 2 weeks.

Thank you for your interest in this important project. If I can be of further assistance, do not hesitate to call me.

SENATE PERMANENT
Washington, D.C., March 9, 1978.

Hon. PETER G. BOURNE, M.D.,
Special Assistant to the President, The White House, Washington, D.C.

DEAR DR. BOURNE: Recent reports have come to my attention indicating that more than 20% of the samples of marijuana seized at the Mexican border are contaminated with the herbicide paraquat; that when analyzed, these samples are showing increasingly higher amounts of paraquat residues; that tests now conclusively establish that the highly toxic paraquat is in fact found in the smoke of sprayed marijuana which is inhaled into the human body; and that such inhalation, particularly with prolonged exposure, may seriously impair the ability of the lungs to handle oxygen—a condition known as fibrosis.

On July 18, 1977, I wrote urging you to expedite the conduct of tests aimed at determining the health risks associated with paraquat-treated marijuana. By December, your office reported that samples seized at the border showed "about 50 parts per million (ppm)" of paraquat. The White House release further stated "The absolute maximum amount of paraquat likely to be found on plant material is about 500 parts per million." But Dr. Richard Hawks—the official-in-charge of the paraquat study being conducted by the National Institute for Drug Abuse—has recently reported that current samples are showing up to 655 ppm; and that with each batch of new samples, the amount of paraquat-contamination appears to be increasing. Informally, reports have reached me indicating that government-seized Mexican marijuana coming into this country has been found to contain as high as 2,200 ppm of paraquat contamination.

Surely the hazards of such levels of paraquat in marijuana, and the associated risks involved for a large segment of the American public, merit immediate and high-level response. Yet it has now been more than ten months since I first brought this problem to the attention of Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and almost eight months since my July letter to you urging that the government's inquiry into the paraquat problem be expedited because of the potential for serious harm to American citizens. With each passing day, the matter takes on more distressing proportions.

According to Dr. Hawks, we still do not know of the precise risk such marijuana contamination poses, but the potential risk is serious. My office was informed late last week that toxicity reports on paraquat-treated marijuana, when inhaled through smoking, are not conclusive and a more refined test was required. I have been informed as of today that subsequent testing indicated that paraquat traces are indeed transmitted in the smoke. At the same time, it appears that studies conducted on paraquat-treated marijuana which might be consumed report only what doses would be lethal. Clearly, sub-lethal doses might well cause permanent damage—e.g., to the brain or lungs—to some proportion of the 13 million Americans who, by government estimates, are regular marijuana users. Yet, according to Dr. Hawks, none of the tests currently being conducted or which could be conducted will be able to tell us anything about the sub-lethal risks involved when persons consume marijuana contaminated with the highly toxic paraquat. Whatever information we still do not have, as a result of recent findings, we know that no research will be able to tell us that paraquat is not a hazard to human health.

Whatever the reasons, we now know that more paraquat-tainted marijuana containing increasingly higher levels of paraquat residues are entering the United States and being sold to unsuspecting users and that there exists a clear risk to human health, of our own making. And yet, no action is being taken to induce the Mexican government to halt the use of paraquat in its spraying program, or to substitute a safer herbicide.

In light of recent developments, I believe that the United State Government should undertake immediately to safeguard the health and welfare of a significant number of our citizens who may be endangered as a result of this government's involvement, however direct or indirect, in Mexico's program to spray marijuana fields with paraquat. Without question there is a duty owed to those citizens when our government is acutely aware of hundreds of tons of marijuana crossing the border from Mexico and has lent behind-the-scenes assistance to the spraying effort which causes the marijuana to be a risk to human health.

Parenthetically, I believe that the Government of Mexico may well want to reconsider its paraquat program in view of the possible risks of lung damage to peasant farmers, and to officials in the spraying program itself who are handling this substance.

I would like to meet with you as soon as possible to ascertain why, in the face of an unknown but possibly serious health risk this government has not, to date, acted with reasonable dispatch to eliminate the risk, and what actions you propose to take at this critical time.

Sincerely,

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, March 15, 1978.

Hon. CHARLES H. PERCY,

DEAR SENATOR PERCY: Thank you for your letter of March 9 in which you expressed your concern that Mexican grown marijuana illegally entering the United States and sprayed with the herbicide paraquat in the Mexican eradication program could be harmful for users of marijuana in the United States.

In response to your letter to me of May 6, 1977, on this potential danger to American marijuana users, the Department indicated that it shared your concern that the means employed to control illicit drug abuse and international narcotics traffic do not result in individual suffering or ecological damage.

An interagency inquiry into the problem was authorized by the White House in May 1977. As you know, Secretary Califano released the preliminary findings of the study on March 11. The report concludes that paraquat contamination may pose a serious risk to marijuana smokers. Secretary Califano is sending copies of the report to the Departments of State, Justice, and Agriculture, and the Environmental Protection Agency to determine what action they might take in regard to reducing the health hazard of paraquat being sprayed on marijuana.

In view of the conclusions of the interagency study, the findings will be made available promptly to the Government of Mexico. Additionally, information concerning alternative herbicides which might be substituted for paraquat in the Mexican eradication program and which pose less of a health hazard will be passed to the Mexican Government.

On the basis of the excellent cooperation demonstrated by the Mexican Government in carrying out its international treaty obligation in narcotics control, we can assume that Mexico will examine the results of the new HEW study carefully with appropriate consideration for any health hazards that may affect its citizens or citizens of any other country.

The Mexican Government's decision in November 1975 to use aerially sprayed herbicides followed a careful study of the herbicides selected, 2–4–D against opium poppies and paraquat against marijuana, with consideration that the herbicides should be safe for man and environment, as well as effective in destroying the illegally grown plant.

As you know, the Governments of Mexico and the United States are parties to the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs of 1961, which specifies in Article 22 as amended, that a party prohibiting cultivation of the opium poppy or the cannabis plant shall take appropriate measures to seize any plants illicitly cultivated and to destroy them. Thus, Mexico has taken seriously its obligation to destroy narcotics plants, but its Government has made it clear that in attempting to alleviate the harmful effect of illicit drugs, it also intends that its narcotics control efforts would be carried out in a manner that would avoid an adverse effect on the ecology or the health of its citizens.

The primary interest of the U.S. Government in supporting the Mexican eradication program through international narcotics assistance is to reduce the movement of illicit heroin entering the United States. The Mexican eradication effort against opium poppies is showing a significant reduction in heroin in the United States based on declining heroin overdose deaths, increased price levels, and declining purity levels based on heroin seizures. Consequently, the program is reducing drug abuse in the United States. This progress, which is obviously in our best interests, must be maintained along with efforts being made to reduce the health hazard of paraquat contamination of marijuana.

You may be assured that I personally share your concern with this problem and will do everything possible to resolve it.

Sincerely,

CYRUS VANCE.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE

CONTAMINATION OF MARIHUANA WITH PARAQUAT: PRELIMINARY REPORT

Since 1975, the Mexican Government has operated a marihuana eradication program. The principal herbicide employed in this program is Paraquat 1,1′ dimethyl-4,4′ bipyridinium dichloride), a chemical patented in England and manufactured in this country and in Mexico. Paraquat is sprayed from aircraft onto marihuana plants, and the herbicide interacts with sunlight to cause the plants to die within the course of roughly forty-eight hours. This eradication program is operated and funded by the Mexican Government.

Paraquat has also been used in this country since the early 1960's for agricultural purposes. The most common use of Paraquat is as a means of cleaning the seedbed before planting crops, but it is also employed for such purposes as weed control in fruit orchards and as an aid in harvesting mature plants such as cotton and soybeans. Paraquat does not persist in the soil and presents little hazard when used in prescribed amounts. It is one of 23 herbicides which the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) is proposing to restrict only to trained farmers and users. The use of Paraquat on food crops as a direct harvesting aid is not recommended by the EPA. Use in orchards for weed control can result in some contamination of the fruit but this contamination must not exceed 0.05 ppm prior to marketing.

Paraquat in concentrated form is highly toxic and has been responsible for at least 25 deaths in the United States due to accidental poisoning. It tends to concentrate in lung tissue whether it is ingested or inhaled. The toxic reaction with the lung produces a condition called fibrosis, which reduces the capacity of the lung to absorb oxygen. Inhalation of Paraquat creates a greater risk of lung damage than ingestion of an identical amount.

During the past year, concern has been expressed about the possibility that Paraquat-contaminated marihuana was entering the United States and might pose a health hazard to marihuana users. Marihuana sprayed with Paraquat can be quickly harvested before the plant dies and in such cases harvested marihuana contaminated with Paraquat may find its way into this country. Roughly 60 percent of marihuana in this country is imported from Mexico.

As a result of this concern, a study was initiated last summer at the National Institute on Drug Abuse to answer two specific questions: (1) Is contaminated material entering the country in any significant amount; and (2) What are the chemical constituents of the smoke from Paraquat-contaminated marihuana which might create health risks beyond those presently associated with marihuana smoking.

STUDY RESULTS

These studies have provided the following data:

1. One hundred samples of marihuana confiscated by the Drug Enforcement Agency have been chemically analyzed for Paraquat. The average weight of the seizures from which these samples were taken was 699 lbs. All of the samples which were tested for Paraquat came from the Southwest United States, the area where contaminated samples are most likely to be found.

Thirteen of these were unambiguously identified as contaminated with Paraquat. All were confiscated after October, 1976, and constitute 21 percent of the 63 samples tested that were confiscated after that date. The contamination ranged from three to 2,264 parts per million (ppm), with an average contamination of 452 ppm. This level far exceeds the 0.05 ppm level that is tolerated for domestic uses.

Since the sampling was not random in a statistical sense, no clear extrapolation of this data can be made to estimate the total amount or distribution of Paraquat-contaminated marihuana in the United States. No attempt was made to design a statistically valid random sample selection since the intent was only to answer the question of whether contaminated material was entering the country and the approximate level of its contamination.

2. Marihuana plant material which was treated with a Paraquat solution in order to produce a "contamination" level of approximately 10,000 ppm was burned in an apparatus designed to collect all the smoke produced. This artificially high concentration was prepared to expedite the analytical procedures. The apparatus is constructed of glass and allows the plant material to burn in an air atmosphere at a temperature similar to that of a marihuana cigarette. Although this method of burning is not exactly the way marihuana burns in a cigarette, it is sufficiently analogous to provide data which can be generally related to the real smoking situation.

The smoke was subjected to chemical analysis and it was determined that the major compound in the smoke resulting from the presence of Paraquat was a compound called bipyridine, which is formed from the chemical breakdown of Paraquat when it is burned. Bipyridine is a compound found in tobacco smoke, and is not itself likely to contribute significantly to the toxic effect of marihuana smoke.

However, it has also been determined that a small amount of Paraquat is carried in the smoke, although the exact amount of Paraquat resulting from the burning of plant material at a specific contamination level has not yet been determined. Efforts to obtain more exact determinations are in progress. However, rough estimates from the data in hand suggest that approximately 50 to 250 nanograms of Paraquat can be expected to be present in the smoke from a single marihuana joint contamined at 450 ppm Paraquat. Analysis is also being carried out on the smoke from Mexican-variety marihuana grown at the United States Department of Agriculture and treated with Paraquat under simulated field conditions. Only when this analysis is complete will be it be certain that the conclusions from the 10,000 ppm material discussed above are completely valid.

PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS

1. Considering the low-dose, chronic studies done in animals, it appears that the oral administration of marihuana treated with Paraquat (e.g., in brownies) probably creates little hazard. An individual would have to ingest approximately two full ounces of marihuana every day for two years (at contamination levels of 2,000 ppm) to reach the lowest dose level where cell damages has been observed in animals.

2. Smoking marihuana containing Paraquat presents the greatest potential hazard. Studies of animal inhalation and of agricultural workers engaged in repeated spraying of Paraquat, when combined with other evidence, suggest that there exist certain risks to the marihuana smoker.

First, heavy users of marihuana run a possible risk of fibrosis which could be clinically measurable if the marihuana they smoke is contaminated with Paraquat. A rough estimate can be made that an individual who smokes three to five marihuana cigarettes each day could suffer measurable lung impairment after several months if the marihuana contained at least 450 ppm of Paraquat. It is less likely, though not inconceivable, that clinically measurable damage could be suffered by individuals who consume marihuana in smaller quantities, less regularly, or with lower levels of Paraquat-contamination. These risks of suffering fibrosis—which is an irreversible condition—must be considered against the use patterns of marihuana in this country. Recent surveys conducted by the National Institute on Drug Abuse suggest that nearly nine million Americans have used marihuana over 100 times in their life. Thus, contamination of marihuana with Paraquat may pose a serious additional risk for marihuana smokers.

Second, adverse effects on the lungs from the tar in marihuana smoke have been documented in the scientific literature. It is possible that the effects are increased by the contamination of marihuana with Paraquat, but there are no clear data presently available on this point.

There is no evidence at present that Paraquat is carcinogenic to lung tissue, but studies in this area are incomplete.

SPRAYING OF HERBICIDES ON MEXICAN MARIJUANA BACKFIRES ON UNITED STATES

(By R. Jeffrey Smith)

In the mountainous, inaccessible regions of Mexico, over an area that comprises more than one-fourth of the national territory, Mexican farmers carefully cultivate fields of opium poppies and marijuana. Each year, more than 2500 tons of that marijuana and 5000 pounds of heroin, an opium derivative find their way across the border into the hands of pot smokers and heroin addicts in the United States. Customs officials here will admit frankly that they are powerless to prevent it, and authorities in Mexico have fought a notoriously losing battle with farmers who are skilled at locating fertile ground hundreds of miles from highways—and do not hesitate to shoot at soldiers and narcotics agents. In a country where the average yearly income in rural areas is in the range of $200, the modest farmer of opium and marijuana can have an income of $5000.

In the spring of 1975, the Mexican government and their advisers in the U.S. drug enforcement establishment came up with a bright idea: Herbicides, which where successfully used to defoliate large portions of the Southeast Asian jungle during the Vietnam war, could be sprayed on the opium and marijuana fields by Mexican pilots in sophisticated American helicopters. Infrared aerial photography, another high-technology development of the Vietnam war, could be used by fixed-wing aircraft to track down and pinpoint the location of the fields. By this method, thousands more acres and thousands more fields could be wiped out than through the older, slower, ground method of search-and-destroy by burning.

After a brief period of trials and demonstrations before a variety of Mexican and American officials, the program began with the use of a variety of agricultural herbicides, including 2,4,5-T, 2,4-D, and paraquat (Gramoxone by its trade name). Later, paraquat was accepted as the most effective herbicide to use on marijuana, and 2,4-D was judged the most effective for use on opium poppies. Last year, according to government officials, poppy fields covering 14,000 acres and marijuana fields covering 9500 acres were destroyed by airborne spraying. This prompted one U.S. official to pronounce it "the most effective and cost efficient means of decreasing the flow of drugs such as heroin into the United States."

What has followed this comparative success, however, has been a growing criticism of the program by American environmentalists, an exacerbation of existing tensions between the United States and Mexico, and in the words of an American senator, outrage over the fact that no steps were taken to ensure the health of millions of Americans who might be using marijuana harvested immediately after it had been dosed with herbicide. Concerns about the safety of the paraquat-sprayed marijuana—first expressed in the underground press—have led to a federally funded study of the safety. A warning about paraquat-contaminated pot has been issued by the Office of Drug Abuse Policy in the White House. Dogging the whole affair has been a series of contradictory statements by the State Department, which has tried at nearly every opportunity to minimize the ecological and health risks associated with the program, as well as the American involvement in it.

"What we're dealing with here is a very sensitive issue within the framework of relations between the United States and Mexico," a State Department official told Science. "Right now, they are spending an inordinate amount of their resources on a project [the spraying] that essentially benefits the United States. We don't want to disturb that. Moreover, anything that makes it appear that the United States is in any way controlling or directing the program is damaging to the stability of the Mexican political environment. The closer their government is to the United States, the worse it looks in the eyes of the Mexican people and press."

When the office of Senator Charles Percy (R-Ill.) began inquiring about the herbicide-spraying program in May 1977, after a member of his staff saw references to it in the underground press, the State Department was mindful of the diplomatic problem. In its responses to Percy and to the later inquiries of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML), department officials pointed out that "the Mexican narcotics control effort is directed and controlled by the Mexican government."

The State Department also asserted that the herbicides used in Mexico—after having been selected by the Mexicans with complete independence—do not pose any environmental or human health risks: "Reports from the [American] embassy indicate that marihuana sprayed with herbicide disintegrates quickly into a fine powder rendering it useless for smoking." Even the White House drug abuse office, in a statement released on 9 December 1977, asserted that "while the U.S. has provided both equipment and technical assistance to the Mexican government for the eradication of illegal poppy fields, it is not participating in the marihuana eradication program."

However, these claims appear to be contradicted by the scope of U.S. assistance to the program and by the contents of several State Department documents relating to the herbicide spraying. Although the U.S. claims, for example, that the herbicide program is Mexican-directed and controlled, it seems clear it could not function as it does without American approval: Since 1973, this country has provided $40 million in direct funding for the program, most of which has been used to purchase 41 American-made Bell helicopters and 35 Cessna single- and twin-engined fixed-wing airplanes. Mexican personnel are trained by flight instructors, maintenance and repair instructors, and aviation systems advisers under contract to the United States. Employees of the Drug Enforcement Administration accompany the Mexicans on flights to identify the fields and assure that they have been destroyed. Four government agencies oversee the operation: the State Department, through the U.S. Embassy in Mexico, and its Office of International Narcotics; the Drug Enforcement Administration; the General Accounting Office; and the Agency for International Development.

This participation and oversight, moreover, clearly has extended to the marijuana eradication program: A report filed by John Ford, an employee of the State Department who was sent to help set up the spraying program, contains several references dated October 1975 to observations he made and advice he provided on the spraying of paraquat on marijuana fields.

The importance of the contradictions in the activities and public statements of the government lies in the influence that the State Department's denial of a U.S. role had in delaying an investigation of the environmental and human health effects of the herbicide-spraying program. Concern over those effects first arose simply because of paraquat's inherent toxicity to humans and plants. As the label on it states, "one swallow can kill," and there is no known antidote. Ingestion or inhalation of one-tenth of an ounce is sufficient to damage major internal organs and result in a painful death after 24 hours. In fact, more than 100 persons in the United States have died from ingesting paraquat by accident or to commit suicide. Most of the deaths have occurred in Texas and California, where paraquat has been used to kill weeds and clear land, according to a scientist at the National Institute of Drug Abuse.

Despite its toxicity to humans, paraquat does not persist in the environment—it breaks down when it contacts soil—which made it initially attractive to the Mexicans. To the American critics of its use on marijuana, however, that major attribute is more than offset by the way its acts to destroy plants. When sprayed in the air, paraquat sticks to the leaves of plants, desiccating them through a chemical reaction with the leaves' surfaces, with sunlight as the catalyst. Thus, for the plant to be completely destroyed, it must sit for a day and probably two in bright sunlight. The potential hazard to users of marijuana is created whenever the crop is harvested by the farmer on the same day it is sprayed. Once harvested and pressed into bricks for shipment across the border, the leaves are out of the sun, the plant stops its deterioration, and the herbicide remains largely intact on the marijuana.

STATE DEPARTMENT DENIAL

Initial inquiries from Percy and NORML about the possibility of this occurring or having occurred were deflected by the State Department with a denial of any responsibility for the program. Eventually, in response to persistent inquiries by Percy, the White House drug abuse office convened a meeting in May 1977 of representatives of eight federal drug enforcement and health agencies to discuss the issue. Then a different obstacle arose. Several of the officials balked at the idea of investigating potential risks associated with use of a contraband substance. According to Percy, they said in effect: "So who cares, what responsibility does our government have for dope smokers who might be poisoned by paraquat?" Although Percy himself had carefully expressed his disapproval of "the use of illegal drugs under any circumstances," he firmly expressed his belief that "the United States government has a responsibility to ensure that its action do not forseeably endanger the health and safety of any of its citizens, drug users included."

This view was shared by presidential assistant Peter Bourne, the director of the Office of Drug Abuse Policy, who pointed out that any intake of paraquat-treated marijuana by U.S. citizens would be a direct result of the U.S.-supplied spraying operation. Following the meeting, Bourne directed the National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA) to conduct a $35,000 study to determine if marijuana contaminated with paraquat actually was being imported, and if so, whether it could cause injury to those who used it.

To answer the first question, NIDA obtained 71 samples of marijuana confiscated during major drug busts in the southwestern region of the United States and had them analyzed by researchers at the University of Mississippi. Richard Hawks, a chemist at NIDA who is directing the research, makes no claims that the samples are representative of all the marijuana that comes across the border, but he said that researchers found paraquat on 10 percent of the samples, and "by itself, that was positive proof that paraquate-laden marijuana is being imported."

For the second portion of the study, marijuana plants were grown by the Department of Agriculture at a laboratory in Beltsville, Maryland, where they also were treated with paraquat. Scientists at the Research Triangle Institute in North Carolina then burned the marijuana and subjected the smoke condensate to chemical analysis. The researchers already knew that a hazardous amount of the herbicide was unlikely to be inhaled by the user as a part of the smoke, but it was unclear whether or not the heat of the burning converted paraquat into another toxic substance. Tests of the smoke condensate using mass spectrometry have yet to be carried out, but the preliminary results of tests using a slightly less accurate method indicate that the herbicide is broken down into bipyridine, which commonly exists in tobacco smoke and will not hurt the user, according to Hawks.

According to NORML, however, the government cannot be sure that paraquat-laden marijuana poses no health hazard unless a study is made of the effects of eating small amounts of it baked in cookies or brownies—a means of administration employed by a small but essentially unknown proportion of the estimated 15 million regular marijuana users in the United States. Using several rather arbitrary statistical measures of the concentration of the herbicide in imported marijuana and the distribution of marijuana in a batch of brownies, NIDA has calculated that a person would have to consume 32 pounds of brownies—containing 1 pound of the sprayed marijuana—over a short period of time to ingest a lethal dose of paraquat. But the agency does not know whether eating a portion of that amount would have less than fatal but still toxic results, according to Hawks. "We have no plans whatever to look at the effects of ingesting a sublethal dose," Hawks added.

One indication of the potential toxicity of ingesting it may be the fact that the concentrations of paraquat found on the imported samples analyzed by NIDA were between 3 and 650 parts per million. These concentrations uniformly exceed the tolerance levels set by the Environmental Protection Agency for paraquat on foodstuffs, which are in the range of 0.05 to 0.10 part per million. Moreover, "because of paraquat's inherent toxicity and studies that indicate it can cause birth defects," the EPA has placed it on a list of candidates for hearings that may lead to those tolerance levels being reduced, or to a removal of the herbicide from the U.S. market for use in connection with agricultural commodities, an EPA spokesman told Science.

Keith Stroup, the director of NORML, believes that NIDA should study not only the hazards of eating paraquat-laden marijuana, but that it should also look into the possibility that heroin may be coming across the border laden with toxic amounts of the herbicide 2,4-D. The chemical works by interfering with the normal growth cycle of a plant, causing it to wither in 36 to 48 hours.

Although it is not considered to be as toxic as paraquat, it also has been placed on a list of candidates for hearings that may lead to use restrictions or to its removal from the market; studies have indicated that it may cause mutations and cancer. So far, NORML has been the only group to express any interest in the possibility that it has contaminated imported heroin; ensuring that addicts do not face such a hazard does not seem to be a popular cause. The State Department responds confidently that "because heroin is already injurious to health, we don't consider that [the possibility of herbicide-laden heroin reaching users in this country] to be a problem."

NORML believes that a first step toward changing State Department support of the herbicide-spraying program would be to force the department in federal court to file an environmental impact statement, placing the ramifications of the spraying program on the public record. Impact statements are required under the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) for "major federal actions significantly affecting the quality of the human environment" in the United States. The State Department contends that no statement is required for the herbicide program because it is outside the U.S., under the formal control of the Mexicans, and bereft of any direct U.S. subsidy for the herbicides themselves.

Many Washington environmentalists, on the other hand, believe that such a statement is required. Their view is based partly on a 1975 suit by the Environmental Defense Fund that forced the Agency for International Development to file the statements on its pesticide programs in foreign countries because of their potential impact here. Moreover, the herbicide-spraying program in Mexico appears to be a prime example of the type of issue that impact statements are designed to illuminate. The State Department from the start knew, for example, that marijuana treated with paraquat was likely to be harvested quickly by the Mexicans; reports filed by John Ford noted that some of the plots that had been selected for the initial trials were harvested on the same day they were sprayed. The State Department also knew that paraquat is an extremely hazardous herbicide with which to work. In early 1975, an official of the Agricultural Research Service in the Department of Agriculture wrote to the State Department to express his concern over the intention of the Mexicans to use the herbicide, because of the hazards present for those who administered it. If a statement had been filed at the inception of the program, the State Department would have been forced to consider these ramifications and explain them in a public document, critics have pointed out.

Despite the apparent strength that these arguments would have in court, there is some reluctance by the environmentalists to take the case there. Currently, they are engaged in a running battle with agencies of the federal government that oppose a proposal by the Council on Environmental Quality, a White House office, to extend the NEPA requirements for filing impact statements to U.S.-supported actions that will have an effect only within the environment of a foreign country. Bringing a federal agency to court over an existing NEPA requirement in a case that hinges primarily on concern for the welfare of U.S. pot smokers and heroin addicts, at the same time a battle is taking place over proposals to extend those requirements, apparently is not considered sound strategy. Some groups also feel that the two issues—concern for U.S. pot smokers and the need for broader use of impact statements—should be kept apart.

Whatever the reason, this lack of action leaves unsolved several confusing mysteries that surround the affair. One is whether or not the State Department actually has exerted any pressure on the Mexicans to substitute another herbicide for paraquat. Richard Dugstad, a policy officer in the State Department's Office of International Narcotics, was quoted recently in the Washington Post as saying, "We have done nothing to discourage the use of paraquat by the Mexican government." But this contradicts what the Senate Department, in a letter to Senator Percy dated 13 May 1977, said: "We have supported informally the reported decision of the Mexican government to use in the future only 2,4-D" on marijuana plants. Dugstad now states that he was quoted out of context by the Post. The letter to Percy also states that "we have been advised that in the future, only 2,4-D will be used against both poppies and marihuana because tests showed it was more effective and safer to handle." Dugstad recently told Science, however, that "the Mexicans are staying with the present system of using paraquat on marijuana and 2,4-D only on opium poppies," because of continuing experience that shows each herbicide to be most effective on the plants that are sprayed with it now. He added a rhetorical question that prompts greater uncertainty: "Is it really appropriate for the U.S. to direct another government to use one chemical instead of another?"

Another unanswered question is whether the Mexicans are using herbicides besides paraquat and 2,4-D on opium poppies and marijuana. A report filed in 1976 by Walter Gentner, an employee of the U.S. Agriculture Department who went to Mexico to observe the operation, states that he saw the herbicide 2,4,5-T, a toxic chemical that may cause cancer, in a shed where other herbicides were stored. He suggested then that a special investigation be initiated, but up to now none has been conducted. Dugstad said that "to the best of our knowledge, no herbicides besides paraquat and 2,4-D are being used by the Mexicans."

In a sense, the uncertainty of this statement is understandable. The State Department has been caught between the proverbial rock and hard place in this affair, which is fraught with international political complications and the potential for exposure of an error in U.S. policy. To admit at the start that paraquat-laden marijuana posed a health hazard for users in the United States would have been to admit that the Mexicans had not made the wisest choice of chemicals and, moreover, that despite the best application of American ingenuity and good intentions, heroin and marijuana are continuing to flow across the border in quantities that pose a hazard to U.S. citizens. What seems clear now, however, is that unless the State Department immeditaely places all of its cards on the table for everyone to see, its own credibility and wisdom, and possibly its good intentions, will remain in question.

POISONED POT BECOMES BURNING ISSUE IN HIGH PLACES

(By R. Jeffery Smith)

Following a discovery that Mexican marijuana contaminated with the herbicide paraquat constitutes a major health hazard for pot smokers in the United States, the State Department recently sent a delegation to Mexico City to discuss the issue with Mexican attorney general Oscar Florez.

The visit came on the heels of a warning by the U.S. Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW) that the herbicide persists in the smoke of a contaminated marijuana cigarette and may be inhaled by the smoker. The paraquat contamination is so serious that those who smoke as few as one to three contaminated cigarettes daily for several months risk irreversible lung damage.

Members of the U.S. delegation did not—as some American critics have sought—ask the Mexican government to cease the herbicide spraying program, which is aimed at eradicating illicitly grown marijuana and heroin. The program is overseen and heavily financed by the U.S. government (Science, 28 February). "We just wanted to inform them of the dimensions of this problem in the U.S.," said Richard Arellano, a deputy assistant secretary at the State Department.

A major topic of discussion at the meeting, in addition to the health hazards, was a lawsuit recently brought by the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML) to force the State Department to stop funding of the spraying until it files an environmental impact statement. Several well-informed officials told Science that the department is extremely nervous about the suit, which is regarded as likely to succeed. If it does, the precedent would destroy the department's claim that projects it funds in other countries are exempt from the impact-statement requirements. "The State Department regards this as the worst case that could come up," said one source, "because the spraying program is having an obvious impact here at home."

At the meeting in Mexico City on 30 March, American officials had a difficult time persuading the Mexicans that the lawsuit could prevent continued U.S. funding for the herbicide program. "The Mexicans couldn't understand how our judicial system could even entertain the suit, considering that marijuana is already an illegal substance," said Arellano.

A team of U.S. scientists is searching for an alternative to paraquat, but the federal court suit will probably be resolved before they are successful. In particular, they have been looking at formulations of the herbicides 2,4-D and glyphosate, but each possibility is said to require additional safety testing that could delay the substitution for months.

Initially, officials of the National Institute on Drug Abuse reported that paraquat posed no particular hazard, because it was thought to be converted entirely into another chemical, bypiridine, when a contaminated cigarette was burned. Bypiridine exists commonly in smoke from a tobacco cigarette and is not considered to be particularly hazardous. Recently, however, scientists at the Research Triangle Institute in North Carolina were able to analyze the smoke from a contaminated marijuana cigarette with a mass spectrometer. They discovered that roughly 5 percent of the paraquat remains in pure form after burning. Coupled with the discovery that recent samples of marijuana entering the United States from Mexico contained a concentration of paraquat as high as 2264 parts per million, this evidence was alarming. Tests showed, for example, that in a cigarette with a contamination of 1000 parts per million, 0.26 microgram of the herbicide is likely to be inhaled by the user.

An estimate of the dangers to humans of inhaling such an amount was extrapolated from laboratory studies with rats, because most cases of paraquat poisoning in humans have been caused by ingestion, not inhalation, of the chemical. The laboratory studies demonstrated that when an exceedingly small amount of the herbicide was placed directly on the rats' lungs, it caused fibrosis, or a scarring that inhibits the ability of the lung to absorb oxygen. At the low doses in contaminated marijuana, the scarring in humans would build up slowly, and it would be some time before the only probable symptom—extreme shortness of breath—would be noticed.

As yet, no instances of fibrosis attributed to the poisoned marijuana have been reported. However, doctors at the Center for Disease Control (CDC) in Atlanta, which is attempting to serve as a clearinghouse for physicians with patients who have been smoking the poisoned pot, have received reports of other ailments that may be related to the contamination. Specifically, physicians in Georgia, Iowa, and California have reported that several of their patients—who apparently had been smoking paraquat-laden marijuana—have experienced uncomfortable breathing and have been spitting up blood. Both the CDC and the doctors themselves are cautious about attributing the symptoms to paraquat, however, apparently because corroborating tests have not been devised.

Whether or not any poisoning has occurred thus far, users of marijuana appear to be increasingly aware of the potential risks. Charles Becker, a physician associated with the Haight-Asbury Free Clinic in San Francisco, told Science that the center has received hundreds of calls from smokers reporting adverse effects potentially related to the herbicide. Testing laboratories in Palo Alto, California, and North Miami, Florida, which guarantee anonymity for their clients, have been doing a brisk business in chromatography (contamination) tests of marijuana samples mailed in from all over the country. G. D. Searle, a pharmaceutical manufacturer, recently organized a testing program—the only free one—in Chicago, Illinois, and found that 39 of the first 40 samples tested were contaminated by paraquat. As the entire affair has received wider publication, the backlog of samples at each testing center has become substantial.

Meanwhile, officials in Washington have remained reluctant to express strong concern over the issue. No formal attempts have been made to seek Mexican cooperation in suspending the spraying. Lee Dogoloff, an official in the Office of Drug Abuse Policy in the White House, noted that the government does feel some responsibility to smokers, but individuals do have some responsibility and choice in the matter—they don't have to smoke." Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, in a letter to Senator Charles Percy (R-Ill.), said that he personally shared Percy's concern about the problem and "will do everything possible to resolve it," but this seems to extend only to notifying the Mexicans of the health hazards and then waiting until a safe alternative to paraquat can be identified.

In a recent statement on the Senate floor, Percy—who has been following the issue closely—expressed his belief that more could be done. "To wait any length of time before [a safer herbicide] is identified—without in the interim doing anything to urge Mexico to suspend its current paraquat spraying program," Percy said, "could needlessly endanger a large segment of our population." Whichever side is correct will undoubtedly become clear as events continue to unfold.

MARIJUANA OUTRAGE

(By Ellen Goodman)

BOSTON.—Talk about Reefer Madness.

The first issue to stir up the leaden oatmeal of college campus indignation in years is the news of the paraquat poisoning of marijuana.

From Fred Harris' freshman government class at the University of New Mexico to graduate biophysics seminars at M.I.T., the students are angry again. As one jaundiced assistant professor put it: "It's the only thing I've seen them protest in three years—outside of a low grade."

Students everywhere are outraged that "their government" financed the pesticide spraying of Mexican marijuana plants. It has turned into a melting pot (forgive the pun) issue among young people today, into which they've thrown a lot of anger, cynicism and a strong dose of irony.

The irony is simply this: The government that failed over many decades to convince the public that marijuana is dangerous finally has helped to make it dangerous.

In 1975, the Nixon administration gave Mexico $10 million to buy planes and train people to spray herbicides on poppy fields in order to kill off a major supply of heroin. On their own initiative, the Mexicans went on to more fertile fields and sprayed marijuana with the deadly chemical paraquat.

The idea was that paraquat would kill off the plants, the way it helped defoliate Vietnam. But each season, the enterprising Mexican farmers harvest the stuff before it dies, and ship it north.

Since about 50 to 60 percent of the pot smoked in this country comes from Mexico, it is assumed that for the past two or three years, a large number of the 15 million regular marijuana smokers have inhaled a substance that has a slow, cumulative effect on their lungs. Is there any wonder why the Bumper Sticker of the Moment in California reads: "Buy Colombian"?

The question is now whether the Carter administration, which has taken a stance in favor of decriminalization of marijuana, feels any responsibility about the Mexican program. And the answer is mixed.

On March 12, HEW did issue a warning about paraquat to "consumers." But on March 28, the spraying was begun on the spring crop, with our money.

Dr. Peter Bourne, the president's special assistant on health, states the government's position this way: "People are asking the federal government to protect them in a patently illegal act. If it's against the law, the responsibility of the government to protect its quality doesn't exist."

But no one is actually asking the government to roll up 12 neat joints and put them in an FDA-inspected cellophane package. They are complaining that the government is poisoning the stuff.

Bourne makes a second analogy, saying that "the whole area is filled with ambiguity; it gets into questions like 'Should we offer health care to someone who gets into an accident going over 65 miles an hour?' " But, should we, on the other hand, give government grants to manufacture a brake system that fails at 65 miles an hour?

The National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Law (NORML) has filed a suit against the government, and a hearing is scheduled for April 26, although it may be postponed again. In the meantime, the people doing a boffo biz are the ones running test labs on all the vials of marijuana being sent in by all the worried users.

For once, NORML is raising the health issues of smoking marijuana. As George Franham, the assistant director, put it: "This is total role-reversal."

But the fact is that there are currently 45 million Americans who have smoked marijuana. Right now nine states—inhabited by a third of the population—have decriminalized it. Furthermore, in the latest Gallup polls, 70 percent of the population of those under 30 and those with a college education are in favor of decriminalizing it.

Marijuana has become a gray area of the law and an issue of debate on and off the college campus. But who is in favor of poisoning marijuana smokers? This paraquat punishment just doesn't fit the "crime."

[From the New York Times, Mar. 18, 1978]

REEFER MADNESS

The Federal Government has finally stumbled on a way to persuade marijuana users that pot is dangerous.

It began several years ago with a Federal program aimed at heroin. The United States gave Mexico $40 million to buy aircraft and train personnel to spray killer chemicals on the poppy fields, the source of much of the heroin that enters the United States. Apparently on their own initiative, the Mexicans, assisted by American advisers and equipment, went on to spray marijuana fields.

The trouble is, the herbicide the Mexicans chose to use against marijuana is paraquat, a substance so toxic, according to the label, that "one swallow can kill." Paraquat is supposed to break down quickly when it hits the soil and present no long-term danger. But it takes two or three days in bright sunlight to kill the plant. The resourceful Mexican farmers now rush to harvest their crops on the day they are sprayed, with the toxic herbicide still on the leaves. Past Federal warnings of the danger of marijuana have been based on slim evidence. But now the Government has fulfilled its own prophecy: The Department of Health, Education and Welfare warns that permanent lung damage could result from smoking three to five heavily contaminated cigarettes a day for several months. Thus, a program designed to protect people from the supposedly harmful effects of marijuana has succeeded in putting them at far greater risk.

The demands for an end to this Government-sponsored "poisoning," the State Department responds that the Mexicans control the spray program, buy the herbicides with their own money, and might resent outside interference. Moreover, some State Department officials see no reason to protect Americans who are using a contraband substance. Just the other day, one of them questioned "whether our Administration has a responsibility to provide an illicit drug in clean, completely healthy condition."

But, in fact, the United States is helping to add a poison to the drug. Fortunately, there are signs that the State Department, under pressure from other agencies, Congress and pro-marijuana groups, will communicate the latest health findings to Mexico and perhaps urge the use of other herbicides. Even State would have to admit that this cure has been worse than the disease.

UNCLE SAM'S "KILLER WEED"

War has bitter ironies, and the U.S. government's war on marijuana is no exception:

Weed killer may have finally made "killer weed" live up to its deadly nickname.

Under a misguided U.S. drug-eradication program, pot-smokers are being exposed to Paraquat, a chemical that can cause severe and irreversible lung damage.

The issue has nothing to do with the decriminalization of marijuana. Rather, it centers on whether the U.S. government, wittingly or not, is helping poison U.S. citizens.

And the evidence makes it clear: It's past time for the spraying program—and the resultant health peril—to stop.

The problem arises from a $13-million-a-year heroin and marijuana control effort under which the United States gives the Mexican government aid in spraying herbicides on drug crops south of the border.

U.S. drug officials have estimated that 30,000 to 40,000 Mexican pot fields were sprayed with the plant-killer Paraquat in 1976 and 1977. But there's a dangerous hitch.

Mexican marijuana farmers, fearing the loss of their cash crop, harvest the plants before the herbicide goes to work. Then they sell it on the usual drug market.

Who buys? One federal study late last year found contamination in 9 of 45 samples of Mexican pot seized in California and Arizona. And the danger appears to be spreading: Recent studies have found as much as 50 per cent of some West Coast shipments tainted.

Drug-testing labs in Chicago have found none of the contaminated weed—so far. Yet concern, sometimes panic, persists. The Health, Education and Welfare Department has even issued warnings about the danger.

The government should take one further step: a complete halt to programs that promote the application of highly toxic chemicals to drugs that are likely to end up here. The National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws has taken legal action to force just such a ban.

Citizens concerned about justice—and the long-term effects of chemical poisons—should hope the ban is put into effect.

Discouraging the use of marijuana is one thing; poisioning the supply is another.

Consider the analogy: If "revenooers" find a moonshine still, do they secretly add cyanide to its product?

---

[From the Boston Globe, Apr. 3, 1978]

GETTING HIGH ANXIETY

For members of the laid-back generation, marijuana was a product to be trusted like spring water, herbal tea and crunchy granola. It was a way to leave concern behind without damage to brain or liver cells. Users argued that marijuana was nature's way to relieve stress and that it even contained certain medicinal properties. Like raw carrots, marijuana was said to be good for the eyes; like raw clams, marijuana was a spur to the appetite.

But, now, alas, marijuana users find themselves pinned to the edge of the chair, with as much reason for worry as the middle-aged businessman accustomed to three-martini lunches.

The Mexican government, prodded by the Nixon Administration to crack down on drugs, did precisely that. Among other steps, it began spraying marijuana fields with the weed-killer paraquat. The chemical is highly effective in killing marijuana—if the plants are left in the sunshine for two full days after being contaminated. But if they are harvested before that time, the leaves can be salvaged, sold—and smoked. Enterprising Mexican hemp producers, rather than throw away the tainted weeds, simply harvested them before the chemical took visible effect.

The result is that a certain amount of the contaminated weed is now circulating in the pot-smoking world, which is unprepared emotionally as well as technologically to cope with it. In New England, for example, no laboratories are available to the pot smoker. He can't run out and have his cache easily analyzed. He must either abstain, or smoke in the hope that if his marijuana comes from Mexico it is free of paraquat, which can have a devastating impact on human health.

Whether the threat is real or exaggerated seems to be anyone's guess. No one, including Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Joseph Califano, who warned against heavy use of the Mexican weeds, seems to know for sure.

What is certain is that a significant number of Americans, perhaps as much as 10 percent of the population, smokes marijuana, and that percentage is significantly higher among young people.

It misses the point to argue, as did one Massachusetts official, that people shouldn't be smoking in the first place because marijuana is illegal. Whether legal or illegal, marijuana is widely used and widely accepted. The possibility that its users could be placing themselves in peril should be a matter of public concern rather than an occasion for moralizing.

[From the San Francisco Examiner, Apr. 22, 1978]

THE SPRAYING OF MEXICO

About 20 percent of the marijuana in the United States is contaminated with paraquat, a defoliant, thanks to a Mexican eradication program sponsored in part by our government.

Scientists disagree over whether smoking the contaminated pot is dangerous. The National Institute on Drug Abuse announced that it is. The National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws agrees and has filed suit to stop the U.S. government's participation.

We're concerned that the government is helping to make an illegal drug more dangerous. But we're more concerned about what the spraying may be doing to Mexicans and their ecology.

A State Department spokesman said spraying marijuana and poppy plants has been going on for four or five years. (State administers the grant to Mexico for the program.) "Thousands and thousands" of acres have been sprayed, he said. That's a lot of chemicals to pollute the atmosphere.

If, as tests seem to indicate, the chemical is harmful when inhaled on pot, it must be dangerous if breathed directly. Tests seem to show that the paraquat mostly breaks down into a harmless chemical when burned. But what does paraquat do to the people who breathe it as it is sprayed? What does it do to other plants in the area? Paraquat, widely used as a weed killer on California citrus ranches, is under investigation as a probable health hazard to growers and farm workers.

[From the Tacoma News Tribune, Apr. 11, 1978]

CONTAMINATED MARIJUANA

Smokers of the illegal drug marijuana are being warned their habit may be exposing them to a new danger. There is the possibility the marijuana they use is contaminated with a herbicide that could cause lung damage.

The herbicide is called Paraquat, and it is being used by Mexico to spray marijuana fields in an effort to destroy the crop and thus reduce the drug traffic.

But in efforts to salvage their illegal crops Mexican marijuana growers have been quickly harvesting the sprayed marijuana before the herbicide can do its job.

The result is that much of the marijuana that is being smuggled across the Mexican border, and making its way into Washington state, is contaminated by Paraquat.

No one knows how much of the marijuana used in this area is Paraquat-sprayed, but some have estimated the amount at about 20 percent. It may be more.

Roger A. Roffman, state coordinator for NORML, an organization pushing for decriminalization of the state's marijuana laws, says he knows that "most of the marijuana used here comes from Mexico."

If that is true, then no doubt a large percentage of marijuana smokers here are indeed subjecting themselves to the possible harmful effects of Paraquat.

Roffman and others raise a serious question: Should not the U.S. government persuade the Mexican government to cease the use of Paraquat?

Further, is not the U.S. in its encouragement, financial and otherwise, of Mexico's anti-marijuana campaign at least partially responsible for the health hazard presented by the use of the herbicide?

The seriousness of the questions override the controversies about whether marijuana is safe or unsafe or whether the drug should not be "decriminalized."

The fact is there is the strong likelihood that marijuana users may well be exposed to lung damage.

Since it is difficult to determine quickly whether marijuana has been Paraquat-contaminated, the best advice to users of the substance would be to cease smoking the weed.

At the same time, the government should recognize the validity of the questions being raised about its participation, indirect though it may be, in the Mexicans' use of Paraquat. The least that should be done is to alert Mexico to the health dangers and to urge the use of other, less harmful herbicides.

PARAQUAT AND MARIJUANA

Most authorities, including the government's own experts, have come to agree that, smoked in moderate amounts, marijuana is a relatively harmless plant. In the past two years, however, the federal government's attempts to curb drug traffic from Mexico have turned marijuana into a truly dangerous substance. The State Department, through its section on International Narcotics Matters, has been encouraging and subsidizing a Mexican spraying program that employs paraquat, a powerful herbicide which according to a number of studies, can cause irreversible fibrosis and other serious damage to the lungs.

Although the government's own estimates indicate that 20 percent of the Mexican marijuana in this country is paraquat-contaminated; although several cases of marijuana-related lung damage have recently been identified (all of them, incidentally, in California); and although the Department of Health, Education and Welfare has issued an official health warning about paraquat, the U.S.-supported spraying program continues. The State Department's attitude is that since marijuana is an illegal substance, it has no official responsibility for the damage its program inflicts. In any case, said a State Department official, the United States cannot control the herbicides the Mexican government uses in its spraying program.

The department's fatuous explanation simply ignores the fact that it was the United States which helped inspire the spraying program in the first place, that it provides most of the planes and helicopters which spot the growing plants and spread the chemical, that it provides technical advisers, and that what it supports it can also stop or modify. But what we find more disturbing and irresponsible is the attitude itself. Spraying marijuana with poisonous chemicals is a dangerous, nearsighted and pernicious practice. The whole point of drug control is to protect health, not to damage it further.

[From the Rolling Stone, June 29, 1978]

PARAQUAT MUST GO

(By Jarn S. Wenner)

Fifteen months ago, President Carter's adviser on drug policy, Dr. Peter Bourne, was informed that marijuana brought in from Mexico was tainted by the chemical paraquat. Thirteen months later, the Carter administration decided to warn the more than 15 million Americans who smoke the stuff that they may soon be suffering irreversible lung damage for their sins. It is no small irony that an administration that has made reasonable efforts to keep marijuana smokers out of jail has decided that it can tolerate poisoning the same people.

The Carter administration's continued refusal to stop contamination of marijuana is symptomatic of what National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws director Keith Stroup has called their "moral confusion." It was only last year that poor women in need of abortions in America were informed by the president that "life isn't fair." Now this fundamental truth has been extended to high school students, blacks, and anyone else who can't afford more expensive Colombian pot. It is worth noting that the paraquat punishment is something that tends to affect less-important Americans. We can all guess what the political ramifications would be if it were discovered that the fifty-dollar-an-ounce grass that people close to Jimmy Carter smoke were also treated with dangerous chemicals.

The calloused justifications of the spraying spewed out by Peter Bourne, a man previously thought to be enlightened on the subject of drug use, are ludicrous in light of the cruel and unusual punishment to which he's subjecting millions of Americans. Bourne has said that since pot is against the law, the government has no legal responsibility to protect people who smoke it.

Bourne also has contended that to halt the spraying would have implications for international relations. The Mexican government is said to have the State Department over a barrel; they demand paraquat in return for Mexican efforts to control heroin production. There is even conjecture that paraquat spraying is part of an agreement to stop Mexican growers from trafficking arms to Central and South American revolutionaries. Are we now expected to accept that the United States government is allowing Americans to ingest poison in the name of "national security"?

Bourne's recent proposal that paraquat be replaced by the herbicide 2,4–D suggests a trade-off of possible fibrosis of the lungs for possible eye damage or birth defects—yet another morally damnable indication of bureaucratic insensitivity. If the White House can't stand up against the State Department in the defense of the health and welfare of millions of Americans, then a change is due. If such change requires Bourne's resignation, then this should occur immediately.

By backing a project that is clearly an evil relic of the Nixon administration, Jimmy Carter has asked us to see him as little better than the moral equivalent of his recent predecessors.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, this amendment prevents funds authorized in this act from being used in herbicide programs if such herbicides are likely to cause serious harm to the health of persons who may ultimately use the sprayed marihuana. It further requires that any determinations with regard to withholding funds be based on scientific information. The committee accepts the amendment proposed by Senator PERCY.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. CASE. The Senator is correct.

I simply wish to say that I think it is a very worthy amendment.

I believe the State Department has advised that it thinks it can operate under the terms of this amendment effectively and also without antagonizing our neighbor to the south. On that understanding, I am perfectly happy to accept it and I do accept it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I am willing to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CASE. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield back all his time?

Mr. PERCY. The Senator from Illinois yields back the remainder of his time.

I thank my distinguished colleagues.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. PERCY. I thank my distinguished colleagues.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1496

(Purpose: To amend the Arms Export Control Act to include in letters of offer for the sale of arms appropriate charges for certain inventory losses)

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I send an unprinted amendment to the desk and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) proposes unprinted amendment numbered 1496.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 22, between lines 16 and 17, insert the following:

SALES FROM STOCK

SEC. 17. Section 21(e)(1) of the Arms Export Control Act is amended—

(1) by striking out in clause (B) "and" immediately after "defense articles";

(2) by adding "and" at the end of clause (C); and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(D) the recovery of ordinary inventory losses associated with the sale from stock of such defense articles that are being stored at the expense of the purchaser of such articles.".

Redesignate subsequent sections accordingly.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, this amendment regards the recovery of inventory losses when selling items to foreign governments from stock.

Cost recovery in foreign military sales transactions is a complex and technical matter. There is no doubt, however, that, in passing the Arms Export Control Act, Congress intended that all direct and indirect costs associated with foreign military sales be recovered from foreign governments so that the foreign military sales program would not be subsidized by Defense Department appropriations. My amendment does not introduce a new concept for cost recovery. Rather, the intent of Congress is being more clearly stated to include inventory losses as an indirect cost that should be passed on to the foreign consumer.

The General Accounting Office, in its September 8, 1977, report, stated that the Department of Defense is losing millions of dollars on sales of articles to foreign governments because normal inventory losses are not being recovered in full. In the Air Force alone, GAO estimated that such losses approximate $30 million each year.

In addition to such major articles as tanks and aircraft, the Department of Defense sells what are called secondary items including gears, bearings and gaskets or such items as engine motors, manifolds, and generators. It is current DOD policy that inventory losses be recovered on most secondary items. But GAO maintains that DOD's regulations do not cover all items they should and that, in some cases, DOD's own regulations are not implemented by the services.

Department of Defense spokesmen have told me that the Department will not object to my amendment because it is consistent with current DOD pricing policy. DOD has also expressed the view that the amendment is unnecessary. I disagree. A significant difference of opinion between the Department of Defense and GAO exists on whether the current DOD pricing policy is being implemented and whether an even greater effort should be made by the Department to recover inventory losses.

I mention this because in the GAO report it is indicated that $30 million a year from the Air Force alone would be recovered if this policy were implemented. So, therefore, I think the difference between having an agency regulation that is not carried out and having a policy that is embodied in law is quite different. And to paraphrase Everett Dirksen, $30 million here and $30 million there and pretty soon you are talking about real money. This is real money we are talking about. The recovery possibilities could run into $100 million. Foreign governments should pay the full cost—not just the bare bones cost—of the equipment that is being transferred to them.

In these circumstances, I believe that we should have the language in the legislation to make it very clear that congressional intent is on this matter.

In addition to offering this amendment, I also intend to write a letter today to the Comptroller General of the United States to ask GAO to review the matter of recovering inventory losses for sales of nonstock fund items not covered by supply support arrangements. My amendment does not cover these sales because they are not being stored at the purchaser's expense.

The Defense Department objected to charging foreign governments for losses on nonstock fund sales not covered by supply support arrangements, stating that such charges would not be equitable to foreign governments. Defense Department officials advised my staff that they, in general, do not believe that inventory losses are occurring for nonstock fund items. I will ask GAO to report on this matter by March 31, 1979, and will incorporate in the record at a subsequent date, the copy of my letter to GAO, their response, and my report to the Senate on this matter.

I take just one additional personal moment, while my two beloved and distinguished colleagues are in the Chamber, two colleagues with whom I have worked ever since the Senator from Illinois has been in the Senate, Senator SPARKMAN on the Banking Committee and also on the Committee on Foreign Relations, and Senator CASE on the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I engaged in a debate just a few weeks ago in Illinois during which we in the Senate were charged with being personally and fully responsible for the depreciation of the dollar from $1 when I went in the Senate to 47 cents today. I was charged with having voted for every bill that contributed to inflation. I made the statement that I had made it my objective and goal when I came to the Senate that I would try to set a goal of earning my annual salary every day the Senate was in session.

I do not know what the total salary has amounted to over the period of 12 years, but I can remember we fought the ABM and won that battle, and that was tens of billions of dollars saved in capital expenditures, and several billions a year in operating expenses.

I remember receiving a letter from the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, Senator PROXMIRE, who indicated that the Senator from Illinois had made possible the killing of the SST, which also was a program that would have run into billions of dollars. A billion dollars here and a billion dollars there does add up to real money when compared to the salary of a Senator who has served over 12 years. I indicate to my distinguished colleagues my gratitude for their support. We have always tried to look at the taxpayers' dollars and spend them as if they were our own.

The amendment, which I understand has been discussed by my two distinguished colleagues and is acceptable to them, is in the spirit of trying to find ways that we can improve the efficiency of Government, save the taxpayers' money, and constantly reduce the kind of unnecessary expenditure that I think has been cause for proposition 13. Taxpayers express righteous indignation when they feel that we are not squeezing the dollar hard and pinching the penny hard, because dollars and pennies are tough to come by for taxpayers hard-pressed by other expenditures.

I appreciate the indication the Senator from Illinois has had ahead of time that this amendment is acceptable and enthusiastically supported by the managers of the present bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me say to Senator PERCY, and I am sure my friend Senator CASE would agree, that we are very much impressed with not only his amendment but his explanation of it and, of course, we know of the zeal with which he works at all times.

I understood him to say that he had discussed it with Senator PROXMIRE. Facetiously, I ask was he awarded a golden fleece?

Mr. PERCY. I am happy to say the letter I received represented the opposite award, if there were such an award. That was a letter I cherished and I only mentioned it because the credibility of my statement during that debate I mentioned was questioned. We could probably multiply the goal I set out to achieve tenfold, and really, many, many Senators try very hard to spend prudently and wisely. This bill, for example, has been combed and looked at very, very carefully by the committee and great work has been done in connection with this measure that is before the Senate today.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Again I say I commend the very able Senator from Illinois for the good work and for his good explanation of it.

Mr. President, this amendment is the result of a General Accounting Office study of foreign military sales pricing policy. Senator PERCY's amendment has been agreed to by the Department of Defense and could save the taxpaver more than $30 million annually. I compliment my colleague for his efforts to save the taxpayer money.

For my part, I am willing to say the committee accepts the amendment offered by Senator PERCY.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes, indeed.

Mr. CASE. I join my colleague and chairman in saying that it is a good amendment. It is typical of the kind of work that day in and day out the Senator does. I am astounded at the amount of money he has saved, and I am sure the Senator will find the voters in his State will rush to the polls and return him and assure themselves of his services for another 6 years.

I accept the amendment for my side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. (MATSUNAGA). Does the Senator yield back his time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield back his time?

Mr. PERCY. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time, on the Senator's time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Time not to be charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate is now in session for morning business.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Chirdon, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bills:

S. 785. An act to declare that all right, title, and interest of the United States in 2,700 acres, more or less, are hereby held in trust for the Paiute and Shoshone Tribes of the Fallon Indian Reservation and Colony, Fallon, Nev., to promote the economic self-sufficiency of the Paiute and Shoshone Tribes, and for other purposes;

H.R. 1420. An act for the relief of Umberto Ruffolo; and

H.R. 10569. An act to amend the Alcohol and Drug Abuse Education Act to extend the authorizations and appropriations for carrying out the provisions of such act, and for other purposes.

The enrolled bills were subsequently signed by the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

The message further announced that the House has passed the following joint resolution, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.J. Res. 682. A joint resolution to provide for the designation of a week as "National Lupus Week".

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

At 2:11 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled joint resolution:

H.J. Res. 1024. A joint resolution making urgent supplemental appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service, and for other purposes for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978.

The enrolled joint resolution was subsequently signed by the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

At 4:20 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to H.R. 12240, an act to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for intelligence and intelligence-related activities of the U.S. Government, the intelligence community staff, the Central Intelligence Agency Retirement and Disability System, and for other purposes; agrees to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that Mr. BOLAND, Mr. BURLISON of Missouri, Mr. MINETA, and Mr. ROBINSON, and for intelligence-related activities, Mr. PRICE, Mr. ICHORD, and Mr. BOB WILSON were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to H.R. 12426, an act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide financial assistance for the city of New York.

PETITIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following petitions and memorials, which were referred as indicated:

POM–764. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Guam; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"RESOLUTION NO. 336

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the Territory of Guam:

"Whereas, House Joint Resolution 554 calls for a constitutional amendment to provide representation in Congress for the District of Columbia; and

"Whereas, the goal of House Joint Resolution 554 is to provide full voting representation in both the Senate and the House for a populace which has been historically denied representation; and

"Whereas, the residents of Guam as well as the other residents of the territories of the United States and the District of Columbia carry the same burdens of citizenship as all other Americans yet they have no representation whatsoever in the Senate and one "non-voting" delegate in the House of Representatives; and

"Whereas, this denial of representation is an affront to our democratic ideals and a blight on our record as a free nation to guarantee representative government for all Americans; and

"Whereas, we support and encourage the United States Senate to act favorably on House Joint Resolution 554, we also ask the United States Congress to encourage and promote the initiation and passage of a similar joint resolution granting Guam's citizens voting representation in both Houses of Congress; and

"Whereas, the achievement of full civil libertarianism for all of America's citizens and the elimination of the blight on democracy of a non-represented people will only be accomplished with the granting of full voting representation to the entire American community including America's territories; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, that the Fourteenth Guam Legislature respectfully requests that the United States Senate act favorably on House Joint Resolution 554; and be it further

"Resolved, that the Congress of the United States is respectfully requested to initiate and support a similar resolution granting full voting representation to America's territories as well; and be it further

"Resolved, that the Speaker certify to and the Legislative Secretary attest the adoption hereof and that copies of the same be thereafter transmitted to the President of the United States; to the President Pro Tempore, U.S. Senate; to the Senate Majority Leader; to the Senate Minority Leader; to the Senate Minority Whip; to the Speaker, House of Representatives; to the House Majority Leader; to the House Minority Leader; to the House Minority Whip; to Senator Edward M. Kennedy; to the Delegate from the District of Columbia; to the Delegate from Guam; to the Delegate from the Virgin Islands; to the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico; to the Liaison Officer from American Samoa; to the Washington Representative from the Northern Marianas; to the Liaison Officer from Micronesia; to the Governor of Puerto Rico; to the Governor of the Virgin Islands; to the Governor of American Samoa; to the Governor of the Northern Marianas; to the Speaker, Puerto Rico Legislature; to the Speaker, Virgin Islands Legislature; to the Speaker, American Samoa Legislature; to the Speaker, Northern Marianas Legislature; to the Congressional Delegation from Hawaii; to the Secretary of State; to the Secretary of Interior; to the Chairman, National Democratic Committee; to the Chairman, National Republican Committee; to the Executive Editor, Washington Post; to the Executive Editor, Washington Star; to the Executive Editor, New York Times; to the Bureau Chief, Gannett Newspapers, Washington, D.C. and to the Governor of Guam."

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, July 25, 1978, he presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bill:

S. 785. An act to declare that all right, title, and interest of the United States in two thousand seven hundred acres, more or less, are hereby held in trust for the Paiute and Shoshone Tribes of the Fallon Indian Reservation and Colony, Fallon, Nevada, to promote the economic self-sufficiency of the Paiute and Shoshone Tribes, and for other purposes.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. HOLLINGS, from the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, with an amendment:

H.R. 11209. An act to provide for the establishment, ownership, operation, and governmental oversight and regulation of international maritime satellite telecommunications services (Rept. No. 95-1036).

By Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Commitee on Environment and Public Works, without amendment:

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following executive reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. EASTLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Eugene Madden, Jr., of New York, to be U.S. Marshal for the Northern District of New York.

(The above nomination from the Committee on the Judiciary was reported with the recommendation that it be confirmed, subject to the nominee's commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.)

By Mr. EASTLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Jose A. Gonzalez, Jr., of Florida, to be U.S. District Judge for the Southern District of Florida.

Edward S. Smith, of Maryland, to be an Associate Judge of the U.S. Court of Claims.

By Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

Omi Gail Walden, of Georgia, to be an Assistant Secretary of Energy (Conservation and Solar Applications).

(The above nomination was reported with the recommendation that it be confirmed, subject to the nominee's commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.)

● Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources today favorably reported the nomination of Omi G. Walden to be Assistant Secretary of Energy for Conservation and Solar Applications.

Committee consideration of this nomination has been delayed for an extended period because of a pending investigation of the Georgia State Energy Office. This investigation has focused on alleged irregularities in the State set-aside program. The purpose of the delay was to determine to what extent, if any, the investigation might involve Ms. Walden.

The committee has received a copy of a letter from the Deputy Attorney General, Mr. Civiletti, to the President's counsel, dated June 8, 1978, reporting the FBI's conclusion that Ms. Walden had no responsibility for the Georgia State Energy Office during the period when possible criminal violations occurred, that during her directorship of the successor agency the existing irregularities were corrected and that there is no evidence that she is or is likely to be included as a subject of the criminal investigation.

The committee's hearing on this nomination was held on June 29, 1978. The record of that hearing has been printed and includes letters and testimony regarding Ms. Walden's administration of the Georgia Office of Energy Resources.

Mr. President. I ask unanimous consent that Ms. Walden's sworn financial statement submitted to the committee be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

QUALIFICATIONS

Upon graduation from the University of Georgia in 1969 (A.B. in Journalism), I began a career in public service and have been privileged throughout the past ten years to hold several positions of increasing responsibility.

From 1968–1969, I was with the Georgia Ports Authority in Savannah, Georgia, as Assistant Director for Public Relations. In this capacity, I was responsible for evaluating both the technical and substantive components of the Public Relations program and following through with the development and implementation of new strategies. Two major program areas which received primary emphasis were marketing of the Authority's facilities and services to industrial leaders; and secondly, facilitating trade and economic development and through increased involvement in international State, and local officials.

During 1970–1973, I served as Director of Public Relations for the U.S. HUD Model Cities Program in Alma, Georgia. I was responsible for the planning and implementation of a comprehensive Public and Intergovernmental Relations program. This involved providing management and local officials extensive counseling on the most effective strategy for marketing major programs covering a broad range of complex economic, social, and governmental issues to all levels of government, the business community, and the general public. To carry out this function a thorough understanding of the policies, programs, and funding priorities of various federal and State agencies, as well as their interrelationships was necessary. The goal of establishing the Alma Program as a model for rural development planning and action programs involved especially close coordination with the U.S. HUD Assistant Secretary for Community Development and the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and its Rural Development Subcommittee. The effectiveness of these activities in policy formulation and program transfer was evidenced by the Subcommittee's visit to Alma and the subsequent development and enactment of the National Rural Development and enactment of the National Rural Development Act of 1972. Another example is the Early Childhood Development Program which served as the model for the State's kindergarten program.

In addition to my duties as Director of Public Relations, I was responsible during 1970 for establishing the citizen participation and outreach network, which served as the focal point for the Model Cities Agency's interaction with various interest groups and the general public. I gained a continuing appreciation for the merits of actively soliciting a broad base of input into each phase of the decision-making process.

While serving as Director of Public Relations, I also served from 1971–1972 as Director of Research and Evaluation; and was responsible for establishing this area as a Division of the Agency. Specific functions included the design and development of a management information system; design of evaluation methodologies; analysis and interpretation of data; supervising evaluations of major Model Cities funded projects; and the presentation of audit findings to federal and local officials. This experience was most significant in that I gained an understanding of the inherent problems in the rapid development and implementation of large programs and the effective deployment of large sums of money from a management standpoint.

From 1973–1976, I served as Federal/State Relations Coordinator and Policy Advisor on Energy and Environmental Issues for former Governor Jimmy Carter and his successor Governor George Busbee. I was responsible for liaison activities between the Governor's Office and the Georgia Department of Natural Resources, the Georgia Congressional Delegation, all congressional standing committees and federal agencies relevant to energy and natural resources, and the Energy Program of the National Governors' Association (NGA). I prepared issue and legislative analyses, testimony, and position papers.

During this period, I served as the Governor's representative to the NGA Energy Steering Committee, and worked with the Office of Management and Budget and subsequently with the Federal Energy Office and the Federal Energy Administration to address a broad range of energy issues. I participated in the development of rules and regulations for the petroleum allocation program and the development of a standby rationing plan. Additionally, I handled special projects for the Governor, such as coordinating the preparation of the State's proposal for the National Solar Energy Research Institute.

In 1975, I authored the enabling legislation for the Georgia Office of Energy Resources. This legislation mandates that priority be given to conservation and the commercialization of alternate energy technologies. I also authored the State's two laws which provide tax incentives for the production and use of solar powered systems. Furthermore, I was instrumental in the development and enactment of legislation to provide the State's Environmental Protection Division the resources to establish and carry out an environmental monitoring and control program for radioactive substances.

In August 1976, I was appointed by James T. McIntyre, Jr., to serve as Director of the Georgia Office of Energy Resources, which by law is a Division of the Governor's Office of Planning and Budget. Specific duties include: serving as energy advisor to the Governor and the General Assembly; directing all programs and activities of the Office; representing the Governor and the agency with all levels of government, academic institutions, utilities, industry, and public interest, trade, and professional organizations; representing the Governor and the agency in national, regional, and substate energy-related conferences and commissions; serving as spokesperson for the Governor and the Agency in giving speeches, testimony, and handling contacts with the news media.

In this capacity, I represent the Governor as chairperson of the Energy Committee of the President's Intergovernmental Science, Engineering, and Technology Advisory Panel (ISETAP). I am also his representative to the Natural Resources and Environmental Management Committee of the National Governors' Association, and serve on three subcommittees: Energy Conservation, Energy Resource Management, and Energy Facility Siting. Additionally, I serve as a member of the Governor's Task Force on the Transportation of Nuclear Materials.

Through this range of substantive, functional, and managerial experience, I gained an understanding of the process for marketing major and sometimes complex programs to key groups within both the public and private sectors. I believe, this combined with my understanding of the energy problem, as well as my knowledge of traditional resources and the opportunities for conservation and alternate resources will be valuable in achieving a more timely and balanced approach for meeting the energy needs of our Nation and the world.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. EAGLETON (for himself, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. PELL, and Mr. HEINZ):

S. 3338. A bill to permit the distribution to charity of profits arising from the advance refunding of State and local obligations before the publication of Treasury News Release WS 1097 prohibiting such distributions and to provide relief to those jurisdictions which have already accounted for such amounts; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. HEINZ:

S. 3339. A bill to provide for a study and report on the applicability of the McFadden Act; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

By Mr. TOWER (for himself and Mr. HATCH):

S. 3340. A bill to establish a National Commission on Immigration Policy to examine and analyze the social and economic impact of the presence of undocumented aliens in the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

By Mr. THURMOND:

S. 3341. A bill to name the Veterans' Administration hospital at Columbia, S.C., the "Wm. Jennings Bryan Dorn Veterans' Hospital"; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. RANDOLPH (from the Committee on Environment and Public Works):

S. 3342. A bill to name a lake which has been completed as part of the Papillion Greek basin project as the "Standing Bear Lake." Original bill reported and placed on the calendar.

By Mr. PERCY:

S. 3343. A bill to reorganize and clarify the responsibilities of Federal agencies, Congress, and the States with respect to management of nuclear waste, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, the Committee on Environment and Public Works, and the Committee on Governmental Affairs, jointly, by unanimous consent.

TAX CONSEQUENCES OF REFINANCING OF BOND ISSUES

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, today I am introducing, with Senators DANFORTH, SPARKMAN, PELL and HEINZ, a bill to correct a problem created by the Internal Revenue Service's efforts to clarify regulations on refinancing of tax-exempt bond issues.

On September 24, 1979, the IRS issued a press release outlining of new "do's and don'ts" for municipal bond refundings. My colleagues and I certainly do not object to this legitimate exercise of IRS authority. However, we feel that IRS has erred in trying to apply their new interpretation of the law retroactively. In doing so, IRS is changing the rules in the middle of the ball game for the six local governments which are affected by my bill. Furthermore, IRS is taking millions of dollars out of the coffers of some very worthwhile charities.

In a municipal bond refunding, Mr. President, the issuer purchases U.S. Government obligations which are deposited in escrow until the initial bond issue is refunded. Under arbitrage restrictions enacted in 1969, the Government obligations must bear a limited yield rather than a market yield. Prior to the September 24, 1976, news release, issuers could purchase these obligations in either of two ways. One way was to buy them from a private party at a price greater than the market price thereby generating a "windfall" profit which was held in escrow. The other way was to buy them from a private party at a price sued by the U.S. Treasury, thereby generating a "windfall" for the Federal Government.

Jackson County, Mo., was one local government which had chosen to go the first route. In the spring of 1976, Jackson County refinanced $65 million worth of general obligations bonds, and in the process picked up a windfall profit of about $4 million. In order to dispose of the profit in accordance with IRS rules, the county devised a plan to distribute the money to 200 local charitable and civic organizations.

That was the situation on September 24, 1976, when IRS threw a wrench into the works with its press release. The release indicated that such "windfall" profits no longer would be allowed. Furthermore, the IRS indicated that the new interpretation would be effective retroactively. The IRS since has proposed that "windfall" profits accumulated prior to the September 24 release should be allowed to be distributed only to the U.S. Treasury, or to the investment bankers involved in the refundings. It appears that the IRS intends to regard the bonds issued as arbitrage bonds, which will lose their tax-exempt status if the windfall is distributed to charity.

It should be noted, Mr. President, that this whole issue is a matter of IRS interpretation. There is no statute on the books which would prohibit charitable distribution of this type of profit, nor were there any regulations in effect to prohibit this at the time Jackson County and the five other local governments refunded their bonds. In fact, Congress in 1973 had an opportunity to enact legislation very similar to the current IRS policy, and Congress chose not to act on the issue.

I do not quarrel with the Internal Revenue Service's right and duty to interpret the regulations. I do quarrel with the manner in which these regulations are being arbitrarily applied to six jurisdictions which already had completed their bond refundings, and had done so in good faith and in accordance with existing rules. I further find it somewhat ironic that while the IRS will not allow the profits to be given to tax-exempt charities, they seem perfectly content to allow the profits to be given to the investment bankers who consulted on the refundings.

The bill I am introducing today on behalf of my four colleagues would rectify this situation, with the effect of allowing only these six local governments to proceed with the distribution of their windfall profits. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3338

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) notwithstanding any provision of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 or any regulation, news release, or ruling promulgated or proposed thereunder to the contrary, interest, profits or other amounts arising out of the advance refunding, before September 24, 1976, of one or more issues of obligations of a State, a territory, or a possession of the United States, or any political subdivision of any of the foregoing (hereinafter referred to as the "refund profit"), held in a trust fund or escrow arrangement, or held by an underwriter or other person under an agreement (whether or not enforceable), which contemplates the payment of the refund profit to one or more organizations described in section 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 and exempt from taxation under section 501(a) of such Code, may be paid over to such organizations without causing the refunding obligations to be classified or treated as arbitrage bonds under section 103(c) and without penalty to the issuer. If the refund profit is held in a trust fund or escrow arrangement subject to an agreement (whether or not enforceable) which provides for the payment of the refund profit to such organizations, it shall be paid over in accordance with the terms of such agreement.

(b) In the case of refund profit held under an agreement or arrangement described in (a) which has been paid over to the United States directly, or by purchasing United States obligations which bear an interest rate lower than the highest rate of interest borne by public debt securities of the United States generally available for purchase at the time such obligations were purchased, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay, out of any amounts in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount equal to that portion of the refund profit which has been so paid over to the United States. Moneys so paid shall be distributed within 90 days after receipt in the same manner as if the refund profit had not been paid to the United States.

By Mr. HEINZ:

S. 3339. A bill to provide for a study and report on the applicability of the McFadden Act; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the question of interstate branching by national banks has been debated for many years. Those studying the issue and providing comment have included all of the Federal bank regulatory agencies, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Treasury Department. In addition the appropriate committees and sub-committees of Congress have, on occasion, held hearings and studied the issue. Of course, interested parties such as the American Bankers Association and the Independent Bankers Association have also provided comment.

The Federal legislation being debated is the McFadden Act of 1927, which limits the ability of national banks to operate branches on an interstate basis. Proposals to amend this act have been exchanged between the Congress and the bank regulatory agencies for many years; yet no definitive action even towards making preliminary recommendations has been taken. Congress has requested the advice of the bank reguatory agencies, and the bank regulatory agencies have requested congressional direction. This endless circle of discussion continues while our Government succeeds in sidestepping an important issue.

As an example of the feelings of the Federal Bank regulators toward the McFadden Act, I am including the following statements from testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Financial Institutions during hearings on the International Banking Act of 1978 on June 21, 1978:

Chairman Miller, of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System:

> The national policy of barring interstate banking, as embodied in the McFadden Act, needs review. Banking has changed. The structure of the economy and its financial needs have also changed since the McFadden Act was passed over 50 years ago.

Mr. John Heiman, the Comptroller of the Currency:

> The central problem, of course, arises from the McFadden Act, which restricts branching for national banks and which is the product of another era in the economic and political history of this country. Clearly, domestic branching restrictions require reevaluation.

Mr. Robert H. Mundheim, general counsel of the Treasury Department:

> Interstate branching raises a fundamental competitive question with long-term implications for banking structure in the United States. Technological developments, for example, in the area of electronic funds transfer have increased the urgency of answering that question.

Without the benefit of advice and recommendations from the Federal agencies with respective oversight responsibilities, I have not determined whether changes in the McFadden Act are, in fact, merited. I do believe, in any case, that the applicability of this act should be assessed.

The Congress needs to have the facts along with a definitive set of recommendations put before it by the Federal banking regulatory agencies for further debate and possible legislative action. We do not need to form a multi-year commission to study the issue. There has been an ongoing discussion of the subject within the administration and within the banking community.

Therefore, I am introducing legislation that will direct the President through the appropriate Federal bank regulatory agencies to present a set of recommendations to the Congress with regard to the applicability of the McFadden Act to the current banking structure. These recommendations are to be made within 1 year of the enactment of the bill.●

By Mr. TOWER (for himself and Mr. HATCH):

S. 3340. A bill to establish a National Commission on Immigration Policy to examine and analyze the social and economic impact of the presence of undocumented aliens in the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON IMMIGRATION POLICY ACT OF 1978

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I am introducing today on behalf of Senator HATCH and myself the National Commission on Immigration Policy Act of 1978, a bill to establish a national commission to examine and analyze the social and economic impact of the presence of undocumented workers or illegal aliens in the United States.

This bill addresses problems Texas and other states are facing today as a result of our national immigration policy.

To illustrate briefly, the border school districts in Texas are presently struggling with a problem that stems from the rapidly increasing enrollments of legal children. These legal alien children place added financial burdens on the taxpaying residents of our local school districts due to the additional classroom space needed to serve their educational requirements. Although their presence and subsequent enrollment is the immediate result of this Nation's immigration laws and policy, no Federal assistance is authorized to provide some needed relief for many hard-pressed taxpayers who live in these school districts in my State.

I introduced the first legislation to assist the border school districts of Texas last year and called for a full review of our national immigration policy. In doing so, it was my intention that Congress should examine and publicly identify the numerous ways our national policy creates added burdens for States like Texas. Congress should determine how those burdens could be distributed more evenly and fairly among all Americans, rather than being borne so disproportionately by Texans.

Presently, the social and economic impact of our existing national policy, in this example of increasing enrollments of legal aliens in Texas' border school districts, is not evenly distributed among all Americans. There is no provision in our immigration and naturalization laws that mandates where a newly arrived legal immigrant family must settle and live. Of course, in practice, this often means that legal immigrants increasingly are making their homes in the communities nearest the border in my State.

Unfortunately, as of this date, there has been no sign from the administration that it is sensitive to these needs or that it intends to assist in resolving them. Yet, it has asked Congress to approve its legislation on undocumented workers. If Congress were to approve that legislation, it could only serve to aggravate further the existing problems already created by our national immigration policy. At the same time, it could have a serious social and economic impact on our country as a result of the bill's amnesty and resident alien category provisions.

Mr. President, I am especially concerned over the glaring absence of accurate and pertinent information and data that is seen in the administration's request for legislation to resolve the undocumented worker problem. This concern was underscored time and time again during the hearings held by the Senate Judiciary Committee. Clearly, there does exist a critical need for accurate and verifiable data on undocumented workers or illegal aliens—with a special emphasis on the social and economic impact of their presence in this country.

Congress can hardly enact sound legislation on this national problem if its true dimensions and scope are not precisely known. Nonetheless, Congress and the American people are being asked to give their approval for the administration's bill even though it is based on estimates rather than reliable data.

The National Commission on Immigration Policy established by our bill will develop data that is absolutely essential to a full understanding of this issue and its possible remedies. It will provide for the careful examination of the impact of the presence of undocumented aliens on the social, economic, and political conditions of our country; on our demographic trends; on our current and projected unemployment rates; and on our foreign policy.

In addition, it will mandate the study and evaluation of existing laws, policies, and procedures governing the admission of immigrants to the United States.

The bill also addresses a question that has been avoided by the President's legislation. It is the question of what our Nation can do or must do to deal with the problem of illegal immigration where it originally begins—and this of course means the countries of origin for undocumented workers.

This legislation will create a commission to examine and analyze our country's policies and programs to determine specifically what affect they have or can have, on the economies of countries of origin for undocumented workers. Foreign trade, foreign aid, economic, social, technological, and immigration policies and programs are among those to be analyzed.

Mr. President, legislation to establish a National Commission may be viewed by some as little more than an attempt to delay any decision or action on the issue of illegal immigration. That would be entirely inaccurate; rather, it is very clear, indeed, that the work of a national commission is urgently needed. Unless we have these results and findings and use them, in turn, to determine policy, we will not have a sound basis for legislation or any other alternative designed to reduce the flow of undocumented workers into this country. Equally important, we will not know what the ultimate costs to various elements of our society, such as the Hispanic American community, will be if Congress proceeds to enact legislation that is based on estimates rather than sound data. Nor will the American people have any clear idea in advance just what it may cost in economic and financial terms to reduce this flow.

This bill creates a National Commission whose membership shall include the Secretaries of State, Labor, and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. The Attorney General is also a named member. In addition, four members of the Senate and four members of the House of Representatives, equally divided in both cases between the majority and minority parties, would be named to the Commission.

Rounding out the membership of the Commission are four members to be appointed by the President. It is here that the issue of illegal immigration requires a special sensitivity. To accomplish this goal, it is intended that at least two of the four public members named by the President shall be representatives of the major Hispanic organizations, including community-based organizations that are involved with the Hispanic community, such as LULAC, American GI Forum, IMAGE, and SER, Jobs for Progress, Inc.

Mr. President, a national commission will be mandated to gather, examine, and analyze data relating to our national immigration policy; the presence and impact of undocumented workers in our country; and the impact of our country's laws and policies—particularly those involving economic, trade, and investment activities abroad—on the domestic economies of countries of origin for undocumented aliens.

In addition to developing recommendations and options encompassing this broad view of immigration policy and illegal immigration, the Commission will also permit the American people to know in advance what impact, costs or sacrifices, and other considerations may be involved if our Nation truly is going to confront this national issue of illegal immigration.

We welcome our colleagues joining with us on this important legislation, and we urge the Senate's earliest approval for a National Commission on Immigration Policy.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3340

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the National Commission on Immigration Policy Act of 1978".

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION

SEC. 2. (a) There is established as an independent instrumentality of the United States a commission to be known as the National Commission on Immigration Policy (hereinafter referred to in this Act as the Commission").

(b) The Commission shall be composed of 16 members as follows:

(1) Four members appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one of whom shall be designated by the President as Chairman.

(2) The Secretary of State, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Labor, and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(3) Four members appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives from the membership of the House, two representing the majority and two representing the minority.

(4) Four members appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate from the membership of the Senate, two representing the majority and two representing the minority.

(c) The term of office of each member and of the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Commission shall be for the life of the Commission. A vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers, and shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(d) Eight members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum, but not less than four members may hold hearings.

(e) The Commission may elect a Vice Chairman from its membership to serve in the absence of the Chairman and carry out his duties and responsibilities.

DUTIES OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 3. (a) The Commission shall study and evaluate, in accordance with subsection (b), existing laws, policies, and procedures governing the admission of immigrants to the United States and make administrative and legislative recommendations to the President and to the Congress as are required under section 7.

(b) In particular, the Commission shall—

(1) conduct a study and analysis of the effect of the provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act (and administrative Interpretations thereof) and examine and analyze the social and economic impact of the presence of undocumented aliens in the United States on—

(A) social, economic, and political conditions in the United States;

(B) demographic trends;

(C) present and projected unemployment in the United States; and

(D) the conduct of foreign policy;

(2) conduct a study and analysis of the effect of United States foreign aid, foreign trade, economic, social, technological, and immigration policies and programs to determine—

(A) how and to what extent such programs and policies affect the economies of countries of origin of undocumented aliens;

(B) recommendations for new or additional program initiatives;

(C) the feasibility of such recommendations, including possible use of bilateral agreements to implement such recommendations;

(D) projected cost of such recommendations; and

(E) cost-comparisons between such recommendations and the establishment of an effective deterrent to illegal immigration through increases in enforcement resources and personnel; and

(3) review and make recommendations with respect to the numerical limitations, and exemptions from such limitations, of the Immigration and Nationality Act on the admission of permanent resident aliens.

POWERS OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 4. (a) The Commission or, on the authorization of the Commission, any subcommittee or member thereof, may, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act, hold such hearings and sit and act at such times and places, administer such oaths, and require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memoranda, papers, and documents as the commission or such subcommittee or member may deem advisable.

(b) (1) Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the Chairman or any member of the Commission designated by him and shall be served by any person designated by the Chairman or any members. Any member of the Commission may administer oaths or affirmation to witnesses appearing before the Commission.

(2) The provisions of section 1821 of title 28, United States Code, shall apply to witnesses summoned to appear at any such hearing. The per diem and mileage allowances to witnesses summoned under authority conferred by this section shall be paid from funds appropriated to the Commission.

(3) Any person who willfully neglects or refuses to qualify as a witness, or to testify, or to produce any evidence in obedience to any subpena duly issued under the authority of this section shall be fined not more than $500, or imprisoned for not more than 6 months, or both. Upon the certification by the Chairman of the Commission of the facts concerning any such willful disobedience by any person to the United States Attorney for any judicial district in which such person resides or is found, such attorney may proceed by information for the prosecution of such person for such offense.

(c) The Commission may acquire directly from the head of any department, agency, independent instrumentality, or other authority of the executive branch of the Government, available information which the Commission considers useful in the discharge of its duties. All departments, agencies, and independent instrumentalities, or other authorities of the executive branch of the Government shall cooperate with the Commission and furnish all information requested by the Commission to the extent permitted by law.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 5. (a) Subject to such rules and regulations as may be adopted by the Commission, the Commission shall have the power—

(1) to appoint and fix the compensation of an Executive Director, and such additional staff personnel as it deems necessary, without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and without regard to chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 52 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, but—

(A) in the case of the Executive Director, at a rate equal to that for level V of the Executive Schedule under section 5316 of title 5, United States Code; and

(B) in the case of all other personnel, at rates not in excess of the maximum rate for

GS–18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of such title; and

(2) to procure temporary and intermittent services to the same extent as is authorized by section 3109 of title 5, United States Code.

(b) (1) The Commission is authorized to enter into agreements with the General Services Administration for procurement of necessary financial and administrative services, for which payment shall be made by reimbursement from funds of the Commission in such amounts as may be agreed upon the Chairman and the Administrator of General Services.

(2) The Commission is authorized to make grants and enter into contracts for the conduct of research and study necessary to implement the provisions of this Act.

(c) (1) Any Federal employee subject to the civil service laws, rules, and regulations may be detailed to the Commission, and such detail shall be without interruption or loss of civil service status or privilege.

(2) Any staff member of any committee of the Senate or of any committee of the House of Representatives may be detailed to serve on the staff of the Commission by the chairman of the respective committee. Any staff member so detailed shall serve on the staff of the Commission without additional compensation except that he or she may receive such reimbursement of expenses incurred as the Commission may authorize.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS

SEC. 6. (a) The Chairman of the Commission shall receive compensation at a rate equal to the daily rate prescribed for level III of the Executive Schedule under section 5314 of title 5, United States Code, and the Vice Chairman shall receive compensation at a rate equal to the daily rate prescribed for level IV of the Executive Schedule under section 5315 of title 5, United States Code.

(b) All other members of the Commission who are not officers or employees of the Federal Government shall receive compensation at the rate of $200 for each day such member is engaged in the performance of the duties vested in the Commission.

(c) All members of the Commission shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred in connection with their activities as members of the Commission.

REPORTS AND TERMINATION

SEC. 7. (a) The Commission shall transmit a report to the President and to each House of Congress within one year after the date of the enactment of this Act. Such report shall contain the findings and recommendations of the Commission and the progress of the Commission in completing its studies.

(b) The final report shall be transmitted to the President and each House of Congress within two years after the date of the appointment of the last member of the Commission to be appointed.

(c) The Commission shall cease to exist on the ninetieth day beginning after the date of the transmission of its final report.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 8. There is authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.●

By Mr. THURMOND:

S. 3341. A bill to name the Veterans' Administration hospital at Columbia, S.C., the "Wm. Jennings Bryan Dorn Veterans' Hospital"; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

● Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to name the new Veterans' Administration hospital at Columbia, S.C., the "Wm. Jennings Bryan Dorn Veterans Hospital." This legislation is identical to S. 878, which I introduced in the Senate in 1975, but which was not acted upon by the Congress.

William Jennings Bryan Dorn was born in Greenwood County, S.C., on April 14, 1916. At the age of 22 he was elected to the South Carolina House of Representatives. At the age of 24 he became a State senator, the then youngest citizen of South Carolina ever to have been elected to that public office. After the bombing of Pearl Harbor, he resigned his seat in the State senate and volunteered for military service. He served for 3½ years in the Army Air Corps and was one of seven brothers in service during that wartime period.

Mr. Dorn was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1946 and served there 26 years. He was a member of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation and the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, serving on the latter committee for 23 years and as its chairman during the 93d Congress. Mr. Dorn retired from the Congress in 1974.

As a member of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, Mr. Dorn demonstrated an exceptional and creative interest in the health care needs of our Nation's veterans. Without the resourcefulness and industry that characterized Mr. Dorn's many contributions to the development and improvement of the VA hospital system, health care for veterans would not be what it is today. Additionally, Mr. Dorn's efforts in assisting to obtain the new VA replacement hospital in Columbia, S.C. were helpful.

In view of the history of Mr. Dorn's lasting contributions in behalf of our Nation's 30 million veterans, and particularly the veterans of South Carolina, it is exceedingly appropriate that the new replacement hospital in Columbia bear his name. I urge that this measure receive the full support of my colleagues.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Veterans' Administration hospital at Columbia, South Carolina, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Wm. Jennings Bryan Dorn Veterans' Hospital". Any reference to such hospital in any law, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States shall be deemed a reference to it as the "Wm. Jennings Bryan Dorn Veterans' Hospital."●

S. 3343. A bill to reorganize and clarify the responsibilities of Federal agencies, Congress, and the States with respect to management of nuclear waste, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, the Committee on Environment and Public Works, and the Committee on Governmental Affairs, jointly, by unanimous consent.

NUCLEAR WASTE MANAGEMENT ACT OF 1978

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the legislation I am introducing today on nuclear waste management has two goals. First is to set the Federal Government on the track of a solution to nuclear waste disposal so that nuclear power is not foreclosed as an energy option. The second is to insure that sound scientific knowledge precedes decisions on technical options, so that final decisions reflect the most environmentally sound mode of storage. I hope that this bill, after 3 days of hearings on it started today, can be molded into the basis for a national decisionmaking process on the nuclear waste issue.

I believe it is important to put the magnitude of the dangers of nuclear waste into perspective. Margaret Maxey of the University of Detroit has written:

> The problem of radioactive waste management is neither unique nor unprecedented.

Nor does nuclear waste represent any sort of present danger. For example, the high level wastes from atom bomb production which have leaked from tanks at the Energy Department's Hanford, Wash., reservation, are the most troublesome in existence. Yet the National Academy of Science concluded in a technical report released this spring that "there has not been in the past, and is not at present, any significant radiation hazard to public health and safety from waste management operations at Hanford."

Opponents of nuclear power are correct when they point out that to safely store nuclear wastes into an indefinite future will require enormously careful technical decisions, and will involve a calculated risk of failure. But the risk is manageable; the remaining technical uncertainties are solvable, if we proceed forthwith to work on them. The President s Office of Science and Technology Policy concluded as follows in a July 3, 1978 draft report:

> The task of accurately predicting the fate of radionuclides emplaced in (an underground) repository over time frames of even several hundreds to many thousands of years is unprecedented. The principal earth science disciplines involved in such a task . . . are relatively young sciences with little experience in making or evaluating predictions that cover time frames even as short as a few decades. Numerous limitations of our knowledge in these fields, pertinent to radioactive waste disposal, are identified throughout this paper. Nevertheless, we believe that such gaps in our current knowledge need not rule out successful underground containment of radionuclides for periods of many thousands of years.

What is needed is a determination by those in policy positions to set themselves on course.

I fear that this determination may have been lacking. The public perceives it that way. Governor James Edwards of South Carolina testified June 20 before Senator Hart's Subcommittee on Nuclear Regulation, "Through I am personally convinced that enormous technological progress has been made, the public perception is that nothing has happened."

The Energy Department, and its predecessors the Energy Research and Development Administration, the Atomic Energy Commission, and the Manhattan project back in World War II, have at various times neglected waste management or have shifted tracks. Though it is not fair to say either that DOE and its predecessors ignored waste in its haste to promote nuclear power, or that solutions it has proposed have failed, we are today faced with the need to settle on a technical approach to nuclear waste disposal 25 years after the beginning of the nuclear age.

There is great public fear of alleged dangers of nuclear waste. In a July 14 column in his newsletter Energy Daily nuclear advocate Lewellyn King noted that he is questioned about nuclear waste hazards more than about any other aspect of nuclear power. Many in the nuclear industry see the Department of Energy as irresolute, afraid of taking a stand. It sees the administration's interagency review group on nuclear waste as a paper exercise designed to postpone hard decisions. The National Conference of State Legislatures reports that more than half a dozen States have enacted restrictions on nuclear waste storage in their borders. Concern over disposal operations at Sheffield and Morris in Illinois have made nuclear power controversial in my home State.

The General Accounting Office reached these conclusions about Federal nuclear waste programs in a July 13, 1978, report entitled "Major Unresolved Issues Preventing a Timely Resolution to Radioactive waste Disposal":

> Any comprehensive waste management program will have to address various types of waste—both commercial and Federal—that are now accumulating at disposal ground, facilities, and nuclear power plants. In addition the program will have to delineate the agency(ies) responsible for coordinating activities required in demonstrating successful waste disposal. As of yet, such a comprehensive radioactive waste management program has not been developed . . . Target dates currently envisioned by DOE are optimistic, and it is doubtful that they will be achieved due to public unacceptability.

John Ahearne, now a member of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, testified before the Subcommittee on Nuclear Regulation on June 13 that:

> The future of nuclear power depends entirely on the next three to five years. It depends on the resolution of the waste disposal issue and on whether the public accepts that solution.

Mr. President, the concepts of eliminating overlapping jurisdictions, setting comprehensive programs, and reforming schedules and priorities are among the most abused buzzwords in this city. They are used whenever a policymaker wishes to justify an action and has no better reasons. I am told that the Washington Post has a standing rule that reporters may not use the word "reform" in stories about Federal Government reorganization. I would instead like to characterize what is needed on nuclear waste, what I hope my bill will provide a first step toward, as giving a sense of direction and encouragement of leadership. Congressional initiative would not be necessary if the concerned agencies were doing their work properly—and if they were, public perception of the waste issue would not be so bad.

Mr. President, I wish to briefly discuss several suggested approaches to waste management which I believe to be inappropriate.

Opponents of nuclear power have suggested that there be a moratorium on nuclear power until an acceptable solution is settled upon. They argue that the way to solve the problem of waste is to stop generating it, and further argue that electric companies should be forced to close down their nuclear powerplants until the waste disposal problem is solved.

I am unwilling to see any existing reactors shut down because of the nuclear waste issue. Nuclear power was a major reason why the factories in my home State kept humming during the coal strike this winter.

It is also my best judgment that a solution to nuclear waste disposal is achievable. I do not perceive the risks are such as to warrant a stop to construction of new reactors. I fear that some of those who favor a moratorium wish to use nuclear waste as a weapon in a guerrilla war against nuclear power.

Finally, there is already a substantial volume of nuclear waste waiting disposal. We will need to demonstrate a disposal method for that waste regardless of whether or not we generate more waste. I expect we will succeed by the early 1990's—and if any utility decided today to build a reactor, it would be the mid to late 1990's before the reactor could operate, irradiate a load of fuel, and allow that fuel to cool in interim storage long enough to be buried in a waste repository.

A second policy option which I reject is to allow States an absolute State veto over waste decisions. States should be fully involved in all aspects of waste planning; I will discuss later how my bill attempts to insure this. Unfortunately if a Governor or legislature had the right to veto the construction of a repository within their borders, there would be inevitable political pressures to veto; a Governor would balance substantial political opposition to a repository against the unprecedented interests of a few thousand construction jobs at some future point. When 50 States have vetoed, or even if the 5 States or 10 States with acceptable sites veto, we would be in an unacceptable situation. Nuclear waste is a national problem, requiring a national solution. I quote the Illinois Commission on Atomic Energy's February report on nuclear waste:

> Illinois is self-sufficient in few ways, and that is what has made the United States a voluntary, effective union of all 50 States of which it is composed. Any restraint of the flow of goods, services, or wastes is inimical to the national welfare.

A third option which I have rejected is to declare that waste storage problems have been solved, and to order the Energy Department to poke a hole in the ground forthwith. Technical problems associated with waste, while neither grave nor intractable, have not yet been resolved. I again cite the Office of Science and Technology Policy report mentioned above. In addition, I cite a panel of Earth scientists headed by Dr. Bruno Giletti of Brown University in their recent report to EPA:

> Our ability to predict in any but the most general way over times of thousands of years is poor, yet this is the interval over which we must forecast if an underground HLW repository is to be safe for future generations . . . We are surprised and dismayed to discover how few relevant data are available on most of the candidate rock types.

The U.S. Geological Survey was even more firm in emphasizing the uncertainties in its report, "Geologic Disposal of High-Level Radioactive Waste: Earth Science Perspectives":

> Some key geologic questions are unanswered, and answers are needed before the risk associated with geological containment can be confidently evaluated.

A fourth and final option which I have considered and rejected is to give the Department of Energy a mandate to solve the problem and then seek to minimize avenues for review and outside input into DOE policymaking process.

Those who wish to close off the process maintain that waste is exclusively a technical issue, and as such should be solved by engineers in isolation from political pressures. I strongly sympathize with the desire to keep waste from becoming a political football. I also believe DOE must be given both the lead role and ultimate responsibility. However, my judgment is that from the perspectives of both open Government and of the self-interest of the nuclear industry in solving this problem, an open policy process is essential.

Jim Muckerheide of Energy Research Group of Cambridge made these points about waste management in a February 21 letter to Secretary of Energy Schlesinger:

> The traditional "project management" structure cannot create a constituency and is therefore always subject to defeat by a small minority. It cannot solve the institutional problem, because it threatens the States and all other institutions and therefore, when constituents demand a role, the program forces that role to be obstructionist . . . The key is to manage issues and processes rather than projects or products.

To follow Robert's Rules or Order and provide for full participation for agencies, States, Congress, and the public will save time in the long run. Those with legitimate concerns will see themselves brought into the process and their concerns answered. Extremists on either side of the issue who wish to derail a solution will be unable to find allies in more mainstream organizations. The bottom line is that we do not want another Seabrook in New Mexico, Utah, or wherever a waste repository is built. We want to deal with legitimate concerns so that we do not have thousands of demonstrators lying down on the railroad tracks that bring waste into the first repository.

Mr. President, let me now briefly describe the policy options incorporated in the Nuclear Waste Management Act of 1978 which I introduce today.

First, the Department of Energy is given the lead role in nuclear waste management planning. Also, nuclear waste programs are elevated through placement in a new Office of Nuclear Waste under a new director. The director will be on the assistant secretary level within the Department. This will give waste programs clout within the agency, and make one person appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate responsible for waste policy.

In drafting this legislation I considered recommendations that a new agency or corporation be established to handle waste management. My distinguished colleague from Maryland, Senator MATHIAS, follows this approach in his legislation, S. 2189, which will be considered at hearings along with my bill this week. I am moved but not persuaded by the arguments that DOE has failed to date to do a fully adequate job of managing nuclear waste, and that the best way to insure public confidence is to give waste responsibility to an independent entity. DOE has the existing programs. A reorganization would derail waste action for a year or more. Scheduling and planning requirements can get DOE moving, and procedures for public, State, agency and congressional participation can assuage any fears about DOE being more interested in promoting nuclear power than in making the right decisions on nuclear waste.

Second, this new Office of Nuclear Waste in DOE would be given specified procedures to follow to develop high level nuclear waste repositories on an expedited schedule. Along with the DOE budget in January 1979, the office would submit to the Congress plans, including schedules, for research and development work needing to be done, and for construction of both experimental and commercial-scale repositories for high level nuclear waste. A commercial repository would be scheduled for operation no later than January 1, 1993. However, the Director of the Office would be allowed to modify the schedules if technical uncertainties addressed in the research program could not be resolved in time.

I believe it is crucial to hold DOE's feet to the fire on waste scheduling. Political pressures being what they are, the natural temptation of the agency might be to research the waste issue to death; there will always be additional areas to be explored. January 1993 is an outside date for planning purposes; John Deutch, DOE's chief nuclear waste policymaker, expects that a date as early as 1988 is possible. The actual date is for DOE to decide; I ask only that they tell Congress what they believe they can accomplish, and then do their best to stick to that.

It is my intent that DOE put a corral around the uncertainties which need R. & D. work: Their January program would identify what they do not now know, and then give a schedule for R. & D. work necessary to resolve these problems. However, we want the R. & D. to rule the schedule, not vice versa. Gene Varanini of the California Energy Commission expressed my fear before the Nuclear Regulation Subcommittee on April 4:

> The promoters of technology will brush aside the cautious and thorough approach which the development and assessment of nuclear waste technology requires and instead set politically motivated time schedules, rush ahead with engineering approximations instead of sound technical foundation, and commit us to a hasty program of "demonstration."

A cautious program is in the interest of the nuclear industry. In Illinois a great furor arose when slightly elevated levels of radioactive tritium were found in a well near the Sheffield low-level waste site. That site has now been closed as a result of the controversy. A demonstration repository which had minor leaks or other problems would set back waste planning for years, and perhaps provide a death blow to the nuclear industry.

The third key feature of my legislation is to institutionalize input from other agencies through establishment of an interagency Nuclear Waste Review Panel. The panel is charged with coordinating schedules of work by other concerned agencies, such as the Environmental Protection Agency and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and with reviewing and assisting in all work of the Office of Nuclear Waste in DOE.

I cannot overemphasize the importance of these functions. Mr. William Kimel, president of the American Nuclear Society, wrote to Senators STEVENSON and SCHMITT in February:

> Each agency is not fully aware either of the impact its individual schedule may have on programs of other agencies or of how such other programs affect its actions. There is no explicit setting of priorities within an agency's programs based upon the requirements of the overall Federal schedule, as opposed to an agency's assessment of its own needs and preferences.

DOE is far from being the source of all expertise on nuclear waste. The Interagency Review Group on nuclear waste has, I am told, reached some different conclusions and perspectives on waste. Though DOE should have final say and responsibility, DOE should be willing to sit down and work with all concerned Federal agencies. Indeed, I see the Nuclear Waste Review Panel as an institutionalized extension of the Interagency Review Group.

Congress must be in on waste planning. Congress alone can properly translate public and State concerns into national policy. Thus, the fourth key feature of my legislation is a congressional veto over nuclear waste plans submitted to the Congress by the Office of Nuclear Waste.

Congress will of course review waste planning through the budget process. I have purposely tied the provisions in the bill for congressional review of waste plans into the budgeting procedures through coincident timetables and submittals. I expect that if Congress chose to modify Office programs, it would do so through budget amendments and report language. However, some decisions, such as those on fee schedules, are outside the budget process. Congress must be able to get a handle on them. Finally, it is important that Congress be able to review waste planning of the Office of its entirety. The waste report provisions will assure this.

The fifth goal of my legislation is to assure full participation of States and of industry, environmental groups, academics, and other members of the general public. State and local officials and other groups have a far better knowledge of local needs and conditions than do planners in Washington. The bill mandates that both DOE and the interagency panel accept these outside groups as full partners in planning. There are provisions for advisory committees, for full disclosure of information, and for participation of technical representatives from State groups in all planning from the start—not just for review and comment of DOE plans after the big decisions have been made. As I noted above, the judicious way to proceed is to bring outsiders in on planning. Exclusion results in dissent.

The bill also provides financial cushions for States and other groups. The Office is authorized to reimburse States and localities for their planning expenses, to make payments in lieu of taxes when it constructs facilities, and to provide what impact mitigating assistance is available once the impact assistance legislation passes the Congress. Intervenor funding is authorized so that DOE will not be denied the input of outside groups for lack of money on their part.

The final goal of the legislation is to set financial arrangements that insure those who generate waste, pay for all costs associated with that waste. There is general agreement that the nuclear industry should shoulder its share of costs for waste management. The taxpayers have a major stake. DOE's Deutch report estimated total waste management costs between now and the year 2000 at $13 to $23 billion. In fiscal 1978 DOE is spending $392 million on waste management, $131 million of which is for commercial waste management. I am reluctant to suggest taxpayer subsidies of nuclear waste management. In addition, I fear that the costs might encourage congressional budget committees to put off major expenditures during the pull and tug of budgeting; after all, Members might reason, since waste does not present an imminent danger, why not postpone expenditures? Assurance of reimbursement for Federal costs for commercial waste will make half-billion dollar waste program budgets easier to swallow. Lastly, the costs are not such as to overwhelm the ability of private firms to pay by any means. The Interagency Subgroup on Spent Nuclear Fuel estimates that disposal of waste will cost 0.093 cents per kilowatt-hour of electricity from nuclear plants. This is no more than a 2-percent increment on the cost of electricity from nuclear plants. It will be invisible on consumers' monthly bills.

The bill creates a Nuclear Waste Management Fund, with separate accounts for each kind of nuclear waste. The Office of Nuclear Waste would set fee schedules for each type of waste, and deposit revenus in the fund. Fees would be designed to recover all costs associated with each kind of waste, including relevant research and development costs.

Several features assure the interest of the industry in equitable fees. The Office would by rulemaking allocate costs of R. & D. among each type of waste, and would properly amortize these plus capital costs over the life of waste repositories. Noncommercial waste, mostly waste from atom bomb programs and from DOE research facilities, is excluded from the trust fund. We do not want the Office to slosh money around between kinds of waste; for example, disposers of low-level waste should not be charged for disposal of the high-level waste in the tanks at Hanford, Wash. Fees would be certain at the time waste is transported to facilities of the Office; if costs for that waste were greater than anticipated, and Office would recover those costs from future users. It could not add additional charges at a later point to fees already paid. Lastly, the trust fund would be on-budget; Congress would continue to authorize and appropriate funds for programs of the Office.

Mr. President, let me note also that the bill does not neglect waste other than high-level waste, namely low-level waste and uranium mill tailings. DOE would be mandated to develop a policy for these wastes. It would reassess existing technologies and sites, such as the site at Sheffield in my State, and produce a plan for research and other work necessary to assure continued disposal sites for the Nation's hospitals, laboratories, and electric companies.

I do not wish to prejudge the question of whether Sheffield and other low-level sites are unacceptable. I am motivated by the report of the Interagency Review Group subgroup on low-level waste which concluded in their draft report, "Development of alternate disposal methods, which reflect an attempt to match the waste type to the disposal method, appears necessary."

Mr. President, I believe this legislation can provide a starting point for future congressional and Federal action on nuclear waste. I wish to complement rather than to substitute for the efforts now underway in the executive branch. I may note that I am pleased and gratified that the special issues subgroup of the interagency task force concluded in its draft report of June 30:

> The Task Group was aware of Federal legislative initiatives such as the Draft Bill by Senator Percy to establish a national decision-making process. There was no consensus within the group as to the potential effectiveness of legislation in the area of Federal-State relations. However, if it appears that such a procedure would help settle issues between various government levels, legislation of this type should be encouraged.

Mr. President, I am indebted to a number of individuals who have assisted in the preparation of this bill. The thinking of Senator MATHIAS of Maryland reflected in his bill on nuclear waste, and by Representative TOM CORCORAN of Illinois in his, were instrumental in focusing this bill. I am grateful to a raft of individuals who have met with me about the legislation, including representatives of Commonwealth Edison, Illinois Power, General Electric, and Nuclear Engineering of Illinois; the National Governors' Association; the Union of Concerned Scientists, and the Natural Resources Defense Council, among others. I thank those individuals with the Energy Department and the Interagency Review Group who have commented on the bill along with Attorney General Scott of Illinois, the Illinois Commission on Atomic Energy, and the Department of Public Health. I thank as a group those other individuals who aided me and my staff in this endeavor.

I end with an apt quote from an April 28, 1978 paper of the Natural Resources Defense Council:

> Waste disposal is a 500,000 year problem. The process of analyzing that problem should not be infected by a 5 year perspective.

Mr. President, I second that thought.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill, along with a section by section summary be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill and analysis were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3343

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I—OFFICE OF NUCLEAR WASTE FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF PURPOSE

SEC. 101. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) for more than thirty years, nuclear wastes generated in the national defense program have been accumulating;

(2) spent nuclear fuel and nuclear wastes from the commercial industry are increasing rapidly;

(3) nuclear waste has become a major issue of public concern;

(4) although nuclear waste management has to date not adversely affected public health and safety, stringent precautions must continue to be taken;

(5) there is considerable confidence in the feasibility of permanent repositories for nuclear waste disposal, although significant confirmatory research and development remains to be done;

(6) notwithstanding the Federal Government's assertion of responsibility for the disposition of nuclear wastes, it has yet to adopt a comprehensive nuclear waste management program;

(7) failure to provide for disposal of nuclear waste in a timely manner will inhibit the use of nuclear energy;

(8) there is a compelling need to establish a policy framework to coordinate nuclear waste management policy, decision-making and implementation among Federal agencies, provide for full participation by Congress and the States in developing that policy, and afford other interested persons meaningful policy rules; and

(9) the construction of a permanent repository for high level nuclear waste on an expeditious schedule is in the national interest.

(b) Therefore Congress declares that it is the purpose of this Act to—

(1) designate the Department of Energy as the head agency in the management of nuclear waste;

(2) centralize nuclear waste management responsibility in a new Office of Nuclear Waste within the Department of Energy;

(3) clarify and coordinate the policymaking roles of other concerned agencies through the establishment of a Nuclear Waste Review Panel;

(4) set specific procedures and deadlines to establish and implement a comprehensive nuclear waste policy;

(5) provide for an open policy process which includes specified mechanisms for Congressional, State, and public participation; and

(6) establish a Nuclear Waste Management Fund and other financial requirements to ensure that all costs associated with nuclear waste disposal are borne by the activity which produced such waste.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 102. For the purposes of this Act:

(1) "Office" means the Office of Nuclear Waste established by section 103 of this Act.

(2) "Director" means the Director of the Office.

(3) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Energy.

(4) "Department" means the Department of Energy.

(5) "Fund" means the Nuclear Waste Management Fund.

(6) "Panel" means the Nuclear Waste Review Panel.

(7) "Administrator" means the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency.

(8) "Governor" means the Governor of a State, or any other person or instrumentality designated according to the laws of the State as having responsibility for nuclear waste.

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE OFFICE OF NUCLEAR WASTE

SEC. 103. (a) There is established within the Department an Office of Nuclear Waste. The Office shall be headed by a Director appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Director shall report to the Under Secretary of Energy.

(b) All programs, property and staff of the Department pertaining to storage, transport, and disposal of nuclear waste are transferred to the Office.

(c) The Office shall be responsible for—

(1) all research, development, and demonstration activities pertaining to nuclear waste;

(2) assumption of title for the United States of existing nuclear waste facilities and abandoned uranium mill tailings not owned by the United States;

(3) design, construction, operation, and perpetual care of all high-level nuclear waste repositories and processing facilities in the United States, both temporary and permanent (not including storage of spent nuclear fuel at commercial reactor sites);

(4) administration of the Nuclear Waste Management Fund for commercial nuclear waste;

(5) establishment and collection of user fees designed to cover all costs incurred by the Fund;

(6) establishment of a Nuclear Waste Plan; and

(7) provision of interim storage facilities for spent nuclear fuel, should the Director determine such facilities are necessary.

NUCLEAR WASTE REVIEW PANEL

SEC. 104. (a) There is established a Nuclear Waste Review Panel as an independent instrumentality of the United States in the executive branch. The President shall appoint a Chairman from among the members of the Panel.

(b) The Director of the Office, the Chairman of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, the Chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality, the Director of the Geological Survey, and the Secretaries of Interior, Transportation, State, and Defense shall each appoint representatives to the Panel. The Chairman of the Panel may request other departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the United States or other persons to appoint representatives to the Panel.

(c) The Panel shall be responsible for the coordination of policymaking and actions of its members in regard to nuclear waste, including the coordination of input into the Nuclear Waste Plan of the Office by its members.

(d) The Panel shall—

(1) identify assistance which its members may provide to the Office in the formulation of nuclear waste management programs;

(2) coordinate schedules for nuclear waste related activities of such agencies, and make recommendations to resolve jurisdictional disputes and schedule conflicts relating to such activities among such members;

(3) no later than six months after the date of enactment of this Act, submit to the Congress a report which sets forth a coordinated schedule for—

(A) promulgation by the Environmental Protection Agency of environmental criteria and standards for nuclear waste management activities,

(B) promulgation by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission of procedural and substantive regulations for nuclear waste management activities,

(C) programmatic decisions on timing and scope of the research and development and repository programs of the Office, and

(D) issuance of generic and site specific environmental impact statements by the Office and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, in order to comply with the National Environmental Policy Act in a timely and expeditious manner;

(4) contribute to the preparation of, and review, all plans of the Office prior to the submittal of such plans to Congress; and

(5) report to Congress annually on its activities during the previous year.

(e) The Chairman of the Panel shall be responsible for facilitation of public and State participation pursuant to section 205 of this Act.

(f) The Director shall provide to the Panel all information available to the Office needed for the work of the Panel.

EFFECTIVE DATE

Sec. 105. The provisions of this title shall take effect 90 days after the date of enactment.

TITLE II—NUCLEAR WASTE PLANNING

NUCLEAR WASTE PLAN

Sec. 201. (a) Concurrent with the submittal of the budget of the Department for fiscal year 1980, but no later than January 30, 1979, the Office shall submit to the Congress a Nuclear Waste Plan. Such Plan shall include—

(1) a program (including schedules) for research, development, and demonstration needed to determine the appropriate method for disposal of high level nuclear wastes, spent nuclear fuel, and non-high level transuranic wastes. Such program shall specifically identify any technological uncertainties which it is necessary to resolve prior to siting and construction of processing facilities, pilot or experimental nuclear waste facilities, and commercial high level nuclear waste repositories;

(2) a program (including schedules) for siting, construction, and operation of pilot or experimental nuclear waste facilities;

(3) a program (including schedules) for construction and operation of a commercial scale permanent repository for high level nuclear waste, transuranic waste, and spent nuclear fuel (hereinafter referred to as "repository"). Such program shall identify a target date for operation of such repository. Such date shall be not later than January 1, 1993, unless the Director makes a finding pursuant to subsection (c) of this section;

(4) financial provisions for the implementation of the Fund authorized under section 301 of this Act, including estimates of any costs associated with assumption of title to facilities now owned by the Department, and criteria for determining fee schedules for the storage and disposal of nuclear waste pursuant to section 302 of this Act;

(5) cost estimates for the programs identified pursuant to paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of this subsection;

(6) an identification of all generic and site specific environmental impact statements to be issued by the Office in connection with the facilities described in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of this subsection, and the schedules for their issuance consistent with the report described in section 104(d)(3) of this Act; and

(7) a report on the need for interim storage facilities for spent nuclear fuel, and on progress in providing such facilities, if the Director determines such facilities are needed.

(b) The Director shall at all stages seek input into nuclear waste planning from, and shall consult closely with, the Nuclear Waste Review Panel established pursuant to section 104 of this Act.

(c) Subsequent to the submittal of a Nuclear Waste Plan, the Director may make a finding that technological uncertainties with respect to nuclear waste management do not permit the completion of a program (as identified pursuant to paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (a) of this section) according to the schedules provided by the Office. In the event of such a finding, the Director may revise such schedules, including the target date for operation of a repository (as identified pursuant to subsection (a)(3) of this section).

ANNUAL NUCLEAR WASTE REPORTS

Sec. 202. (a) Concurrent with the submittal of the budget of the Department for fiscal year 1981 and each succeeding fiscal year but no later than January 30, 1980, and each succeeding year), the Office shall submit to the Congress an Annual Nuclear Waste Report. Such report shall describe—

(1) the status of the programs of the Office;

(2) the schedules for such programs, including an explanation of any changes from the schedules set forth in the Plan or in the preceding annual report (pursuant to section 201(c) of this Act); and

(3) the status of the environmental impact statements described in section 201(a)(6).

(b) Upon selection of a site for a commercial scale repository for nuclear waste, the Office shall, in the following Annual Report, include—

(1) identification of the preferred site for such repository and a detailed explanation of the reasons for choosing such site;

(2) progress on the design of such repository, including any contracts let by the Director;

(3) identification of all licenses, permits, and other regulatory requirements of Federal, State, and local agencies required for such repository and for transport of nuclear waste, and plans of the Office to meet such requirements; and

(4) an estimate of the cost of such facility.

AMENDMENT AND VETO OF PLANS AND REPORTS

Sec. 203. (a) The Director may make amendments to any Nuclear Waste Plan or Annual Nuclear Waste Report within the first 90 days after such Plan or Report is submitted to Congress for approval.

(b) Any committee of the Congress to which a Plan or Report is referred shall have until May 15 of the year of submittal to report to its respective House a resolution disappproving any portion of such Plan or Report. If a resolution of disapproval is not passed by either House within 30 days after such date, such Plan or Report shall be considered approved in full.

(c) In the event a Plan or Report or portion thereof is disapproved, the Office shall revise and republish the Plan or Report within 60 days, and resubmit it to Congress. Congress shall have 90 days from the date of submittal to pass a resolution of disapproval.

LOW-LEVEL WASTE AND URANIUM TAILINGS

Sec. 204. (a) The Office shall prepare and submit to the Congress within one year after the date of enactment of this Act a plan that—

(1) defines the need for additional low-level waste sites (with designation of specific sites to be developed, if any), and any need for remedial action at existing low-level facilities;

(2) describes procedures to dispose of or stabilize uranium mill tailings at sites no longer used or licensed for uranium milling activities;

(3) estimates costs for the above; and

(4) provides for performance of additional research and development work, as needed.

(b) Such plans as are submitted to the Congress pursuant to subsection (a) shall not be subject to resolutions of disapproval pursuant to section 203.

PUBLIC AND STATE PARTICIPATION

Sec. 205. (a) The Director of the Office and the Chairman of the Panel shall, at all stages, seek input into nuclear waste planning from, and shall consult closely with, interested industry, environmental, State and local governmental, scientific, and other organizations and persons. The Director and the Chairman shall form an advisory committee or committees to facilitate such input.

(b) The Director and the Chairman shall provide interested persons with any information about the nuclear waste planning of the Office or the Panel as is requested. The Director and the Chairman shall actively seek to keep such persons fully informed at each stage of planning.

(c)(1) The Director and the Chairman may reimburse an interested person for expenses incurred while advising and consulting with the Director or the Chairman, provided that the Director or the Chairman determines such person has made a material contribution to the work of the Office (or of the Panel), and that such person could not otherwise provide effective input.

(2) The Director or the Chairman shall reimburse State and local governments for expenses incurred while advising and consulting with the Office or the Panel from funds appropriated for such purpose.

(d)(1) Upon selection of a potential study area for any permanent repository or a site for any waste facility, the Director shall notify in writing the Governor of the State in which such study areas or facility shall be located, and (at the discretion of the Director) the Governor of any concerned adjacent State, and shall furnish each Governor all relevant information concerning the program of the Office for such area or site.

(2) The Director shall work with any concerned Governor early and fully to analyze and shape economic benefits and problems associated with the siting of a nuclear waste facility, and shall seek to provide such impact mitigating assistance as may be available pursuant to law.

(e) The Office and the Panel shall hold hearings on all plans and reports in the District of Columbia, in any affected State, and elsewhere as determined by the Director or the Chairman in a period of 90 days after the submittal of such plans to Congress. Interested persons shall be provided the opportunity to comment in writing on such plans. The Office and the Panel shall publish and disseminate transcripts and summaries of such hearings.

(f) The Director shall seek information from, and participation by, appropriate agencies of the State in which a potential study area or site for any permanent repository is located, and (at the discretion of the Director) appropriate agencies of any concerned adjacent State. Technical representatives designated by the Governor of each such State shall participate in the technical analyses performed by the Office. The views of such representatives shall be included in reports prepared by the Office, together with an explanation by the Office of how those views were taken into account.

(g)(1) Any Governor designated pursuant to subsection (d) shall have the right to lodge a formal recommendation with the Director for modification of any aspect of such plans. Such recommendation shall specify the nature of and reasons for the Governor's position. It shall be lodged with the Director not later than the end of the public comment period provided under subsection (e) of this section.

(2) In the event of a formal recommendation to a plan by a Governor, the Office may not implement any aspect of such plan objected to by a Governor unless the Director accepts the Governor's position, or otherwise resolves such matter with the Governor, or unless the Secretary makes a finding that implementation of the plan is consistent with the public health and safety, will protect the environment, and will further the public interest with due consideration to regional, State, and local interests. In the event of such a finding, the Secretary shall notify the Governor in writing of the nature of and justification for such finding.

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY

Sec. 206. (a) In addition to other duties, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency shall be responsible for the establishment of standards and criteria for exposure to radiation from nuclear waste facilities.

(b) Concurrent with the submittal of plans of the Office and the Panel to Congress, the Administrator shall submit to the Congress a summary of the views of the Agency with respect to such plans, including any dissenting views.

(c) Within 180 days after the docketing of any license application of the Office of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Administrator shall submit to the Commission and to the Congress an assessment of the public health and safety aspects of such plans. Such assessment shall include, but not be limited to, the health effects of low-level radiation from nuclear waste facilities, and the possibilities of migration of radioactive material into the ecosystem.

EFFECT ON OTHER LAWS

Sec. 207. (a) Nothing in this Act shall affect the authority of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to license and regulate high level radioactive waste storage and disposal pursuant to section 202 of the Energy Reorganization Act of 1974 or of byproduct, source, or special nuclear material pursuant to section 201(f) of such Act.

(b) The Office may seek Commission licensing of a facility designated in any plan prior to the approval of such plan by Congress. In the event that a plan is amended, applications to the Commission shall be amended accordingly.

(c) Nothing in this Act shall exempt the Office from the requirements of the National Environmental Policy Act.

(d) Nothing in this Act shall affect the authority of States to inspect nuclear facilities as designated pursuant to State law or to section 274 of the Atomic Energy Act.

TITLE IIII—NUCLEAR WASTE MANAGEMENT FUND

ESTABLISHMENT AND POWERS

Sec. 301. (a) There is established in the Treasury of the United States a Nuclear Waste Management Fund. The Fund shall be administered by the Director to carry out the purposes, functions and powers authorized in this Act.

(b) The purpose of the Fund is—

(1) to provide capital and operating expenses which are necessary for nuclear waste research, development, management, transport, perpetual care and maintenance, planning, and such other financial needs of the Office as arise in the implementation of this Act;

(2) to provide for expenses of the Nuclear Waste Review Panel, for State and local participation in planning, compensation to affected States in lieu of taxes, and for participation expenses of other persons in the planning of the Office; and

(3) to amortize over the life of commercial nuclear waste facilities the costs of research and development and capital construction in a manner which ensures that facility users pay all such costs.

(c) In order to achieve the objectives and to carry out the purposes of this Act the Director (acting for the Secretary) may—

(1) make and enforce such rules and regulations and make and perform such contracts, agreements, and commitments as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act;

(2) prescribe and impose fees and charges for services rendered by the Office pursuant to this Act;

(3) settle, adjust, or waive, in whole or in part, in advance or otherwise, any claim or right of, by or against the Director or the Fund;

(4) sue or be sued, complain and defend in any court;

(5) acquire, own, deal with and dispose of any property; and

(6) determine, in accordance with authorizations, the amount to be withdrawn from the Fund and the manner in which such withdrawal shall be effected.

(d) There shall be deposited in the Fund—

(1) income and gains realized by the Fund from any investment of excess funds of the Fund;

(2) income from fees and charges established pursuant to this Act for the use of nuclear waste facilities operated by or for the Office; and

(3) advances or loans from the Treasury of the United States secured by assets of the Fund.

(e) If the Director determines that the amount of money in the Fund exceeds the amount required for current needs, he or she may invest such amounts as is deemed advisable in obligations of or obligations guaranteed by the Government of the United States, or in other governmental agency obligations or other securities of the United States.

(f) The Director may deposit moneys of the Fund with any Federal Reserve Bank, any depository for public funds or in such other places and in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury deems appropriate.

(g) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, subject to Congressional authorization, to advance funds or make loans to the Fund for the purpose of subsection (b) of this section, provided that such advance or loan is secured by assets of the Fund and does not exceed 25 percent of the assets of the Fund. Such sums shall be used to cover expenses in current fiscal years which the Director determines shall not be charged solely to current users of an office facility or facilities.

(h) Costs associated with nuclear waste from military programs and any waste other than that from commercial programs shall not be paid for by the Fund.

(i) The Director shall establish within the fund accounts for high level nuclear waste, low level nuclear waste, spent nuclear fuel, transuranic waste, and abandoned uranium mill tailings. Costs and revenues for each type of waste shall be allotted in accordance with section 302(h) of this Act.

(j) Notwithstanding section 170 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, the Fund shall be liable for any damages incurred as a result of the activities of the Office.

FEE SCHEDULES

Sec. 302. (a) The Office shall be responsible for adopting criteria for setting fees, establishing fee schedules for each type of commercial nuclear waste identified under section 102 of this Act, and collecting fees from all users of its facilities. Such fee schedules shall cover all costs incurred by the Fund.

(b) Prior to the adoption of any criteria or fee schedules, the Office shall publish proposed criteria for comment, and shall consider any comments prior to adoption of such criteria or fee schedules.

(c) Fees shall be based on—

(1) reasonably expected costs for waste disposal, including contingency and escalation charges; and

(2) an assessment for the costs of research, development, demonstration, and planning (as determined pursuant to subsection (h)).

(d) Fees shall be reviewed no less than annually, and readjusted from time to time at the discretion of the Director.

(e)(1) If the Government of the United States determines that spent nuclear fuel may be reprocessed or nuclear waste may be otherwise used commercially, the Office shall revise its fee schedules to include provisions to compensate facility users whose waste has not been placed in permanent storage in the event the Office itself reprocesses spent fuel or otherwise makes use of or sells nuclear waste and makes a net profit.

(2) Fees may not include a credit for plutonium or other substances in waste except as provided in paragraph (1) of this subsection.

(f)(1) The Office may not impose any additional fee upon a facility user once it takes title to waste.

(2) If the Office determines that ultimate disposal costs will be more than predicted, it shall recover such costs from current and future users.

(g) In the event that operation of a high level repository or other facility is carried out by a person other than the Office, and that such operator has leased such facility for such purpose, the fee shall include a charge to be determined by the Office to cover perpetual care and maintenance and research and development, such charge to be paid into the Fund.

(h)(1) The Director shall determine by rule the allocations of research, development, demonstration, and administrative costs of the Office for each type of commercial nuclear waste. Only such costs as are directly related to each type of waste may be allocated to such waste.

(2) When the Director determines that research, development, demonstration, construction, and administrative costs incurred in a particular fiscal year shall not be charged solely to current users of an Office facility or facilities, the Director shall by rule determine the allocation of such costs among current and future users.

BUDGETING AND AUTHORIZATION

Sec. 303. The Congress shall continue to authorize and appropriate all budgets of the Office of Nuclear Waste. The Office shall compensate the Treasury of the United States out of the Management Fund for the cost of all research, development, and other work performed by the Office and appropriated by Congress for commercial nuclear waste.

ACQUISITION OF FACILITIES AND MATERIALS

Sec. 304. (a) The Office is directed to assume title to any existing waste facility, subject to existing leasehold and contractual interests (including abandoned uranium mills) not presently under United States ownership within 12 months after the date of enactment of this Act. The Office shall provide just compensation to States who own such facilities. Changes in title pursuant to this section shall not affect the licensing or regulation of activities at such facilities.

(b) The Office shall take title to the nuclear waste transmitted by the user concurrently with the physical transfer of such material.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

Sec. 305. There is authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1979 such sums as may be necessary for the initial implementation of the Management Fund and for such other purposes as the Director may determine, such sums to be repaid the Treasury in accordance with section 301.

SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY

TITLE I—OFFICE OF NUCLEAR WASTE

101 Findings and Purposes.

102 Definitions.

103 Establishment of the Office of Nuclear Wastes. Establishes the Office as a DOE program office at the Assistant Secretary level. The Director is to be confirmed by the Senate. Gives to the Office the lead policy role, and the responsibility for construction of waste repositories.

104 Nuclear Waste Review Panel. Establishes a Panel of those Federal agencies involved in waste policy. Gives the Panel authority to coordinate and expedite the schedules of these agencies, to participate in the policymaking of the Office, and to report to Congress.

105 Effective Date.

TITLE II—NUCLEAR WASTE PLANNING

201 Nuclear Waste Plan. Requires the Office to submit a comprehensive plan for high-level waste by January 30, 1979. The plan is to include schedules for research work, and for construction of experimental and commercial waste facilities. The schedules are to provide for a commercial high-level waste facility no later than January 1, 1993 (this may be modified if technological uncertainties force schedule revisions). The report will also contain cost estimates, and recommendations on interim storage of nuclear fuel.

202 Annual Nuclear Waste Reports. Requires annual updates of the Section 201 plan, including details of construction plans when the Office is ready to construct a high-level repository.

203 Amendment and Veto of Plans. Section 201 and 202 plans are to be submitted to Congress and considered along with the annual budget of the Office. The Office may amend a plan once submitted. Congress may veto any portion of a plan.

204 Low-Level Waste and Uranium Tailings. Requires a report on action needed on low-level nuclear waste, and on uranium mill tailings at abandoned mills. The Office may implement this report without separate Congressional review.

205 Public and State Participation. Requires that both the Office and the interagency Panel consult and work closely with state officials, industry, environmentalists, and others. Provides reimbursement for state and local planning expenses, and authorizes intervenor funding. Provides for hearings on plans, and allows for objections from governors of affected states.

206 Environmental Protection Agency. Puts into law EPA's existing authority to set standards and criteria on waste storage, and provides for independent EPA review of plans.

207 Effect on Other Laws. Reaffirms the authority of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to license waste facilities, and obligates the Office to follow the National Environmental Policy Act.

TITLE III—NUCLEAR WASTE MANAGEMENT FUND

301 Establishment and Powers. Establishes the Fund to pay for all costs associated with disposal, and to collect user fees to cover such costs. Excludes military waste from the Fund. Establishes separate accounts in the fund for each type of nuclear waste.

302 Fee Schedules. Sets procedures for establishment of fee schedules of each kind of waste. The Office is to allocate research costs among the types of waste and over the life of its facilities by a rulemaking. Customers are guaranteed fee certainty at the time they drop off waste.

303 Budgeting and Authorization. Provides that Congress shall continue to authorize and appropriate budgets of the Office as a part of the Department of Energy budget.

304 Acquisition of Facilities and Material. The Office is to acquire existing waste facilities within 12 months of enactment.

305 Authorization of Appropriations.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 3343, a bill introduced by Senator PERCY, relating to nuclear waste management, be referred jointly to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, the Committee on Environment and Public Works, and the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

SENATE RESOLUTION 515

At the request of Mr. HUDDLESTON, the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 515, relating to the transportation crisis for farmers and shippers of agricultural commodities.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 149

At the request of Mr. MELCHER, the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL) and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 149, to direct the Civil Aeronautics Board to disapprove any renewal and terminate any effect of the Airlines Mutual Aid Pact and to provide for a study and report on alleviating airline strikes.

SENATE RESOLUTION 526—SUBMISSION OF A RESOLUTION TO OBSERVE THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE SOVIET INVASION OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Mr. DOLE submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 526

Whereas in 1968 Czechoslovakia was a peace-loving country whose government, headed by Alexander Dubcek, enjoyed positive support from the vast majority of Czechs and Slovaks; and

Whereas the invasion of Czechoslovakia by the military forces of the Soviet Union in 1968 contravened the independence of a sovereign state and denied its peoples the right of self-determination; and

Whereas such an unprovoked intervention was in violation of the United Nations Charter which stipulates that "All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial sovereignty or political independence of any state"; and

Whereas the occupation of Czechoslovakia by a fellow member of the United Nations has continued for ten years and alters the European balance of power; and while opponents of such occupation and defenders of human rights are increasingly subjected to harassment, repression, persecution and incarceration; and

Whereas their continued yearning for freedom has found a new expression in Charter 77, the Human Rights Manifesto which requests of the government of Czechoslovakia the implementation of the principles of the Final Act as well as adherence to the Czechoslovak Constitution; and

Whereas the signers of Charter 77 and other champions of human rights in Czechoslovakia continue to oppose and to expose violations of human rights by the Soviet-imposed government of Czechoslovakia: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that: the President should use his influence and leverage to induce the Soviet Union to withdraw all troops occupying Czechoslovakia and, should such withdrawal not be effected by December, 1978, to—

(1) re-evaluate sales of U.S. commodities and technologies to the U.S.S.R.

(2) reevaluate all licenses for the export to Warsaw Pact countries who participated in the invasion of all paramilitary and other high technology products, including computers and any other products used in the expansion of industrial development and communications systems;

(3) express support for the people of Czechoslovakia (as they commemorate August 21, 1968, as the "Soviet Day of Shame") in their efforts to achieve the withdrawal of the troops of the Soviet Union from Czechoslovakia;

SEC. 2. It is further the sense of the Congress that the President, acting through the United Nations and other international organizations, should take such additional steps as may be necessary to end as quickly as possible the continuing intervention in Czechoslovakia by the Soviet Union.

ATTENTION FOCUSED ON HUMAN RIGHTS

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, in the last few weeks we have seen a great deal of attention focused on human rights and their violation in Eastern Europe. I would like to remind everyone now, that this pattern of human rights violations did not begin with the Helsinki agreement and does not affect the Helsinki monitors alone. One of the most unfortunate examples of what the lack of human rights can do to a country can be found in Czechoslovakia.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA—CREATIVITY STIFLED

Czechoslovakia is one of the most creative nations in the world. She has given us the beautiful music and literature of Franz Liszt, Bedrich Smetana, and Karl Capek. Today this beautiful country is stifled in spirit, with its most creative voices stilled. Only 10 years ago, on August 21, 1968, Soviet tanks and troops marched into Prague, and occupied the capital of this country which was in the process of a spiritual and cultural revival.

HISTORY OF INVASION

Czechoslovakia is no stranger to invasion. In 1936, the world stood by and traded Czechoslovakian freedom for "peace in our time." That peace, of course, soon evolved into the worst war in history. After World War II, a war we fought to guarantee freedom for the people of Czechoslovakia and others, the Soviet Union disposed of the Czechoslovak Government under the leadership of Edward Benes and installed a puppet government of its own. Once again freedom was the loser.

PRAGUE SPRING

It took the people of Czechoslovakia a full generation, but the spirit of these great people came through and again in the late sixties their creative powers were able to flourish during the glorious days of Prague spring. The people of Czechoslovakia were able to enjoy their heritage and add to it freely, to their own delight and with the approval of the free world. This example of "communism with a human face" seemed to offer an alternative to the dull, colorless, often grim life of most citizens who live under communism.

SOVIET INVASION

Unfortunately, communism's true face came through in the form of army divisions that overwhelmed this small country struggling to be free. The world was profoundly shocked, while the Soviets maintained an icy silence about the whole affair, answering charges of imperialism with stock phrases about socialist internationalism.

CHARTER 77

These tragic events happened 10 years ago. The Soviets are entrenched and the people of Czechoslovakia remain enslaved. Their spirit, though stifled, remains alive, however. Scores of brave Czechoslovak citizens risked their careers and comfort to sign the Charter 77 human rights manifesto, expressing their support for the Helsinki agreement, an agreement signed by their own Government and by their masters, the Soviet Union. More names continue to be added despite the repressive measures of the Prague Government to stifle any independent expression.

PAY TRIBUTE TO CZECHOSLOVAKIA

I would like to join my colleague in the House, Congressman DERWINSKI, in paying tribute to the citizens of Czechoslovakia who work so courageously for the realization of the Helsinki agreement within their borders. Just as important is that we remind ourselves of the true nature of the U.S.S.R. and of the commitment we must make to freedom in the world. For if we are to deal realistically with the Soviet Union we must not forget what kind of regime we are dealing with. We must remind ourselves that the U.S.S.R. is led by people who order invasions of small countries whose people want to be free.

CONCRETE ACTION

We must do more, however, than remember and pay tribute to those who have given so much for freedom. This resolution that is being introduced concurrently in the House and in the Senate directs the President to take concrete steps to raise at appropriate forums the issue of Soviet occupation of Czechoslovakia and would lead to the termination of aid and contacts which would help the oppressors of the Czechoslovak people. Now is the time for the United States to remain firm in its commitment to the principles of individual freedom and national self-determination.●

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1978—S. 2090

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. JOHNSTON (for himself and Mr. NELSON) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to S. 2090, a bill to extend for 3 additional years the authorization of titles I, II, III, V, VI, VII, VIII, and IX of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, and for other purposes.

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, today, I am submitting an amendment to the Economic Opportunity Act Amendments of 1978. The purpose of my amendment is to remove an artificial population barrier now imposed on rural counties by the Community Services Administration. My amendment simply directs the Community Services Administration to disregard population as the sole criteria in designating community action agencies in a county or multicounty unit whenever at least 20 percent of the families and unrelated individuals residing in these areas are poverty stricken. Many impoverished counties do not have the opportunity to obtain the services of a community action agency because of this artificial population barrier.

Let me emphasize several aspects of my amendment. First, it does not prevent the Community Services Administration from utilizing criteria other than population in refusing to recognize or fund a community action agency in impoverished areas. Current law establishes a number of other criteria that must be assessed before a community action agency is either recognized or funded. For example, current law clearly requires that a community action agency have the capability of planning, conducting, administering and evaluating a community action program.

Without such a capacity, a community action agency cannot be recognized. Section 221(e) of the act requires the director of the Community Services Administration to "consider the probable capacity of the agency to carry out an effective program before providing financial assistance." Section 221(d) requires that, as an additional condition of financial assistance, each community action agency must have adopted a systematic approach to provide for basic education, health care, vocational training, and employment opportunities to enable the poor living in rural areas to remain in such areas and become self-sufficient therein. Section 244(7) prohibits the director of the Community Services Administration from expanding financial assistance in any case where the costs of developing and administering programs exceed 15 percent of the total costs, including non-Federal contributions to such costs, of such programs.

Second, my amendment will not result in a proliferation of demands upon the Community Services Administration to recognize new community action agencies. My amendment only addresses the "minimum test" for a community to be served by a community action agency. Currently, a community action agency cannot be recognized in a county or multicounty unit if there are less than 50,000 in the area. This artificial barrier does not give impoverished rural communities even a chance to prove that a cost-effective community action program can be administered. In light of the other criteria that must be reviewed prior to recognizing or funding a community action agency, this arbitrary population limitation is unfair and unjustified. My amendment states that population cannot be used as the sole criteria to deny recognition of a community action agency whenever at least 20 percent of the families and unrelated individuals residing therein have incomes below the poverty line as defined by the Bureau of Census.

Third, my amendment will not split existing county or multicounty community action agencies. My amendment has been drafted so as to lock in those counties currently serviced by an existing community action agency. No new community action agency can be designated in an area of less than 50,000 unless the new community action agency is merely replacing a previously existing one or the area was not previously serviced by a community action agency.

Mr. President, there are those who would argue that a community with less than 50,000 persons of which at least 20 percent are poor lacks local resources and skills which would be utilized for purposes of a community action program. This certainly cannot be true in all such communities. I know of at least two instances in my State where the Governor recognized a community action agency in a rural area only to have the Community Services Administration reject the designation because of the artificial population limitation. In any event, Mr. President, such broad generalizations and stereotypes of rural communities are inappropriate for a Federal agency either to articulate or to base policy.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I believe my amendment is sound and sensitive. It is sound because it provides opportunity not waste or proliferation. It is sensitive because it focuses on the key problem which community action agencies are created to alleviate—poverty. My amendment is well within the policy of the Community Services Act, especially title II which declares self-sufficiency as a goal for the rural poor and views with disfavor the continued migration of the rural poor to urban areas.●

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM ACT OF 1978—S. 2640

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. MATHIAS submitted 14 amendments intended to be proposed by him to S. 2640, a bill to reform the civil service laws.

REHABILITATION, COMPREHENSIVE SERVICES AND DEVELOPMENTAL DISABILITIES ACT OF 1978—S. 2600

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. BUMPERS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to S. 2600, a bill to amend the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 to extend certain programs established in such act, to establish a comprehensive services program for the severely handicapped, and for other purposes.

● Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am today introducing an amendment which strikes section 105(b) from S. 2600.

Mr. President, in 1973 the Congress undertook a major revision of the Federal vocational rehabilitation program. The changes enacted at that time have dramatically improved the delivery of services to the handicapped, but by no means have they adequately addressed every problem. Now the time has come for us to assess the achievements of the 1973 act and make revisions where warranted.

The Senate Human Resources Subcommittee on the Handicapped has done a superb job on S. 2600, the Rehabilitation, Comprehensive Services and Developmental Disabilities Act of 1978. I am particularly appreciative of the efforts of my distinguished colleague, Senator RANDOLPH, for the instrumental role he has played in drafting this legislation.

Nevertheless, I am quite concerned about one provision of S. 2600—section 105(b)—which institutes a major revision in the formula by which funds for the State basic grants program are distributed.

Under current law, funds for the State basic grants program are allotted according to the "Hill-Burton formula," which takes two factors into consideration—population and per capita income. Section 105(b) would eliminate the consideration of per capita income for funds appropriated in excess of the fiscal year 1978 level. This means that by 1983, more than 30 percent of the authorized funds would be distributed based solely on population. Such a redirection of the Federal effort will needlessly compromise the advancements achieved in previous years and spell disaster for a majority of the States in the future.

Since 1954, when the Hill-Burton hospital-assistance formula was devised, the Congress has been committed to the elimination of income disparities which inhibit equal access to medical services. By considering per capia income as a factor in determining each State's allotment of a program's funds, the Federal Government has eased the fiscal strain placed on the poorer States in their efforts to serve the disadvantaged. More importantly, the Hill-Burton philosophy has been a blessing to the many thousands of citizens who, by way of vocational rehabilitation programs, have overcome their handicaps and secured employment.

As a former Governor from one of the economically disadvantaged States, I can attest to the invaluable role which this "special consideration" plays. In countless instances, inclusion of the per capita income factor has been the crucial difference between success and failure of my State's programs. A case in point is Arkansas' vocational rehabilitation program.

Arkansas' share of the State basic grants funds is admittedly modest—1.38 percent of the total in fiscal year 1978—but for a State which can boast of outranking only two States in per capita income, the $10.5 million we received this year is a substantial sum. I suppose it is a little difficult for those from the more populous and wealthy States to grasp the significance of our plight. Indeed, the $61.6 million allotment California will receive next year if section 105(b) is adopted easily dwarfs the $4 million Arkansas stands to lose. Translated into the number of Arkansans deprived of treatment, however, the figures tell a sadder and more dramatic tale.

Last year more than 25,000 handicapped Arkansans were enrolled in the State's vocational rehabilitation program. Of this number, nearly 5,000 were successfully rehabilitated and employed. I am proud of this performance record. In part, it was due to the fact that Arkansas exceeded the minimum matching requirement by 75 percent. But even at a combined State and Federal funding level of $16.2 million, 75,000 handicapped Arkansans had to be turned away.

Retention of the present language in S. 2600 will result in the exclusion of an additional 3,100 handicapped Arkansans each year. I cannot believe that this is the committee's intention. Furthermore, I cannot believe that the committee, in all its wisdom, intends to replicate this injustice in 25 other States. The committee speaks of its concern for equity, yet it addresses this concern by robbing Peter to pay Paul. Such tactics do not comport with any notions of equity with which I am acquainted.

In all fairness, the committee raises an interesting point in advocating a change from the existing formula. Subscribing to the central thesis advanced in a 1974 report prepared for HEW by JWK International Corp., it states that:

> The best measure of an allocation's equity is the extent to which the allocation matches the relative size of the population of citizens to be rehabilitated.

It is important to note that the JWK report does not recommend adopting a formula based solely upon population. Instead, it advocates a formula based upon the population of handicapped persons to be rehabilitated. Apparently this fundamental distinction has eluded the committee, for section 105(b) makes no mention of the population of handicapped persons. Rather, a State's overall population is the criterion utilized.

Thus, the committee appeals to the findings of the JWK study in attacking the Hill-Burton formula for its alleged inequities, yet ironically, it disregards those very same findings in proposing its "solution" to the problem. Although there is less than universal agreement over the credibility of JWK's observations, I do believe that if we are to accept them, then apparently the committee's revision is no more equitable than existing law. In fact, I submit that section 105(b) reflects a grossly parochial outlook which goes against the grain of our Federal assistance philosophy.

Assuming that JWK's thesis is correct—that the formula should be designed so as to take into account the population of handicapped persons served by the vocational rehabilitation program—any revision should reward those areas having the highest per capita population of handicapped persons. It is instructive to note that according to the Social Security Administration's Office of Research and Statistics, proportionately more disabled persons live in the South than any other region. At the same time, the lowest rates of disability are experienced in the Northeast region. If we were to accept the JWK thesis and reward those States laboring under the highest rates of handicapped population, logic would dictate that any revision of the formula must favor the southern region. The fact of the matter is, however, that under the committee proposal, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas all stand to lose. Meanwhile, many of the low-disability-rate States will enjoy a windfall.

Thus, in evaluating the committee's appeal to the JWK study in making a case for a formula based upon population only, it is apparent that JWK's findings have been pressed into service for a cause they contradict. In short, the committee's formula change exacerbates rather than ameliorates the problems discussed in the JWK report. Furthermore, by reducing the impact of the per capita income factor, the committee's amendment will stifle the growth of programs in the most underprivileged States. Seen in this light, the committee's amendment represents a retrogression in the Federal effort to aid the handicapped. For this reason, I hope the Senate will reject the committee proposal and reinstate the original formula. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAIR FUND TRANSFER ACT—S. 3156

AMENDMENT NO. 3303

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. TOWER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to S. 3156, a bill to amend the Consumer Credit Protection Act to provide consumer rights and remedies in electronic fund transfer systems.

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I am introducing an amendment to section 910 of S. 3156, the Fair Fund Transfer Act, to allow for limitations on withdrawals under securities systems.

Section 910 of the bill generally makes a financial institution liable to its customer for all damages proximately caused by its failure to make an electronic fund transfer as instructed by the customer. Although there are a number of exceptions to this and there is a provision that the transfer must be in accordance with the terms and conditions of an account which could provide for security limitations, it is not sufficiently clear that a debit card issuer would be able to protect itself and the cardholder by installing security system limitations. This provision makes clear that such limitations may be placed on electronic fund transfer accounts.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 3303

On page 20, strike out lines 3 and 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(E) such transfer would exceed limits established for security purposes; ●

AMENDMENT NO. 3304

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. TOWER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to S. 3156, supra.

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I am introducing an amendment to section 907 of S. 3156, the Fair Fund Transfer Act, to provide a workable mechanism to stop payment on preauthorized transfers.

Section 907 of S. 3156 is both unclear and unworkable. For example, there is a question whether a stop payment order under the procedure would be received by the financial institution in such time and in such manner as to afford the institution a reasonable opportuntiy to act on it.

Section 907(a) states that a consumer may stop payment on a preauthorized electronic transfer by "notifying" the financial institution at least 3 business days prior to the scheduled transfer date. The word "notifying" is subject to the interpretation of including the date on which a request for stop payment is placed in the U.S. mail. Thus, if a court adopts such interpretation there is a potential for violation or the delay in the mails may cause the notification to actually be received after the scheduled date of transfer.

The drafters of the Uniform Commercial Code faced a similar problem in framing section 4303 of the Code relating to stop-orders on the receipt of checks. They did not feel that the problem would be solved by the mere insertion of the word "received" in the Code because a reasonable amount of time is necessary after receipt of the notice to communicate to the bookkeeping department the action to be taken. What was done in section 4–303(1) of the Uniform Commercial Code is the inclusion of an effective time which encompasses the notion of receipt plus a reasonable time for the financial institution to act on any such stop payment communication.

The amendment is compatible with the Uniform Commercial Code by providing that a consumer may stop payment on a preauthorized electronic fund transfer provided "the notice or stop-order is received within a reasonable time for the financial institution to act thereon."

Equally unworkable is section 907(b) which requires a financial institution to give notice of a varying amount in a preauthorized transfer prior to the transfer. Since in most cases the institution would have no way of knowing in advance what the varying amount would be until it receives the notification from the creditor, after receipt of the notification it would have to delay payment until it had given its customer the required notice and a reasonable length of time to stop payment. This was pointed out to the Senate Banking Committee in the statement of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation of April 25 that:

First, the FDIC believes that Section 907 (b) should be modified to require the designated payee to notify the consumer of the amount of a preauthorized transfer of funds when the amount varies between billing periods. It should not be the responsibility of the financial institution to do so. We agree that such notice must be made far enough in advance to permit the consumer to initiate a stop payment action if the amount is incorrect.

The statement cures this problem by requiring that where preauthorized transfers in varying amounts are authorized the payee or creditor agree to provide the consumer with reasonable notice of the varying amounts before the account is debited.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 3304

Beginning with page 12, line 22, strike out all through page 13, line 15, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"A preauthorized electronic fund transfer from a consumer's account may be authorized by the consumer only in writing, a copy of which must be provided to the consumer. Preauthorized transfers in varying amounts may not be authorized unless the payee agrees to provide the consumer with reasonable notice of the varying amounts before the account is debited. A consumer may stop payment on a preauthorized electronic fund transfer if the notice or stop-order in writing is received by the financial institution within a reasonable time for the financial institution to act thereon."●

AMENDMENT NO. 3305

Mr. TOWER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to S. 3156, supra.

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I am introducing an amendment to section 921 of S. 3156, the Fair Fund Transfer Act, to provide that the entire title shall take effect 18 months after the date of enactment.

The bill as written provides that the title shall take effect upon expiration of 18 months from the date of enactment except that section 909 concerning consumer liability for unauthorized transfers and section 911 restricting the issuance of debit cards, shall take effect upon the expiration of 90 days after the date of enactment.

The committee's action in providing for an earlier effective date for consumer liability and the issuance of EFT cards is predicated upon its notion that prompt enactment of these sections is extremely important. It, however, ignores the fact that these sections cannot be separated from the compliance problems attaching to the other provisions of the bill. The committee bill elsewhere gives the Federal Reserve Board authority to write regulations to implement and clarify all of the provisions of the bill. Under the pattern of the legislation until the Federal Reserve has issued these regulations financial institutions will not know with certainty what to do. It is unreasonable to expect the Federal Reserve to issue those regulations prior to the expiration of the 90-day period.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 3305

On page 33, strike out all after "enactment" on line 16, throught "enactment" on line 18.●

AMENDMENT NO. 3306

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. TOWER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to S. 3156, supra.

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I am today introducing an amendment to narrow and clarify coverage of S. 3156, the Fair Fund Transfer Act.

One of the most serious deficiencies in S. 3156 is that its overly broad coverage could eventually extend its highly complicated disclosure, error resolution, and liability provisions to practically every financial institution—large or small—in the country. This all-embracing coverage is triggered by the definition in section 903(6) of electronic fund transfer as transactions "initiated through—telephonic instrument, or computer or magnetic tape * * *." A literal application of this language would mean that any transaction flowing through an automatic clearinghouse would be covered. An automatic clearinghouse is a facility which utilizes magnetic tapes and computers to clear debit and credit entries for participating financial institutions. Thus any funds cleared through these computerized systems could be construed to be covered by S. 3156. The fact that most small institutions do not have computers interfacing with the system but receive paper entries, would not insulate them from coverage because the transfers have been "initiated through—a computer."

The magnitude of this potential coverage is overwhelming. The automated clearinghouse electronic payments delivery system includes 32 regional ACH sites which will be connected by the end of 1978 to form a nationwide network for the exchange of paperless entries.

Services offered through the ACH mechanism are marketed and serviced by banks, savings and loans, and credit unions of all sizes in virtually all areas of the country. Principal services at this time include automatic deposit of social security and other Federal governmental retirement payments; automatic deposit of private section payrolls; automatic drafting of recurring debits such as mortgage and insurance premium and utility payments.

This coverage could be devastating to small banks, credit unions and savings and loans which have never considered going into the debit card business and never felt they would have imposed upon them the burdens of this legislation. Although no precise figures are available, because social security payments are delivered to individuals in all regions of the Nation, it may be assumed that even the smallest financial institutions participate in the automatic clearinghouse activity, at least through this program.

Furthermore, the level of automated clearinghouse participation has been projected for dramatic growth among financial institutions of all sizes in study after study. This expectation is based in the simple fact that the purpose for which the automated clearinghouse exists is to provide the capability to deliver payments to all regions of the Nation. One may see, for example, that numerous national corporations, whose employees reside in communities of all sizes, the majority of which are serviced by smaller banks and financial institutions, will have the capability to effect significant cost savings by delivery of credits and debits electronically.

The bill would also cover all telephone transfers; preauthorized bill paying services, and preauthorized transfer from a savings account to cover checking account overdrafts. Also, because of the ambiguous language in section 903(2) of the definition of the term "account," there is a question as to whether credit as well as debit transactions would be covered.

The significance of this overly broad coverage is that it could transform the ordinary checking, savings and share account into an electronic fund account subject to Federal regulation. Where an account receives or might receive incidental transfers covered by the bill, to avoid exposure to calamitous lawsuits under the punitive damages section of the bill, prudent management would probably require that the account be brought into conformance with the disclosure and error resolution provisions of the legislation.

The National Commission on Electronic Fund Transfers did recognize that existing law in the consumer protection area is incomplete or not applicable to some aspects of the new financial service concepts. The purpose of this amendment is to narrow coverage of the bill to an identifiable area where it has been demonstrated that the customers of the financial institutions will actually benefit from a new legal framework. This is done in the amendment by confining the perimeters of the bill to deposits, withdrawals or transfers to or from an account made through a point-of-sale or customer terminal, automated teller machine and cash dispensing machine transactions. In essence, this would be the new debt card service now being marketed by some financial institutions.

This is both a logical and orderly approach to the development of the law in the area. If other amendments we plan to offer are adopted, the bill would extend to debt card holders the same sort of protection now afforded credit card holders. Financial institutions, particularly the smaller ones, would be in a position to avoid the burdens of the regulation by not offering debit cards to their customers. The States would be permitted to continue basic regulation of the payment system by amending the Uniform Commercial Code to regulate electronic funds transfer transactions not presently explicitly covered under the code or the bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 3306

Beginning with page 3, line 17, strike out all through page 4, line 19, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(6) the term 'electronic fund transfer' means a deposit, withdrawal, or transfer to or from an account, other than a transaction originated by check, or bank or share draft, through a network comprised of one or more terminals or automated teller machines, together with any related customer access instruments or devices, communication lines, switches for routing messages, and the messages transmitted through such network. Such term includes, but is not liimted to, any point-of-sale or customer terminal, automated teller machine, and cash dispensing machine transactions. Such term does not include—

"(A) any check guarantee or authorization service which does not directly result in a debit or credit to a consumer's account;

"(B) any transfer of funds, other than those processed by automated clearinghouse, made by a financial institution on behalf of a consumer by means of a service that transfers funds held at either Federal Reserve banks or other depository institutions and which is not designed primarily to transfer funds on behalf of a consumer;

"(C) any transaction the primary purpose of which is the purchase or sale of securities or commodities through a broker-dealer registered with or regulated by the Securities and Exchange Commission;

"(D) any trust account or an occasional or incidental credit balance transfer;

"(E) any transfer from a savings account to a demand deposit account, pursuant to the prearranged agreement between a consumer and the financial institution maintaining his savings and checking accounts, for the purpose of covering an overdraft or maintaining an agreed-upon minimum balance in the demand deposit account;

"(F) any preauthorized transaction received by a financial institution in non-electronic form;

"(G) any direct deposit of a payroll, pension, annuity, benefit, or dividend;

"(H) any voice initiated telephone transfer; or

"(I) any transaction covered by chapter 4 of the Truth in Lending Act;"●

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

● Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to give notice that a public hearing has been scheduled for Tuesday, August 8, 1978, at 9:30 a.m., in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building, on the following nomination:

James Dickson Phillips, Jr., of North Carolina, to be U.S. circuit judge for the fourth circuit vice James Braxton Craven, Jr., deceased.

Any persons desiring to offer testimony in regard to this nomination shall, not later than 24 hours prior to such hearing, file in writing with the committee a request to be heard and a statement of their proposed testimony.

This hearing will be before the full Judiciary Committee.●

SUBCOMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH AND GENERAL LEGISLATION

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Subcommittee on Agricultural Research and General Legislation of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry will conduct a hearing on S. 2343, Thursday, July 27, at 10 a.m. in 324 Russell. The bill would require USDA to submit quarterly reports to Congress confirming that meat imported into this country has been inspected and approved by USDA personnel. Senator JOHN MELCHER sponsored the bill, and he will preside at the hearing.

Anyone wishing to testify should contact Denise Love, hearing clerk of the committee at 224–2035.●

S. 3227, THE "THERAPEUTIC COMMUNITIES ACT OF 1978"

● Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Subcommittee on Penitentiaries and Corrections of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary will hold hearings on S. 3227, the "Therapeutic Communities Act of 1978," on Tuesday and Wednesday, August 2–3, 1978, at 9:30 a.m. in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

Persons wishing to testify or submit a written statement for the record should submit their testimony or address their inquiries to the Subcommittee on Penitentiaries and Corrections, room A–407, 116 D Street NE., Washington, D.C. 20510, or telephone (202) 224–5461.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

A LEGACY TO THE GREAT LAKES

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, since the death of our colleague, Senator Hubert Humphrey, we have missed his voice in this Chamber. To the proceedings of the Senate this session, Hubert would have lent wisdom and unity.

Late in 1977, Hubert agreed to write an article for Seaway Review on the Great Lakes as a shipping center for the upper Midwest. The article, printed in the spring 1978 issue of the magazine, discusses the economic contribution of the Great Lakes States. I am sure that many of my colleagues do not realize that Minnesota, for instance, ranks sixth among the States in the export of agricultural produce, and a good deal of which transit the Great Lakes from the Port of Duluth.

It appears that this article is the last written work of Senator Humphrey. We might all learn from his discussion of the issues, which will determine the growth rate of Great Lakes shipping. The Great Lakes region is an area of great economic potential, which Hubert worked to develop during his years of public service.

Since I believe that my colleagues can benefit from this discussion of an important region of growth in America, I request that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

A LEGACY TO THE LAKES

(By U.S. Senator Hubert H. Humphrey)

(Last year, Minnesota's Senator Hubert H. Humphrey agreed to do an exclusive story for us to provide our readers with his views regarding some of the nagging problems which seem to perpetually confront our Seaway System. The story was to be handled through our Washington editor, Esther Van Wagoner Tufty With the passing of the Senator, we felt we had lost this great story. However, as Mrs. Humphrey took over the work of her late husband, it became apparent that the Senator had completed the Seaway Review article—and here it is.

(As far as his staff can determine, this is the last piece of writing by Senator Humphrey. It is certainly his last words on the the Great Lakes-Seaway system—The Seaway Review.)

The people of the Great Lakes states have reason to be proud of their contribution to the economy of the United States and to world trade.

With the growing demand for agricultural commodities throughout the world, shipping on the Great Lakes from the "nation's breadbasket" has increased significantly over the past 10 years. The realization by European countries of potential economies in utilization of the Great Lakes has contributed greatly to this trade expansion.

These developments have in turn stimulated interest in improving navigational facilities and have resulted in accelerating efforts to improve all forms of transportation to provide greater access to Great Lakes ports.

With the increasing importance of world trade as a vital element in the economy of the United States, the Great Lakes states have been quick to promote their area as one which is strategically located at the crossroads of our nation. The accessibility of the Great Lakes from these states has enabled them to promote effectively their diversified agribusiness base and compete favorably in the world markets.

The construction and operation of the St. Lawrence Seaway also has been an example to the world, of unparalleled engineering accomplishment and close cooperation between two nations—the United States and Canada. In its first decade of operation, there was a 25 fold increase in cargo exports.

The state of Minnesota alone is exporting over $1.1 billion in agricultural products annually, ranking sixth among all states in 1974. In 1976, the Port of Duluth ranked eleventh among all U.S. ports and second among the Great Lakes ports in total tonnage. Grain related products and general cargo exports totaled over four million tons through September of 1977, with a financial return to Minnesota workers of well over $100 million in spendable income.

Overseas imports increased over 100 percent in 1977. Exports were up over 50 percent—mainly grain and grain by-products. And general cargo was up by 6 percent.

Shipments under our nation's "Food for Peace" program have provided a substantial amount of business for the Great Lakes. An estimated 6.7 billion tons of food will be shipped to poor countries under this program in 1979. A significant portion of this tonnage will be handled by our Great Lakes ports.

What many do not realize is the fact that Minnesota has a highly diversified economy. One fifth of America's 500 largest industrial corporations manufacture or process some portion of their output in Minnesota, and 38 of those 500 companies are headquartered in the state. Minnesota no longer is dependent on agriculture alone, but now derives over one-half of its gross product from manufacturing.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS SPEAK

The people of the Great Lakes states don't have to "blow their own horns." Their accomplishments speak for themselves, and are receiving increasing recognition throughout the world. Foreign manufacturers now are taking a hard look at the economic advantages of investing in plant and equipment in these states, rather than the coastal cities, as has been the tendency in the past. The major reasons for this change include access to raw materials, a highly educated and trained labor force, centralized transportation facilities, a location from which the United States and world markets can be profitably served, and a most attractive quality of life.

While the future of Great Lakes shipping will become continually brighter, there are a number of factors which will determine the rate of increase. I have been a strong supporter of efforts to open the Great Lakes to year-round shipping, through establishing the Winter Navigation Program and obtaining funding for the Army Corps of Engineers to carry out this effort.

I also have pushed hard for the purchase of an icebreaker for use on the Lakes, and I have urged the appointment to the Federal Maritime Commission of a representative from the Great Lakes, as America's fourth coastline.

The Port of Toledo estimates that a single Lake Erie Port would realize nearly $1 million in additional economic benefits for every two days the shipping season is extended. This potential exists throughout the entire Great Lakes system. To keep shipping rates competitive and to continue to attract exporters, it is essential that year-round facilities and operations be provided. I am hopeful that we will make progress this year on this front by appropriating funds for an icebreaker to be used in the Great Lakes.

If the Great Lakes ports received the same degree of federal support as the coastal ports, the transportation network of the Great Lakes could save this nation immense fuel costs, as well as make these states far more attractive for industrial investment.

With high priority being given to energy availability and cost considerations in industrial plant location decisions, the Great Lakes states should become a prime area for consideration by many of our major industries which now find themselves located in geographic areas no longer suitable for efficient and profitable operation.

Energy intensive industries must look for long term solutions to their financial, environmental and energy problems. With the Administration's emphasis on energy alternatives to gas and oil, the vast deposits of coal in the Dakotas, Montana, and other west central states will undoubtedly play a critical role in the future of our nation. Access to these energy alternatives takes on added significance with rising transportation costs due to the increasing price of oil products.

EXCELLENT DEVELOPMENT SITES

Accessibility to these deposits will not only make the Great Lakes states excellent sites for industrial development, but also will increase the tonnage on the Lakes. The new coal loading facility in Superior, Wisconsin, will help facilitate an efficient new means of transferring the coal to Lake Superior for shipment to ports along the Seaway.

Members of Congress from the Great Lakes states must work together, with a watchful eye on pending legislation, to insure fair and equal treatment for our ports. Traditional biases, reflected in various costs related to ocean shipping, must be overcome. We also must support efforts to make the Great Lakes attractive to American flag lines, while being sensitive to the importance of foreign flag carriers.

CONGRESS MUST FIGHT

Our Congressional delegations must assist the Great Lakes ports in the fight for less discrimination and more equal rates. I strongly believe there should be a study of the need for specific import/export rates for our region and an evaluation of the protests against rates based on differing criteria for the Coastal Ports and those on the Great Lakes.

I believe the importance of the Great Lakes ports is finally being recognized in Washington. But we need to do a better job of selling the merits of the Great Lakes area. We should be insisting that our area receive its fair share of federal assistance, guided by the principle that the role of government is to provide responsible incentives and assistance to promote fair and effective competition in our free enterprise system. The potential of the Great Lakes is tremendous. We must assure that the competitive advantages of our ports are not diminished by insensitive governmental policies.

All that the people of the Great Lakes Region ask from the federal government is that they be accorded fair and equitable treatment in the development of the full economic potential of our region.

MRS. HUMPHREY'S STATEMENT

Hubert and I shared a deep interest in developments affecting the future of America's "northern seacoast"—and I will continue his efforts to enhance the competitiveness and the economic value to our people of this invaluable resource.

But if we are to realize this tremendous potential, we must focus our attention in the months and years ahead on several important issues. These include the regulation of American and foreign flag carriers, the review of the Administration's National Water Resources Policy, due to be presented shortly, and efforts to extend the Great Lakes navigation season, including the provision of an icebreaker for service in the Great Lakes.

I fully expect substantial economic growth during the next decade in the Great Lakes region, including Minnesota's Seaway port of Duluth. All indicators point to this fact—the growing wealth and economic diversity of this region, the energy efficiency of transportation on the Great Lakes, the increasing importance of the food and energy resources of the nation's heartland, and the quality of life with which we are blessed.●

WHAT THE AMERICAN PEOPLE THINK ABOUT SALT

● Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, in the July 24, 1978, issue of Newsweek, there is a Gallup poll on what the Americans think of United States-Soviet relations. I ask that the poll be printed in the RECORD, and I call the attention of my colleagues to questions 8 and 9. Question 8 asks, "If U.S. efforts to influence Soviet policy regarding human rights threatened a nuclear-weapons agreement between the two countries, which would you feel would be more important?" The results show that 61 percent feel a nuclear-weapons agreement between the two countries is more important. Question 9 asks, "Some people feel that Secretary of State Vance should have put off going to the nuclear-arms talks to protest the trial of dissidents in the Soviet Union. Others feel that the talks are too important to postpone. Which comes closest to your view?" Sixty-five percent of the American people responded that SALT was too important to postpone.

The poll findings follow:

A POLL ON WHO'S WINNING

What do Americans think of U.S.-Soviet relations? The Gallup Organization telephoned a national sample of 515 people for Newsweek last Wednesday and Thursday. The margin of error is plus or minus 5 percentage points.

1. Since President Carter took office, would you say relations between the United States and the Soviet Union have improved, worsened or haven't changed?

MISTAKEN "SENILITY"

● Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the National Institutes on Health is performing a valuable service to the American public by identifying specific problems within the health field and making recommendations to overcome them. Specialists are attempting to synthesize research of the NIH and filter out specific knowledge that can be used in everyday medical care.

One of the recent problems to be analyzed is the disease of senility. The researchers agreed that other brain disfunctions are often mistaken for senility and go untreated. According to the specialists at the NIH meeting, many of these misdiagnosed diseases are treatable and often curable. Hopefully, the discussions at this meeting will be developed into recommendations and actions which will increase medical knowledge about these diseases. Dr. Robert Butler, Director of the National Institute on Aging, deserves special recognition for this longstanding concern about this issue.

An article in the Washington Post described the NIH meeting on senile dementia and the discussions that took place. I ask that the Post article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THOUSANDS DOOMED BY FALSE SENILITY

(By Victor Cohn)

Ten to 20 percent of the elderly senile do not really suffer from dementia—progressive loss of memory and brain function—but from other conditions and diseases that could be treated if doctors only recognized them, a group of experts on aging agreed last week.

This means, it was agreed, that 300,000 to 600,000 of the estimated 3 million Americans who show symptoms of brain failure are mistakenly labeled as "senile," and, as a result, often go untreated in nursing homes and mental hospitals.

"The prospect of 300,000 doomed people in the United States today who could have been restored to useful life by appropriate evaluation and treatment is staggering and demands action," said Dr. Richard Besdine of Harvard Medical School and the Hebrew Rehabilitation Center for the Aged in Roslindale, Mass.

Besdine was author of a draft report made by a six-member task force for discussion by the 30 specialists who attended a two-day Conference on Treatable Diseases in the Elderly at the National Institutes of Health in Bethesda.

One of the largest single causes of false senility, it was agreed, is drug intoxication: that is, reactions to medications. The most commonly guilty medications are tranquilizers, and among these the most common is Valium, the nation's most often used prescription drug.

Among treatable and often unspotted physical diseases that can cause brain dysfunction and mimic truly irreversible senility are heart disease, strokes, infections (including pneumonia), anemia, nerve diseases, brain tumors and blood clots, kidney or liver failure, metabolic diseases such as diabetes or thyroid problems, nutritional deficiencies (sometimes caused by faulty diet), reactions to chemicals and alcoholism.

The experts' consensus on all these points was reached at the conference, which ended last Wednesday.

The gathering was one of a new series of NIH "consensus meetings" that assemble specialists to make recommendations to the medical world in newly emerging, often puzzling areas.

The idea for the meetings—the creation of Dr. Donald Fredrickson, NIH director—came from a 1977 conference on mammography, or breast X-raying. Because such X-rays may sometimes trigger as well as find cancers, the experts recommended limiting mammography to women with a far greater chance of benefiting then suffering any harm, meaning women over 50, women 35 to 49 who have had one breast cancer already and women 40 to 49 who have had mothers or sisters with breast cancer.

The breast conference was one NIH was virtually forced to hold to reassess the controversial X-ray method that NIH itself was widely funding.

But NIH has also been under the fire of critics, including members of Congress, for not doing enough to translate research findings into everyday care. The consensus conferences are one reply.

The specialists on aging and related fields gathered by NIH's National Institute on Aging included Dr. Ernest Gruenberg, chairman of mental hygiene in the Johns Hopkins School of Hygiene and Public Health; Dr. Robert Katzman, neurology head at Albert Einstein Medical College, New York, and Dr. James Baker, the Veterans Administration's associate chief for mental health treatment.

The discussions will be translated into recommendations in coming months. But there was general agreement to tell practicing doctors that:

There are indeed irreversible causes of "chronic brain syndrome," or dementia, such as repeated blood vessel blockages and various brain and nerve diseases.

They would be well advised, however, to spend more time thoroughly and aggressively examining and testing their confused or disoriented patients to exclude reversible causes.

Deep psychological depression, too, can be classed as a common and often treatable, reversible cause or apparent senility.

It is "amazing," said one doctor attending the conference, how often even a heart attack can occur in silence with no outward physical sign other than mental confusion.

"We're talking about a large group of underlying, unrecognized diseases that are usually improvable, often reversible and sometimes completely curable," said Besdine.

To say that 10 to 20 percent of the supposed senility cases have potentially reversible causes does not mean other forms of senility shouldn't be treated too, said Dr. Robert Butler, director of the National Institute on Aging.

"In all cases," he said, "the earlier the treatment, the better. The brain doesn't do very well when it is ignored over a long period of time."

Dementia is not a reason "for locking up the patient and throwing away the key," said Dr. Carl Eisdorfer, University of Washington psychiatry head.

The treatment may sometimes be as simple as withdrawing a drug or giving a drug. But often, said conferees, it must mean finding family or other "societal support" for the patient. Doctors and other health workers must themselves get out of their offices into patients' homes before they can understand their problems, the conferees agreed.

"People fear few things more than losing their minds and being 'put away' in a nursing home," said another National Institution on Aging report. Yet too many conditions are "mislabeled as 'senility'" simply because the patient is old, it said.●

TUITION TAX CREDITS

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, the issue of tuition tax credits has absorbed a good deal of debate in this Nation and in much of the press over the past several months. Yet, unfortunately, we have also been barraged with an assortment of misinformation, half-truths, and scare tactics delivered by those who feel that this legislation violates the principles of church and State separation that are contained in our Constitution. Even the Attorney General has favored us with his misgivings on the subject in the absence of any consideration by the Supreme Court.

While the merits of this legislation are abundant, I agree that the constitutional issues should be faced openly and honestly. Our bill, offered by Senators MOYNIHAN, ROTH, RIBICOFF, and myself and subsequently approved by the Senate Finance Committee, will provide for an expedited court test to address this very question. I have listened to and read the reservations of our critics. Yet, I will continue to cast my lot on the side of the students and their families. This measure, I am still convinced, is a constitutional one and will survive the most rigorous examination by the Supreme Court.

Recently, Michael Malbin discussed the constitutional issues in an article for the Portland Oregonian. His analysis is both thoughtful and eye opening. He concludes, as I have, that assistance contained in tax credits for tuition does not conflict in any way with the intentions of the framers of our Constitution. I recommend this reading to my colleagues and ask to insert the article in the RECORD.

The article follows:

PAROCHIAL SCHOOL AID CONSTITUTIONAL

(By Michael Malbin)

WASHINGTON.—A major constitutional argument has developed over the proposed tuition tax credit bill which seeks to aid parents of primary and secondary school children as well as college students.

President Carter has announced he will veto any tuition tax credit bill, and Attorney General Griffin Bell has made it clear he thinks the idea, because it would aid parochial as well as other private schools, is unconstitutional.

But whatever the merits of giving such aid to private schools, as so often happens with highly emotional issues, the argument is proceeding along the wrong grounds.

Such aid to church-sponsored schools along with other secular private schools would in no way conflict with the intentions of the Founding Fathers in drawing up the First Amendment clauses which have governed our nation's treatment of religion. A careful analysis of the debates of the First Congress makes that clear.

The basis for the government's treatment of religious matters is contained in a mere 16 words in the First Amendment which state, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. . . ."

Since 1947, the Supreme Court has interpreted the first of the two clauses (no laws respecting an establishment of religion) as requiring Congress and the states to maintain strict neutrality between religion and irreligion in any laws that might conceivably aid private religious organizations.

Legal disputes since then have had to do with the differences between "aid" to religion (prohibited by the court), neutrality (required), and hostility (supposedly prohibited).

Attempts to walk this thin legal tightrope have led to a hodgepodge of conflicting rulings. States may "lend" parochial schools textbooks, but they may not reimburse them for funds spent on the same textbooks. Church-supported colleges may receive construction grants, but lower level parochial schools may not receive maintenance grants.

A speech-by-speech analysis of the debates in the First Congress shows that the amendments' authors did not intend to build the kind of "wall of separation" between church and state that the modern court has erected.

The records available to us demonstrate that the "establishment" clause was meant to have two major purposes: 1) prohibit the federal government from giving any aid to religion if the aid in question could tend to establish a religion; and 2) prohibit Congress from tampering with the state religious establishments.

Federal aid to private schools would thus have been allowed under the original meaning of the establishment clause, and could even have been limited to religious schools, if Congress had a valid secular reason for doing so and if it could somehow manage to define "religion" in a way that did not exclude minor religions.

A return to the original concept would surely alter the basic view of the relationship between religion and government in a way that would affect future legislation and future court cases. Yet it need not change some of the Supreme Court's specific holdings of recent decades, such as the ones prohibiting school prayers.

A return to the original understanding of "free exercise" would work a similarly fundamental change in the way judges view court cases without compelling a reversal of many recent holdings. The framers unquestionably denied that anyone had a right to claim an exemption from a valid, secularly based law because of a religious objection to it.

The modern Supreme Court's free-exercise rulings correctly note that the framers wanted to encourage religion. But the court uses the free-exercise clause to grant religion special favors that the framers never thought were required, while prohibiting the nondiscriminatory assistance the framers actually gave to private and parochial schools in the territories when re-enacting the Northwest Ordinance in 1789 (in which land was granted to any school).

The members of the modern Supreme Court also correctly perceive that our democracy is at its core a secular democracy. But they implement this perception through their reading of the establishment clause, while not permitting a religiously neutral application of civil laws under the reading of free exercise.

The court has permitted religious opinion to stand as judge of the civil realm in free-exercise cases, while preventing the civil realm from helping religion on civil society's own terms in its establishment clause decision. I believe when the political implications of this for a modern secular democracy are understood, the original understanding will seem attractive as a rule for today, and not simply as a curio for antiquarians.●

CERTIFICATE OF NEED: LET THE STATES DECIDE

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, every Member of the Senate can well recall the outcry of his constituents last fall when the first real substantive guidelines to implement the National Health Planning and Resources Development Act of 1974 were published. Communications protesting the HEW Secretary's preemption of local planning self-determination and the feared closing of small rural hospitals—the apparent restrictions on access to care—were too numerous to count. In our first opportunity later this week to legislatively respond to those anxieties, then, we all share a very delicate responsibility.

While there are a number of reservations with the way the Human Resources Committee-reported version of the Health Planning bill serves to answer that challenge, that is, its failure to effectively restructure and balance HSA board composition; to adequately assure that local determination will not be subordinated to Federal directives; and to openly avoid preferential treatment of Government-subsidized modes of health delivery such as HMO's, the one area which arouses the greatest concern—because of its potential impact—is the proposed regulatory entrance into the private ambulatory health care setting. S. 2410 seeks to gain this new foothold by subjecting individual physician's offices, and indeed all private care facilities, to certificate of need requirements for their major medical equipment—a matter which is most disturbing if for no other reason than that it is again attempting to reverse a State trend.

The problem with proposals of this type is that they are so ostensibly innocuous as to be in danger of escaping our attention, a point that should not be lost in the subtle language of the bill designed to accomplish the purpose of the drafters. At the State level, however, the issue has not been quite so shrouded, with already 32 jurisdictions having directly considered the idea and expressly rejected it by a more than 4-to-1 margin. In fact, only 6 States have found it desirable to generally apply certificate of need to private offices in any form, whereas 26 others have chosen to dismiss the notion entirely.

What we would be doing, then, by leaving this type of mandate in the "Health Planning Amendments of 1978." is telling those 26 States and the 18 others which have not moved to enact such a provision—a total of 44—that even though we promised them in the original law that this would be something they should decide for themselves, and even though they gave us the message very clearly last fall that they do not like the Federal Government telling them how to provide for the health of their citizenry, our superior judgment is now going to displace that prerogative. In my view, this is violating the whole spirit of the pledge Congress made back in 1974 to leave these types of essential policy matters to State and local determination—once the basic certificate-of-need concept called for in the law were implemented.

We should not find it surprising that States which have thought they would have until 1980 to design the certificate of need program most suited to their respective needs and objectives are disillusioned over the prospect of further criteria being superimposed on an already complex and administratively overwhelming law. Since most of the 39 States CON laws are relatively new anyway—only four before 1970—and the remaining 11—Delaware, Idaho, Indiana, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Utah and Vermont—are still debating how to deal with current certificate-of-need requirements, it is understandable that they should wonder why the Senate would even consider instructing them to branch out to ambulatory providers as well.

In addressing this matter during the markup of S. 2410, the effort was made to simply retain the present State option to extend certificate of need to major equipment expenditures by other than hospitals; that is, to keep it discretionary rather than precipitiously require it as a matter of Federal statute. In that way, it was felt, States which wanted to take that dramatic first regulatory step into private offices would be free to so experiment, but those which were reluctant to breach that barrier would be equally free to so refrain.

There were essentially two arguments advanced in response to justify the universal expansion of certificate of need laws to major medical equipment in private office settings. One was that there have been abuses of existing requirements by hospitals which, having been denied a certificate for an item such as a computed tomography (CT) scanner, engage a group of physicians practicing "across the street" to purchase one for them anyway—and use it to serve the hospital's inpatients. The other was that as a matter of equity all equipment acquisitions should have to clear the same authorization procedures, that is, that there should be no distinction between hospitals and doctors.

To support the first contention there were cited three examples of CON circumvention involving CT scanners—hardly demonstrative of a systematic pattern of abuse necessary to warrant an across-the-board legislative mandate, even if true. Since as of December 31, 1977, only 4.5 percent or 41 of the 921 scanners installed nationwide were in private physicians' offices, it would seem rather tenuous to try to rationalize a compelling case for comprehensive regulation on that basis. Moreover, if indeed there is a problem, the States are certainly capable of identifying and resolving it—as at least three of them—Minnesota, Florida, and North Carolina—have already done. The more instructive observation, however, may be that the offer in committee to insert appropriate modifying language to insure against any such possible "loophole" was greeted only with silence.

On the matter of the "What's good for hospitals is good for doctors" thesis, only the most basic comparison between methods of reimbursement and the legitimate government "strings" attached thereto is necessary. Very simply put, hospitals are paid on a cost basis for services provided under Federal programs whereas physicians are reimbursed through a fee system administered by third party payors. The distinction from this is clear: cost reimbursements contemplates a Government share in all expenditures made by a hospital—including capital investment in equipment—but with doctors the Government is paying only for a professional service—and has no direct interest at all in the acquisition of office equipment itself.

The Supreme Court just this spring upheld the constitutionality of the planning law on the new almost commonly accepted basis that Federal conditions may accompany the use of Federal funds. Applying that theory to the immediate situation, Congress would certainly have a justifiable reason for placing CON limitations on the purchase of hospital equipment—for which they help pay—to be placed in a facility which they helped built, but would not be so at liberty to restrict the mere acquisition of similar private office equipment in which they have no stake. Instead, the appropriate interest with respect to the latter would be in evaluating the necessity of the Government-paid-for service performed with the equipment—a function already the responsibility of carrier utilization review and professional standards review organization activities.

The whole objective of certificate of need regulation of major medical equipment—it should be noted—is to curtail its proliferation, and thus its availability, in the name of cost containment. Health planners seem to fear, that is, that expensive resources such as the CT scanner will be unnecessarily overutilized in order to pay for themselves and that, accordingly, they should be limited in number or "rationed" on the basis of estimated "need." So rather than having to go to all the trouble of deciding whether scanning procedures were medically necessary and reasonable—and paying for those which were—they theorize that it would be easier and cheaper to just limit the number which could be done by controlling the availability of the equipment. In essence, it amounts to sacrificing quality and convenience of medical care for the sake of economy.

It is difficult to understand why the committee would want to go on record as favoring the restraint of new medical technology such as the CT scanner—which has the most promising life-saving, time-saving, pain-saving, and indeed cost-saving diagnostic potential since the X-ray. For when one scanning procedure on this equipment can detect disease earlier and faster—with greater accuracy and considerably less hazard—while replacing a whole series of arduous tests such as pneumoencephalograms, contrast ventriculograms, and arteriograms at a combined lower charge, one would naturally expect us to be promoting their growth—to be making them readily accessible to all patients who might benefit from their amazing capabilities.

But apparently that is not the case and the committee wants to regulate the number and location of CT scanners by saying that HSA boards are better qualified to decide whether physicians need such equipment for their patients than are the physicians themselves. In the process, however, it is going to be guilty of generating a circumstantial monopoly which will force patients into more expensive medical care settings and produce the very result it is supposedly out to prevent. We are all familiar with what happens in the shelter of legally restricted competition, and when the same CT scan which can be performed as an outpatient in a doctor's office for $275 could cost more than $1,000 as a hospital inpatient, one has to wonder about the logic of this type of anticompetitive "cost-saving" program.

At least two of us on the Human Resources Committee thought it was about time we consider the inconsistency of advocating a policy of improved access to quality medical care at a lower cost through an emphasis on ambulatory delivery alternatives on the one hand—while legislating policies like this which can only limit access and lower quality while generating higher costs and inducing institutionalized services on the other. Indeed, Profs. David Salkever and Thomas Bice of Johns Hopkins and Washington Universities, respectively, must have been thinking the same thing when they concluded in their HEW-commissioned study of the impact of certificate of need—the only one done to date—that the concept may very well be counterproductive and that at a minimum, "the presumption of its effectiveness is clearly not warranted by the available evidence."

I agree with the majority of the committee that there should be restraint in the certificate of need area, but disagree as to its placement. If any restraint is to be applied, that is, it should be against expanding the concept beyond its current scope—based on pure conjecture—before we even have a handle on what we have got. With it now being tested in the noninstitutional setting in Colorado, Hawaii, Iowa, Rhode Island, Virginia, and Wisconsin, it makes every bit of good sense to benefit from their experience and wait to see whether it is a practice worthy of thrusting upon the other States as well. If it is ever proven workable or cost-effective for ambulatory facilities, surely we can expect the other 44 States to pick it up without the hand of the Federal Government becoming involved and telling them they have to.

It also makes every bit of good sense, it would seem to me, to wait until after we have the results of HEW's newly commissioned study is supposed to determine whether certificate of need is, after all, a successful regulatory concept. Since they have just spent over half a million dollars—$535,000 to be exact—contracting with two Boston area consulting firms to evaluate the effectiveness of CON as a cost containment mechanism, it would be not only illogical but irresponsible for us to start expanding something about which there is so much uncertainty before we know the product of our investment.

As the National Conference of State Legislatures properly recognized in a resolution adopted earlier this month calling for a vote of confidence from the Senate in their ability to decide the CON extension issue, this is a classic case of State pre-emption, Mr. President. It should be in each Senator's interest, therefore—regardless of his attitude on the relative merits or deficiencies of the CON concept—to protect the rights of his respective State and preserve the basic thrust and local character of the original planning law. While there is no suggestion that any nonhospital entities should be mandatorily excluded from certificate-of-need requirements, neither should they be mandatorily included—as S. 2410 in its present form would do.●

STRESS AND FAMILIES RESEARCH PROJECT HOLDS CONFERENCE IN ASPEN, COLO.

● Mr. HASKELL. Mr. President, I would like to draw the attention of my colleagues to the important work of the stress and families project, which was recently the focus of a conference hosted by the Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies in my home State of Colorado.

This research, initially entitled "Women and Mental Health Services," set out to study the many women who enter mental hospitals, use outpatient psychiatric services, and live in psychiatric or alcoholism halfway houses. It was discovered that such experiences were more common among some groups of women than others. Women who are separated or divorced, low-income women who head families with young children, children in female-headed families—all are overrepresented in mental health facilities. In particular the low-income mother with young children was found to be a dramatic risk for depression.

In response to these findings, Dr. Howard Davis, Chief of the Mental Health Services Development Branch of the National Institute of Mental Health, initiated a second study—the stress and families project—to investigate the stresses which lead to high rates of depression among low-income mothers of young children, and to study the effect of stress and of maternal depression on young children. This study, directed by Marcia Guttentag of Harvard University and Susan Salisan of the National Institute of Mental Health, has begun an intensive field investigation of 40 low-income mothers with at least one child in the age range from 5 to 7 in the Boston area. Four groups are included: Black married women, black single women, white married women, and white single women.

The purpose is to test the relationships between life stress, coping styles, social networks, mental health, family interactions, and child adjustment, to develop a new understanding about these relations and to develop interventions to improve mental health and family functioning based on what seems to help the most.

The findings of this research will have important implications for public policy, which increasingly touches the lives of all American families. As legislators, we must be more sensitive to the impact which our decisions have on family structure and the ability of families to cope with stress, particularly families headed by single women. We must exercise greater care in assuring that we do not inadvertently increase these stresses, through legislation designed to help women, their children, and the communities they live in.

I would also like to take this opportunity to commend the National Advisory Committee for the stress and families project and particularly its chairperson, Jeanette Williams, for their outstanding contributions and leadership. The advisory committee is composed of an impressive and dedicated group of experts, including Liz Carpenter of ERA America, Frances Lear of Women's Place, Inc., Carol Weiss of Harvard University, Carol Creedon of Reed College, Amitai Etzioni of Columbia University, Dr. Thomas Kiresuk of the University of Minnesota, and John Brandl of the Hubert H. Humphrey School of Public Policy of the University of Minnesota. This committee has dedicated itself to raising public consciousness and affecting needed public policy change, based on the findings of the stress and families project. I am sure that my colleagues will join me in extending our appreciation for their important contribution to American families.

I ask that a recent column by Ellen Goodman in the Washington Post commenting on the stress and families proj-ect be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

GOOD ATTITUDES, ALTITUDES FOR PROBLEM-SOLVING

ASPEN, COLO.—I arrived here suffering from a mild case of Jarvisitis, an epidemic that has spread out of California like some flu of depression.

"In the wake of Proposition 13" is an expression that sounds like the name of a bad summer movie, a "Jaws II." But I, too, had read the billboard as a message of conservatism in the country. It seemed that people had put a ceiling not only on taxes, but also on any willingness to make changes, to support public policies that would help others.

As I bumped over (or, rather, between) the Rockies, it occurred to me that this was as bad a time to hold a conference on Stress and Families—especially low-income families—as I could imagine. Furthermore, I assumed that the people invited into as rarified an atmosphere as the Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies would either be idealistic and therefore impractical, or practical and therefore hopelessly hopeless.

But the mountain air turned out to be a good prescription for despair.

The conference was built around the first in-depth study of stress and depression among low-income mothers of pre-school children. It is the sort of study that would usually end up with three paragraphs in Psychology Today and a place in the dusty archives of some Ph.D. library.

But the all-woman team at the Harvard Graduate School of Education had done their work—not just to find out what was wrong, but also to find out what could be changed. With funding from the National Institute of Mental Health, they studied "43 women and 5,000 variables."

Their data showed how much stress came to poor families from the catastrophic events of their lives and the everyday conditions of poverty. And also, how much stress came from their own encounters with the government programs set up to "help."

Their data didn't include new revelations. But this jaded observer was impressed over the next three days watching three dozen high-powered academics, mental-health people, government bureaucrats and political activists—in the ironically plush atmosphere of Aspen—trying to create the links from research to public policy.

They, and perhaps the rest of us, have had enormous experience in massive social trials and errors. Now they were intent on learning from these mistakes. In order to help change the lives of people in pain, they knew that they had to change the tactics and methods in their own fields.

The academics, like Harvard's Dr. Deborah Belle, seemed intent on avoiding the one-night-stand kind of research that used the poor as "subjects" and then dropped them.

The sociologists seemed determined to do what Columbia's Amitai Etzioni reminded them: to take the Hippocratic oath: First, do no harm. And the government people from HEW and NIMH were the first to acknowledge how many government programs contributed to the problem instead of the solution.

One mental-health expert, Dr. Thomas Kiresuk of Minnesota, suggested a kind of consumer-protection plan, written into any new social program to protect people from "experts" . . . like himself. Others kept reminding the group that, this time, public policy should be a response to the needs of the people, rather than a program imposed on the poor from above.

The people from Washington were the most conscious that any new social legislation had to be small scale—not an expensive war, but a limited "cost-effective" action.

It seemed that at this lofty "think-tank" in the mountains, people were remarkably, determinedly, down-to-earth. Even Betty Ford, who came to share her experiences with family stress, looking far healthier and more relaxed than a few months ago, didn't talk about her "cure," but about her first steps.

The conference didn't come up with The Solution, just an intriguing list of directions. But I saw people who believe in the value of change and are willing to work hard for limited but real goals.

I wonder if what happened here isn't indicative of something larger—a regrouping by caring, activist people in their places who are also under equally few illusions about the problems of government; who are cautious about master plans to overhaul society, but who still want to help. People who are willing to work within the ceiling of "lowered expectations" and within the structure of "cost-effective" planning.

Maybe I became too optimistic, or maybe the wake of Proposition 13 just hasn't covered the tops of these mountains yet. But the altitude was good for the blues.●

OLDER AMERICANS ACT AND HOME-DELIVERED MEALS

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, during floor debate yesterday on the Older Americans Act of 1978, I voted against an amendment for a special authorization for home-delivered meals to the elderly. While I had originally cosponsored this amendment, I came to realize that the act itself provides a better means of assuring increased meals for senior citizens in their homes.

The bill's most important aspect regarding home meals is its provision for flexibility and local control. It leaves to local government the decision concerning money to be spent on home-delivered as well as congregate meals. This means that Oregonians may determine such needs in their communities, and act accordingly. The amendment would have arbitrarily dictated how much money a community must spend on home-delivered meals.

The bill's authorization for such meals is 50 percent higher than the current level and will provide sizable additional funds for this particular need of our senior citizens.●

FEDERAL FUNDING OF ABORTIONS

● Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, we are rapidly approaching that time of year when the Congress takes up the annual debate on the issue of Federal funding for abortions.

The ethical and legal issues involved in this matter are always hotly debated and rarely have we ever had any objective analysis of the effects of restrictive funding.

I ask that a recent article by Lawrence R. Berger, M.D., which reviews approximately 39 recent studies on the impact of restrictive funding, be printed in the RECORD. The article appeared in the June 29, 1978, issue of the New England Journal of Medicine.

I would suggest that my colleagues review Dr. Berger's work as it provides us with objective studies on the effects of our actions.

The article follows:

ABORTIONS IN AMERICA: THE EFFECTS OF RESTRICTIVE FUNDING

In 1976, an estimated 1.1 million abortions were performed in the United States.[1] Some characteristics of the women undergoing abortion are shown in Table 1.[2] Between 260,000 and 275,000 of these abortions were paid for under Title XIX (Medicaid) and Title XX (Social Services) of the Social Security Act.[3] Eighty-five per cent of Medicaid-recipient women of childbearing age are mothers receiving assistance from AFDC (Aid for Dependent Children).[3] It is these women who will be most directly affected by the Supreme Court ruling in June, 1977, allowing states to refuse to pay for abortions under Medicaid. These women are also affected by the Hyde amendment to the Labor-H.E.W. appropriations bill, passed by Congress on December 7, 1977. The amendment provides that ". . . none of the funds contained in this paragraph shall be used to perform abortions except where the life of the mother would be endangered if the fetus were carried to term; or except for such medical procedures necessary for the victims of rape or incest, when such rape or incest has been reported promptly to a law enforcement agency or public health service; or except in those instances where severe and long-lasting physical health damage to the mother would result if the pregnancy were carried to term when so determined by two physicians."

The ethical and legal issues surrounding the abortion controversy have received exhaustive attention in both professional journals and the public media. Many of the articles on the medical and social implications of abortion, however, are scattered in the public health, family planning, gynecologic and psychiatric literature. These studies are reviewed here in an attempt to predict the potential effects of restricting access of low-income women to abortion.

EXCESS MATERNAL MORTALITY

Denial of public monies for legal abortion will result in excess maternal deaths no matter what alternatives women choose.[6] Mortality in pregnancy and childbirth is greater than that of legal abortion regardless of maternal age or race (Table 2). Delays in obtaining legal abortion (occurring while a woman attempts to raise money, or to convince two physicians that she will suffer "long-lasting physical health damage" by carrying her pregnancy to term), mean exposure to the increased risks of death associated with advancing gestational age: there is a 50-fold difference in maternal mortality between abortions performed before nine weeks' gestation and those performed at 16 weeks or later (Table 3). For women who resort to illegal abortions, mortality will vary depending on maternal characteristics, the skills of the abortionist, and the accessibility of qualified medical care to handle complications, particularly sepsis and hemorrhage. Tietze[7] notes that his estimate of 40 maternal deaths per 100,000 illegal abortions is "very low" and yet represents a 100-fold increased risk as compared to early legal abortions.

THE SEVERELY DEFECTIVE FETUS

Abortion is often recommended or requested when the fetus has a severe malformation or biochemical defect, or is at increased risk of such problems. A documented exposure to rubella in the first trimester carries with it, for example, a 10 to 20 per cent risk of malformation in the fetus.[8] Prenatal studies can detect many inborn errors of metabolism, central-nervous-system malformations and chromosome abnormalities. Advanced maternal age is the commonest indication for amniocentesis: about 2.2 per cent of pregnant women 35 to 39 years of age will be found to be carrying a chromosomally defective fetus.[9]

During the Amniocentesis Registry Project of the National Institutes of Child Health and Human Development between 1971 and 1975, 1040 women receiving amniocentesis suffered no major complications or increased fetal loss. Forty-five of the women were identified as carrying an abnormal fetus; 35 elected abortion.[10] Reviewing the project's findings in 1975, Dr. Theodore Cooper, then Assistant Secretary for Health, urged wide dissemination of amniocentesis: "What we must do is assure that financial barriers to access to this procedure do not exist. Because of both the human considerations and the financial advantages of prevention of disability, we shall attempt to assure coverage for this procedure by both the private and public medical insurance programs."[10] One year later, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare announced its commitment to reducing the burden of genetic disease and congential anomalies through amniocentesis coupled with elective abortion in its Forward Plan for Health.[11]

However, the Hyde amendment does not provide funds for abortion when a woman is at risk for delivering a severely defective infant. To the ranks of women who forgo prenatal diagnostic studies because of religious convictions must therefore be added those who are denied abortion because of inability to pay.

TEEN-AGE CHILDBEARING

Childbearing for young women carries with it an increased risk of obstetric complications, poor pregnancy outcome and social disruption. The obstetric problems have been reviewed elsewhere [12,13] and include a higher incidence of toxemia, prolonged and precipitate labor, post-partum infection and hemorrhage. The association of young maternal age and low-birth-weight infants is revealed most recently for United States births in 1975 (Table 4).[14] In contrast to women in their twenties, multiparous adolescents show with each succeeding pregnancy an increase in prematurity and perinatal loss.[15]

Low-birth-weight infants provide a disproportionate share not only of perinatal deaths but also of developmentally impaired children. The results of the United States Collaborative Perinatal Study, summarized in the Journal in 1973, document this point (Table 5).[16] Intellectual and behavioral deficits associated with low birth weight are also apparent on follow-up examinations at eight to 10 years of age.[17]

Carrying an unwanted pregnancy to term has the potential for disrupting a teen-ager's schoolwork, personal relations and parenting ability. Young parental age has been associated with decreased educational attainment,[18] marital instability [19] and child abuse.[20] The role of early childbearing per se in causing these adverse social outcomes, however, remains to be clarified.

To what extent will programs for pregnant teenagers and family-planning services blunt the effect of restricting abortions? Adolescent women who receive early prenatal care have shown marked improvements in obstetric outcome and rates of prematurity.[21] Comprehensive programs for school-age parents, however, have not been widely available. Those that do exist often function in isolation from other social services, have funding that is usually "piecemeal, uncertain and short-term," and show no uniformity in the services that they provide.[22]

The outlook for preventing teen-age pregnancies is not optimistic. In 1975, only two out of five women at risk for unwanted pregnancy were estimated to have received family-planning services.[23] Even when such services are made available, they are often not used by those who would benefit most.[24] Shelton's study in Georgia of births to women under 15 years of age showed that a decline in their fertility corresponded (temporally, demographically and geographically) not to the availability of contraceptive services but rather to increased numbers of abortions.[25] Even the best comprehensive programs for teen-age parents have had a limited long-term effect in the area of family planning. In a study of adolescent parents in Baltimore, all the women had attended programs offering contraceptive information and services.

However, among those who began to practice contraception after the birth of their first child, more than one-third had abandoned birth control after one year; nearly two-thirds by two years. By the five year follow-up, only about one woman in five had used contraception continuously during the entire study.[19]

Similarly, a follow-up study of adolescents served by Yale's well established and widely respected young mothers' program showed that about 40 percent of women subsequently used abortion to control fertility, an experience no different from that of young mothers not enrolled in the comprehensive program.[26]

ADVERSE CONSEQUENCES OF ABORTION

As in clinical medicine, public-policy decisions should rest on the balancing of risks and benefits in matters affecting health. Although many of the risks involved in restricting access to abortions have been discussed, some net benefit might accrue if elective abortions were associated with frequently occurring adverse sequelae. This inference is not true for maternal mortality, as noted above. Concern has been expressed, however, regarding possible adverse affects of abortion on future pregnancy outcome, and on psychologic adjustment.

[1] Perinatal mortality includes stillbirths and neonatal deaths from 20-week gestation through 27 days after birth.

Many of the early studies of pregnancy outcome after abortion suffered from a failure to control for important confounding variables, and showed conflicting results. In the well controlled anaysis of the subsequent pregnancy experience of women undergoing abortion in the United States that appeared in the Journal last December,[27] 571 women with a history of abortion were matched for maternal age, socioeconomic status, pregnancy order, history of previous fetal death, marital status and religion. It was found that a history of prior induced abortion was not related to low birth weight, premature delivery, stillbirth, neonatal death, miscarriage or congenital malformations in subsequent pregnancies. This study's results confirmed those of a previous matched-pair analysis involving 12,588 births in Taiwan.[28] Additional controlled studies will undoubtedly appear in the near future.

In its review of the literature on the mental-health effects of abortion in 1975, the Institute of Medicine of the National Academy of Sciences concluded that "the feelings of guilt, regret, or loss elicited by a legal abortion in some women are generally temporary and appear to be outweighed by positive life changes and feelings of relief." [29] The incidence of major psychiatric complications was cited as 0.2 to 0.4 cases per 1000 abortions, as found by the Joint Program for the Study of Abortion.[30] Recent studies from Great Britain, where abortion was liberalized in 1967, support the Institute's findings. A population-based study of post-abortion psychosis found an incidence of 0.3 cases per 1000 legal abortions, as compared to an incidence of post-delivery psychosis of 1.7 cases per 1000 deliveries.[31] In structured interviews with 360 women who underwent first-trimester abortions in 1971–1972, Greer et al. found marked improvement in ratings of psychosocial adjustment at a mean of 18 months after, as compared to ratings before, abortion. The improvements occurred not only in psychiatric symptoms, but also in relief of guilt feelings, interpersonal adjustment, and sexual responsiveness.[32]

CONCLUSIONS

Soon after abortion laws were liberalized in the United States, reports appeared noting dramatic declines in infant mortality,[33] deaths and complications from illegal abortions,[34,35] numbers of newborns abandoned for adoption [36] and rates of illegitimate births.[37] Certainly, other factors—such as improved access to and quality of medical care and an increased use of family planning services—were operative. Abortion services, however, played an important part. The extent to which a reversal of these trends will accompany restrictive funding of abortions will partly depend on the alternatives chosen by women with unwanted pregnancies. Undoubtedly, many will find ways of paying for legal abortions, even though "the average cost of an abortion in the United States—$280—is $42 higher than the average monthly welfare payment for an entire family for food, clothing, shelter and all other necessities." [3] Savings for the welfare system, however, are unlikely to occur. The costs of pregnancy and childbirth, hospitalization of low-birth-weight infants and women with complications from illegal abortions, and support for additional and larger families by AFDC and foster care may far exceed previous expenditures for abortions.[3,38]

Even before last year's restrictions, there was a large unmet need for abortion services, particularly among poor, rural and teen-age women.[39] Until every conception results in a wanted pregnancy, many women will choose abortions as their least undesirable alternative. Rebuilding barriers to access can only add to the medical and social burdens of the poor. At the same time, denial of abortions to low-income women jeopardizes their availability to all women. Private insurers may now decide to not reimburse for abortions. Anti-abortion forces will be encouraged to pursue further means of undermining the Supreme Court rulings of 1973, now that Congress has led the way.

What is to be done? It is still possible to advocate unrestricted abortion funding at the state level. Where restrictions are impassable, expediting the process of determining eligibility for Medicaid funding will reduce morbidity and mortality of delayed abortions. Finally, the issue will inevitably resurface in Congress. Concerned physicians must not again forgo an opportunity to influence a legislative decision of such profound human dimensions.

EMPLOYEE EDUCATION ASSISTANCE BILL, S. 2388

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, the support is growing steadily for the employee education assistance bill, S. 2388, which will allow employees to use employer-provided education assistance without the burden of having to pay tax on the tuition aid they receive.

A number of concise, well-argued statements in favor of employee education assistance have been made recently by several of the highly regarded professional engineering societies in our country. For the benefit of my colleagues I ask unanimous consent that these statements and letters of support be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

STATEMENT OF THE NATIONAL SOCIETY OF PROFESSIONAL ENGINEERS AND THE AMERICAN SOCIETY OF MECHANICAL ENGINEERS

The National Society of Professional Engineers and the American Society of Mechanical Engineers appreciate the opportunity to offer comments on S. 2388, the amendments to the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 which provide for the exclusion of employer-provided educational assistance from gross income.

NSPE, a nonprofit organization headquartered in Washington, and the ASME represent an aggregate membership of more than 156,000 individual members engaged in virtually all disciplines of engineering and are particularly concerned with the subject of tuition aid exemptions since professional engineers must continuously upgrade and increase their educations in order to remain current with the rapidly changing nature of modern technology. Many states, in fact, currently require professionals in all fields to continue classroom studies as a requisite for practicing their profession. Professional engineers, therefore, are profoundly affected by recent interpretations by the Internal Revenue Service which make certain educational and training tuition payments taxable.

Specifically, tuition payments for training or education intended to prepare an employee for a new position or occupation, and training for which a continuous service agreement is required, have been ruled by the Internal Revenue Service to be taxable income. NSPE and ASME are concerned that present and projected costs of education already prevent many Americans from obtaining the education necessary to qualify for present or future positions in the job market. The IRS rulings on employer-assisted tuition make that education even more unobtainable.

Further, the IRS has ruled that employers must withhold taxes from salaries of employees when they provide continuing education assistance. As a result, an employer who might otherwise provide part or all of the cost of continuing education will be discouraged from helping professional employees update their knowledge. NSPE and ASME are concerned that such a situation will result in a decrease of the educational levels for engineers and other employees.

Our societies believe that such a situation cannot be permitted at a time when the tradition of American technological superiority is being challenged constantly. This challenge comes not only from modern-day problems but also from foreign competition which threatens our Nation's standing as the worlds most innovative country and largest exporter of high-technology goods and services.

We strongly feel that any loss of tax revenue due to exempting tuition aid would be more than offset by the additional tax revenue derived from increased earnings of employees advancing their careers and by the increased productivity and social effectiveness of better educated Americans.

It is clear that legislative relief is needed from the IRS rulings and for this reason, NSPE and ASME urge the members of the Committee to support S. 2388. In doing so Congress can restructure a misguided tax situation which currently penalizes individuals for improving themselves and at the same time preserve and encourage our Nations competition in the international marketplace.

NSPE and ASME wish to assure the Committee of our continued interest in this subject and of our willingness to be of assistance to the Committee in any way possible.

DEAR SENATOR: The presidents of the undersigned, professional engineering societies representing over half a million members urge you to support and co-sponsor Senator Packwood's S. 2388, which provides for the exclusion of educational assistance from gross income.

The legislation is necessary because of recent interpretations of IRS regulations. The IRS has been taking an increasingly restrictive view as to what constitutes job related education. The effect has been to require employees to pay income tax on any educational support received from their employers which advances their careers, prepares them for a new job or enhances their skills or knowledge of their profession. Further, employers must withhold taxes from the salary of an employee when he does provide such continuing education opportunities.

The ruling profoundly affects the entire working public from unskilled workers to professionals. An unskilled, entry level worker is less likely to be able to afford training courses that his employer might provide—training that could determine his future and status in life. As presently interpreted, an apprentice could have to shoulder the burden of his own apprenticeship program. An employer who might otherwise provide part or all of an entry level workers education is less likely to assume the additional bookkeeping entailed in withholding taxes—and an entry level worker is less likely to be able to afford the courses on his own. Clearly, the consequence will be to stifle initiative and to keep the worker at a lower economic and social level.

The professionals, including engineers, must continually update their skills and knowledge in order to keep pace with rapidly changing technology. Indeed, many states now require professionals to take a certain number of classroom courses to maintain their legal right to practice. The IRS regulations, as presently interpreted, would discourage employers from aiding engineers in the update of their skills. This will almost certainly mean a decrease in educational levels for engineers—something we cannot afford in an era when American technology will be meeting its greatest challenge from both domestic problems and from competition for technical superiority from abroad.

We further believe that the amount of revenue expected to be gained by the IRS actions is insignificant, especially when compared to the additional revenues from workers who earn more because of enhanced capabilities.

For these reasons we strongly support S. 2388 which clarifies congressional intent regarding support for continuing education. We urge you to support this important bill. Further, we ask you to lend your name to the legislation in co-sponsorship. For we feel that it is only with widespread, bipartisan support that this most important piece of legislation can be enacted in this session of the Congress.

Sincerely,

S. Peter Kezios, President, The American Society of Mechanical Engineers; Otis E. Lancaster, President, The American Society for Engineering Education; F. A. Cleveland, President, The American Institute of Aeronautics & Astronautics; W. A. Clevenger, President, The American Consulting Engineers Counsel; and Edward S. Roth, President, The Society of Manufacturing Engineers.

William Gibbs, President, The American Society of Civil Engineers; Ivan A. Getting, President, The Institute of Electrical & Electronics Engineering; Wm. H. Corcoran, President, The American Institute of Chemical Engineers; and D. A. Schmand, President, The National Society of Professional Engineering.

JUNE 19, 1978.

Senator BOB PACKWOOD,
U.S. Congress,

DEAR SENATOR PACKWOOD: The American Institute of Chemists views with considerable concern interpretations of the Internal Revenue Code which could make certain employer sponsored continuing education activities subject to a personal tax liability by recipients. As we understand these rulings, chemists and other participants in such programs would have to pay income tax on any educational support which is judged by the Internal Revenue Service to (1) advance their careers, (2 enhance their skills or knowledge of their profession, or (3) prepare them for a new position. We further understand that the IRS has ruled that employers must withhold from an employee's salary taxes equivalent to the value of a given educational program.

Such rulings if consistent with current taxing authority, strike at the very fiber of professionalism and serve as a deterrent to the effective rendering of competent services by chemists and all others in professional callings. The Institute, since its founding in 1923, has endorsed the concept of continuing education, a precept still to be found in the second of its ten objects. It is fostered further by a program of professional certification which officially recognizes and credentials chemists and chemical engineers who regularly attend continuing eduaction programs and take other steps to assure their ability to render competent service.

It can be argued that virtually every continuing education program in which the chemical scientist participates meets one if not all three of the taxability criteria noted above—whether that program is within the discrete area of competence of the practitioner or whether it is in a closely allied field which can broaden his knowledge. Clearly, these rulings strain credibility, and corrective action seems imperative to assure that a more balanced perspective towards reasonable professional development can be restored.

It is clear that you and your associates on the Senate Finance Committee perceive the need for action through your bill, S. 2388. This matter has been discussed by our Executive Committee which, under appropriate emergency legislative authority of our Board of Directors, has asked that our views in support of your measure promptly be conveyed to you and your associates. Failing adoption of such a measure, we predict that a chaotic condition will overtake the professions, inhibit orderly professional development of our members and other chemists, and ultimately have a deleterious impact on the technological growth of our country.

This letter is written on behalf of the more than 5,000 chemists and chemical engineers who comprise our membership, the vast majority of whom have been awarded Fellow status by virtue of their accomplishments and leadership in chemical science.

Sincerely yours,

O. A. BATTISTA, FAIC, CPC.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
June 19, 1978.

Hon. BOB PACKWOOD,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR PACKWOOD: The Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers (IEEE) wishes to express to you its concern regarding the taxation of employer educational assistance as a part of gross income of the employees. We feel that this taxation policy is an encumbering and unnecessary deterrent to self-improvement; therefore, we support legislation efforts to exclude such employer educational assistance from taxation as gross income.

In this regard, please find attached the IEEE position in support of your Senate Bill (S. 2388) as well as HR 11509 and HR 12421 for the exclusion of employer educational assistance from the gross income of employees for tax purposes. We enthusiastically endorse your efforts and the efforts of Senators Javits, Nelson and Moynihan, and Representatives Steiger and Lloyd. If I can be of assistance to you and your committee in this regard, please contact the IEEE Washington Office without hesitation.

Sincerely,

BRUNO O. WEINSCHEL.

IEEE POSITION IN SUPPORT OF SENATE BILL S. 2388 AND HOUSE BILLS H.R. 11509 AND H.R. 12421 PROVIDING FOR THE EXCLUSION OF EMPLOYER EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE FROM THE GROSS INCOME OF EMPLOYEES FOR TAX PURPOSES

IEEE supports and recommends passage of the Senate Bill S. 2388 sponsored by Senators Packwood (R-OR), Javits (R-NY), Nelson (D-WI) and Moynihan (D-NY), and the House of Representatives Bills H.R. 11509 sponsored by Representative Steiger (R-WI), and H.R. 12421 sponsored by Representative Lloyd (D-TN).

The IEEE, founded 1884, is the world's largest technical professional engineering society. One hundred and fifty thousand of our members reside in the United States. Our members are volunteers with expertise in the engineering aspects of power, energy, communications, transportation and biomedicine, as well as numerous related fields. The purposes of the Institute, as defined by its constitution, are scientific, educational, and professional. Historically the IEEE has promoted electrical engineering, electronics, and related fields within engineering, arts and sciences. In 1973, the Institute established the United States Activities Board (USAB), a mechanism through which the IEEE provides its perspective on socioeconomic, political and professional interests.

The IEEE believes this legislation is necessary because the present Internal Revenue Service regulations requiring employees to pay tax on any educational support they get from their employers which advances their career or prepares them for a new job, is not only a broad scale deterrent to employer-supported continuing education, but is also an especially significant hindrance for lower income employees and minorities who may need more education to advance themselves. These employees must pay tax on the education "income" which they never actually receive as compensation.

We believe the current regulations are not only inadequate and vague, but discriminatory as well. The present Federal government tax regulations conflict with the Federal government's affirmative action initiatives.

The proposed new law would eliminate the obvious inequity for educational opportunity and the widespread confusion in tax withholding practices. Recent studies have confirmed that employer withholding practices vary widely; however, it has also been confirmed that many more employees participate in tuition aid programs when the employer does not withhold income tax for educational expenses.

Learned Societies such as IEEE endorse and sponsor Continuing Education programs designed to enhance the value of the engineer and scientist to the employer, and to further the career development of the individual. The growth of Continuing Education programs, and subsequent increased participation in them has been inherently dependent upon employer funding and the freedom of these costs from taxation to the individual. In turn the benefits derived from the increased productivity of those individuals are of immeasurable value to our nation.

The IEEE, therefore, endorses passage of S. 2388, H.R. 11509 and H.R. 12421, and solicits other support for passage in order to ameliorate this hinderance to Education in the United States.●

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, are there any orders for the recognition of Senators on tomorrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are none.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

TIME-LIMITATION AGREEMENT—S. 2234

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at such time as Calendar Order No. 720, S. 2234, the Bureau of Land Management authorization, is called up and made the pending business, that there be a time agreement thereon of 1 hour to be equally divided between Mr. BUMPERS and Mr. HANSEN; 30 minutes on any amendment; 20 minutes on any debatable motion or appeal, and that when the bill has been advanced to third reading, the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar Order No. 907, the companion House bill; that the Senate then proceed to its immediate consideration, and that all after the enacting clause be stricken and that the Senate language be inserted in lieu thereof, and the bill be advanced to third reading without further amendment or debate or motion, and the Senate then proceed with final passage, and that the agreement be in the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TIME-LIMITATION AGREEMENT—S. 2820

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when Calendar Order 741, S. 2820, Federal reclamation dams, is called up and made the pending business before the Senate, that there be a time limitation thereon of 1 hour to be equally divided between Mr. JACKSON and Mr. HANSEN; that there be a time limitation on any amendment of 30 minutes; that there be a time limitation of 15 minutes on any debatable motion, appeal, or point of order, if such is submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TIME-LIMITATION AGREEMENT—S. 2474

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at such time as Calendar Order No. 791, S. 2474, the public health assistance bill, becomes the pending business before the Senate, there be a 1-hour time limitation on debate to be equally divided between Mr. KENNEDY and Mr. JAVITS; that there be a 30-minute time limitation on any amendment, with the proviso that 1 hour be allotted to an amendment by Mr. KENNEDY; that there be 15 minutes on any debatable motion, appeal, or point of order if such is submitted to the Senate, and that the agreement be in the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE MEETING

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules and Administration be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday to hold a hearing on the nomination of John McGarry of Massachusetts and Samuel D. Zagoria of Maryland, each to be a Commissioner of the Federal Elections Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session to consider the nomination under U.S. Air Force on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I rise only to advise the majority leader that this nomination is cleared on our executive calendar, and we have no objection to proceeding to its consideration and confirmation.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate is now in executive session.

U.S. AIR FORCE

The second assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Lt. Gen. John William Pauly, U.S. Air Force, to be a general.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the confirmation was confirmed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Tho motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate is now in legislative session.

INTERNATIONAL SECURITY ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if it is agreeable with the minority leader, I ask unanimous consent that upon disposition of the amendment by Mr. GOLDWATER tomorrow, and any amendment thereto, if such is offered and adopted, the distinguished minority leader be recognized to call up his amendment. I make this request so that it will allow some time for other Senators to complete the preparation of their amendments. The Senate will also be informed as to what the program is for tomorrow up to circa noon.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the majority leader will yield——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. I would be happy to do that. I might say this is an amendment on which the order provides for an hour and a half under my control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senate will come in at 9:30 tomorrow morning. After the two leaders have been recognized under the standing order, the Senate will resume consideration of the pending business, the Foreign Assistance Act, S. 3075.

The pending question at that moment will be on the adoption of the amendment by Mr. GOLDWATER, on which there will be a 1-hour time limitation.

It is my understanding that an amendment will likely be offered to that amendment, probably by Mr. STEVENSON, and if that be the case there is 30 minutes allotted to the amendment in the second degree.

Upon the disposition of the amendment by Mr. GOLDWATER, the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) will be recognized to call up his amendment, on which there is a time limitation of 1½ hours, and at the time that amendment is disposed of I assume that Mr. PERCY would probably be prepared to call up his amendment, and Mr. GLENN would be prepared to address the amendment on this side of the aisle. On that amendment there is a 4-hour limitation.

I think the prospects look very good now, Mr. President, for completing this bill tomorrow. As a matter of fact the leadership intends to complete the bill on tomorrow, and I hope the Senate will not have to be in session too late to complete action on the measure. I hope that some of the amendments that have been coming out of the woodwork will crawl back in the woodwork overnight.

RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 9:30 tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and at 6:41 p.m. the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Wednesday, July 26, 1978, at 9:30 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate July 25, 1978:

THE JUDICIARY

Patricia J. E. Boyle, of Michigan, to be U.S. district judge for the eastern district of Michigan, vice Damon J. Keith, elevated.

Julian A. Cook, Jr., of Michigan, to be U.S. district judge for the eastern district of Michigan, vice Lawrence Gubow, deceased.

Harry E. Claiborne, of Nevada, to be U.S. district judge for the district of Nevada, vice Bruce R. Thompson, retiring.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate July 25, 1978:

IN THE AIR FORCE

The following-named officer under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 8066, to be assigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under subsection (a) of section 8066, in grade as follows:

To be general

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, July 25, 1978

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rabbi A. Aaron Segal, B'Nai Israel Congregation, Wilmington, N.C., offered the following prayer:

Lord, Supreme Creator, we praise, magnify, and sanctify Thy name: With gratefulness, we feel unshakeable commitment to Your divine decree from the sacred Biblical text of Leviticus: "Proclaim ye liberty throughout the land, to all the inhabitants thereof."

This message etched upon our Liberty Bell in Philadelphia is the reminder of our country's unswerving, unyielding ideology, as a guide to America and all mankind.

May our blessed U.S.A. forever serve as an enlightened example throughout the world for the fullest freedom from oppression, servitude, injustice, and dictatorial caprice.

May all the deliberations, discussions, debates, and decisions of our esteemed U.S. Representatives this day again reflect the ideals and principles of our democracy, from Pilgrim Fathers to our present citizenry. Amen.

Statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor will be identified by the use of a "bullet" symbol, i.e., ●

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H.J. Res. 1024. Joint resolution making urgent supplemental appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service, and for other purposes for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 8336. An act to enhance the outdoor recreation opportunities for the people of the United States by expanding the National Park System, by providing access to and within areas of the National Park System, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 12240. An act to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for intelligence and intelligence-related activities of the United States Government, the Intelligence Community Staff, the Central Intelligence Agency Retirement and Disability System, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H.R. 12240) entitled "An act to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for intelligence and intelligence-related activities of the United States Government, the Intelligence Community Staff, the Central Intelligence Agency Retirement and Disability System, and for other purposes," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. BAYH, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. HATHAWAY, Mr. HART, Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR., Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. WALLOP, and Mr. MATHIAS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and a concurrent resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1484. An act for the relief of Michael Bruce Holland;

S. 1951. An act for the relief of Jozef Swiderski;

S. 2248. An act for the relief of Susanna Shu-hui Jean;

S. 2294. An act for the relief of Joselyn Buccat Lalley and Jodelyn Buccat Lalley;

S. 2534. An act to revise and extend the provisions of title XIII of the Public Health Service Act relating to health maintenance organizations;

S. 2617. An act to authorize appropriations for programs under the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973, to amend such Act to facilitate the improvement of programs carried out thereunder, and for other purposes;

S. 3069. An act to provide that members of the Sisseton-Wahpeton Sioux Tribe may request the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain lands, and to provide that the tribe shall have a preference right to purchase certain lands held in trust by the United States for tribal members;

S. 3085. An act to extend and amend the special supplemental food program and the child care food program, and for other purposes; and

S. Con. Res. 32. Concurrent resolution relating to broadening the observance of Thanksgiving to an occasion of sharing our plenty with the hungry of other lands.

RABBI A. AARON SEGAL

(Mr. ROSE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, it has been our privilege to welcome to our midst today for purposes of opening this session with prayer, Rabbi Aaron Segal from my congressional district in southwestern North Carolina and rabbi of the B'Nai Israel Congregation in Wilmington, N.C.

Rabbi Segal was born in Jerusalem, Israel, in 1916. He came to the United States in 1923. He studied at the Hebrew Theological College.

Among his many honors, he has served as chaplain at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn.

Rabbi Segal is a great friend of the United States of America. He is a fighter for freedom and an opponent of injustice wherever it may occur in this world.

Mr. Speaker, it has been our pleasure to have him, and I thank the House for receiving him.

TV SPECIAL MALIGNS CALIFORNIA'S MARIN COUNTY

(Mr. JOHN L. BURTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday night NBC television had a special on what was purported to be the lifestyle in Marin County, Calif. The program was a total distortion of the people who live within the county of Marin, which I am pleased to represent.

By focusing on the lifestyles of a small segment of that population, the television program would tend to give the American people the idea that everyone in Marin County lives some kind of hedonistic existence. It would be not unlike having a television special focusing on San Francisco but conducting only interviews of the people of the Maltese community in San Francisco, giving the people throughout this land the impression that the entire county of San Francisco is made up of hard-working Maltese Americans.

Mr. Speaker, I will have more to say about this television special in the future. I think it really is an example of how the media can distort things and give a false impression throughout this land, in this case besmirching one of the most beautiful counties in this Nation.

PRESIDENT URGED TO MAKE APPOINTMENTS TO NATIONAL COMMISSION ON SOCIAL SECURITY

(Mr. LEVITAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, 7 months and 5 days ago the President signed into law the social security bill. In that bill there was a provision creating, by statute, the National Commission on Social Security, which has the statutory mandate to consider and review for the first time in 36 years the entire social security system and make recommendations for its fundamental change to serve our Nation's needs for the future.

To date the President has failed to name the members that he is required by law to name to that Commission. Our Speaker has already named his appointees. The Commission cannot begin its work until the administration names its appointees.

Mr. Speaker, I take this occasion, which I hope will not have to be repeated, to urge President Carter to make his appointments promptly so this important National Commission on Social Security can commence its work. There really is no good reason why it has taken this long to implement this law.

RESIGNATION AS MEMBER AND APPOINTMENT AS MEMBER OF HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE ON AGING

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation as a member of the House Select Committee on Aging:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
July 18, 1978.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, JR.,
Speaker, House of Representatives, H-205, The Capitol, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby submit my resignation as a Member of the House Select Committee on Aging.

Respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM F. WALSH,

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to clauses 6 (e) and (g), of rule X, the Chair appoints as a member of the select Committee on Aging the gentleman from Washington, Mr. CUNNINGHAM, to fill the existing vacancy.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 12240, INTELLIGENCE AND INTELLIGENCE-RELATED PROGRAM AUTHORIZATION ACT

Mr. BURLISON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 12240) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for intelligence and intelligence-related activities of the U.S. Government, the Intelligence Community Staff, the Central Intelligence Agency Retirement and Disability System, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so only for the purpose of saying that, as a designated conferee on this important legislation, the minority does not have any objections to going to conference with the waiver, and I hope there will be no objection in order that we may get on with this important business.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. BOLAND, BURLISON of Missouri, MINETA, and ROBINSON, and for consideration of differences with the Senate on intelligence-related activities, Messrs. PRICE, ICHORD, and BOB WILSON.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The call was taken by electronic device, and the following Members failed to respond:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHARP). On this rollcall 355 Members have recorded their presence by electronic device, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 3(b) of rule XXVII, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

After all motions to suspend the rules have been entertained and debated and after those motions to be determined by "nonrecord" votes have been disposed of, the Chair will then put the question on each motion on which the further proceedings were postponed.

COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS FOR RETIRED COMPTROLLERS GENERAL

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 12196) to provide for cost-of-living adjustments in the annuity of a retired Comptroller General and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 12196

Be in enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress asembled, That section 319 of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921, is amended—

(1) in subsections (b) and (c) by striking "3" wherever it appears and inserting "4½" in lieu thereof:

(2) in paragraph (2) of subsection (e) by striking everything following "equal to", and inserting in lieu thereof, ": (i) $1,548; or (ii) $4,644 divided by the number of children, whichever is lesser; or";

(3) in paragraph (3) of subsection (e) by inserting ": (i)" immediately after "equal to" and by striking everything following "survived," and inserting in lieu thereof "divided by the number of children; or (ii) $1,860; or (iii) $5,580, divided by the number of children; whichever is the smallest.";

(4) in subsection (n) by striking "the last five years of such service" and inserting in lieu thereof "those three years of service in which his annual salary was greatest", and by striking "37½" and inserting "40" in lieu thereof.

SEC. 2. The Budget and Accounting Act, 1921, is amended by adding after section 319 a new section as follows:

"SEC. 320. The annuities authorized by sections 303 and 319 of this Act shall be increased as follows:

"(1) The Comptroller General shall—

"(A) on January 1 of each year, or within a reasonable time thereafter, determine the per centum change in the Consumer Price Index published for December of the preceding year over the Consumer Price Index published for June of the preceding year, and

"(B) on July 1 of each year, or within a reasonable time thereafter, determine the per centum change in the Consumer Price Index published for June of such year over the Consumer Price Index published for December of the preceding year.

"(2) If in any year the per centum change determined under either paragraph (1)(A) or (1)(B) indicates a rise in the Consumer Price Index, then—

"(A) effective March 1 of such year, in the case of an increase under paragraph (1)(A), each annuity payable under sections 303 and 319 of this Act having a commencing date not later than such March 1 shall be increased by the per centum change computed under such paragraph, adjusted to the nearest one-tenth of 1 per centum, or

"(B) effective September 1 of such year, in the case of an increase under paragraph (1)(B), each annuity payable under sections 303 and 319 of this Act having a commencing date not later than such September 1 shall be increased by the per centum change computed under such paragraph, adjusted to the nearest one-tenth of 1 per centum.

"(3) The per centum increase authorized by the Comptroller General under this section shall not exceed the per centum increase as authorized from time to time by the Civil Service Commission under section 8340(b) of title 5, United States Code.".

SEC. 3. The provisions of the first section and section 2 of this Act shall become effective upon the date of enactment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. HORTON) will be recognized for 20 minutes each.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS).

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation will simply bring up to date the retirement and survivorship benefits provided for the Comptroller General. At the time those benefits were first enacted in 1953, they were patterned on retirement and survivorship provisions that applied to Federal judges. In 1959, the law was amended to provide benefits for the widow and dependent children of a deceased Comptroller General on the same basis as those provided to widows and dependent children of Federal judges. Since then, there have been no adjustments, and there has been no change of any kind in the Comptroller General's benefits since 1953. Former Comptroller General Lindsay Warren drew the same annuity from the time of his retirement in 1954 until his death in 1976.

The principal change that has been enacted during that time for Federal judges was a 1976 law authorizing cost-of-living adjustments to their annuitants. Cost-of-living adjustments are also provided for annuitants under the Civil Service Retirement Act and other retirement laws. H.R. 12196 would apply that same cost-of-living adjustment to the annuity of the Comptroller General. It would also update the annuities of dependent children and widows to make them similar to the judges' program. At the same time, the bill would increase from 3 percent to 4½ percent the amount of contribution a Comptroller General makes for survivor benefit coverage.

Mr. Speaker, this bill would affect only three individuals—the current Comptroller General, one retired Comptroller General, and one surviving spouse. The Congressional Budget Office estimates its cost at less than $10,000 a year for the next 5 years.

This is simply a matter of equity—a matter of carrying out congressional intent—and I urge approval of the bill.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the bill H.R. 12196 is a simple but justified bill in its purpose, which is to provide cost-of-living adjustments in the annuity of a retired Comptroller General. The Legislation and National Security Subcommittee as well as the full Government Operations Committee examined the bill and unanimously reported it.

As we discovered during subcommittee hearings, the Comptroller General is the only official of GAO who does not have a cost-of-living adjustment in the retirement annuity. This bill remedies that shortcoming. It also brings the Comptroller General's retirement annuity in line with the retirement and survivorship benefits of Federal judges. Congress decided in 1953 that the Comptroller General's benefits should be keyed to the retirement program of judges in the Federal courts. Federal judges, however, receive the benefit of subsequent increases in the salary of the office after they retire. The Comptroller General does not. This bill seeks to remedy that unfortunate oversight.

The Congressional Budget Office, in its cost estimate of the bill, confirmed in a letter to our committee chairman, Mr. BROOKS, that H.R. 12196 will affect only three individuals: the current Comptroller General, one retired Comptroller General, and one surviving spouse. The Budget Office further estimated that the cost of this legislation will be less than $10,000 per year over the next 5 years.

Mr. Speaker, this is a reasonable and worthy adjustment, so I recommend the approval of H.R. 12196 here today.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GOODLING).

Mr. GOODLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity just to ask the chairman a couple of questions. I realize that the $10,000 a year seems very insignificant, but as I sense the mood of the country, they are most upset with a lot of State, local, and Federal Government retirement programs, and I think they are telling us they would like to have us bring them down, not to bring others up. The questions I would pose to the chairman are the following:

First of all, am I right that his term is limited to 15 years?

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, that is correct.

Mr. GOODLING. The judge's lifetime term might be 18, 20, 30 or 40 or more years, but the Comptroller General is 15 years. Second, am I correct that he receives as his retirement benefit whatever he made as his salary when he retired?

Mr. BROOKS. Correct.

Mr. GOODLING. Is that at the present time $45,000?

Mr. BROOKS. That is not correct.

Mr. GOODLING. Is it more than that?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes.

Mr. GOODLING. Then my arithmetic will be wrong because, as I figured, in 15 years, if one multiplies that by the 3 percent he pays in, the most he can possibly pay in is $20,000, and the very first year in retirement he receives more than double what he paid in.

I guess my concern is that we may decide then to model the congressional retirement system after that, or maybe every other federal system. I just think we should be working toward bringing down some of these ridiculous retirement programs rather than trying to bring those that are down up to some other program. I think, really, when we look at the Comptroller General's retirement program it is a most desirable program that we would all like to be a part of.

Does the gentleman know what the salary is?

Mr. BROOKS. I think it is about $57,500. I would further bring to the gentleman's attention that the Comptroller General, just like Federal judges, does not pay anything into that retirement program. The only contributing sum that they pay is for their dependent widows and surviving children, and that would be raised from 3 to 4.5 percent.

Mr. GOODLING. That even makes it a much more beneficial program. The gentleman and I are paying in 8 percent and not doing nearly as well.

Federal judges pay none, just like the Comptroller General. This is under the previous law Congress has already passed.

Mr. GOODLING. The only point is that the nonpublic employees in this country would like for us to reduce the judges' retirement program, rather than bringing everybody else up to the judges.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 12196.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RESERVISTS' RETIREMENT ELIGIBILITY

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 11823) to amend section 1331(c) of title 10, United States Code, to allow certain otherwise ineligible reservists to become eligible for retired pay, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 11823

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1331(c) of title 10, United States Code, relating to retired pay for nonregular service, is amended by striking out "unless he" the first place it appears and all that follows in such section and inserting in lieu thereof "unless—

"(1) he performed active duty after April 5, 1917, and before November 12, 1918, or after September 8, 1940, and before January 1, 1947; or

"(2) he performed active duty (other than for training) after June 26, 1950, and before July 28, 1953, after August 13, 1961, and before May 31, 1963, or after August 4, 1964, and before March 28, 1973.".

SEC. 2. The amendment made by this Act shall apply with respect to retired pay payable for months beginning after September 30, 1978, or the date of the enactment of this Act, whichever is later.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS) will will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHELL) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS).

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of H.R. 11823 is to extend eligibility for Reserve retirement benefits to certain individuals who participated in the Reserve prior to August 16, 1945, but who are presently barred from receiving those benefits because they did not serve on active duty during World War I, World War II, or Korea, if they served on active duty (other than for training) during the Berlin or Cuba crises or during Vietnam.

Chapter 67 of title 10, United States Code establishes retired pay for reservists and national guardsmen who meet certain age and service requirements. In general, individuals who have reached age 60 and have accumulated 20 years of creditable service are entitled to retired pay. However, current law prohibits the payment of retired pay to any person who, prior to August 16, 1945, was a member of the nonregular military service (that is, Army Reserve, Army National Guard, and so forth) and who had failed to serve on active duty during either World War or the Korean War.

H.R. 11823 would extend eligibility for retirement benefits to those who had served on active duty (other than for training) during the Berlin or Cuban crises or Vietnam. Such an extension would continue the intent of the Congress when it previously extended eligibility to members of the pre-1945 group who served during Korea. This provision extends benefits to those who have removed any shadow of doubt of their willingness to place themselves in a situation of potential risk in service to their Nation.

However, recognizing that there may be other members of the pre-1945 group who are justly deserving of benefits, the Department of Defense has been asked to provide an indepth report regarding the circumstances surrounding the nonutilization of individuals who participated in the Reserve before and after World War II but who did not serve on active duty during World War II. In addition, the Department has been requested to assess its capability to evaluate claims of individuals regarding their specific circumstances during World War II.

The Congressional Budget Office estimates the first-year cost at only $620,000. This cost would rise to $775,000 by the fifth year. The Department of Defense has estimated that approximately 100 additional reservists would be eligible for retirement upon enactment of this legislation.

These members have served their Nation for over 20 years. They have served on active duty during a period of conflict. They have indicated their willingness to incur the risk involved in military service. They deserve the benefits afforded by this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the Members to support my motion.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I add my support to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS).

Congress' principal purpose in establishing a retirement benefit for reservists was to maintain and enhance the Nation's combat readiness by inducing new recruits to enlist in the Reserve and National Guard after World War II and to provide an incentive for such reservists to serve a full 20 years. In addition, Congress wished to show the Nation's gratitude to those reservists and National Guardsmen who had served on active duty during wartime, and its need of their continued services, by providing retirement benefits upon completion of satisfactory service.

There are undoubtedly individuals who participated in the Reserve or National Guard prior to August 16, 1945, who through no fault of their own—and perhaps even in spite of efforts on their part—did not serve on active duty during World War I, World War II, or Korea. Many members of the Reserve and National Guard today have not and will not be provided the opportunity to serve on active duty during a period of hostilities. On the other hand, some individuals undoubtedly purposefully avoided coming to the aid of the Nation in its time of greatest need. The present law insures that most, if not all, of those in the latter category do not receive any benefit. However, it also probably bars receipt of retired pay by those who do justly deserve the benefits.

Extending Reserve retirement benefits to those presently barred but who served on active duty—other than for training—during the Berlin or Cuban crises or during Vietnam represents an action that has a precedent in the extension of retirement benefits to those who served during Korea. In addition, individuals who were on active duty—other than for training—during these latter crisis periods have indicated their willingness to serve the Nation in time of need.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support the motion.

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, I strongly support H.R. 11823 to grant retirement benefits to those pre-World War II reservists who did not serve during World War II or the Korean Conflict, but who later were called up and served on active duty during the Berlin blockade or the Cuban missile crisis.

I do feel we are remiss, however, in not facing at this same time the merits of the retirement claims of those reservists ineligible under present law who were precluded from entering on active duty service during World War II. My reference is to two specific groups; one, those who were physically disqualified from active military duty even though they met the physical standards of the National Guard and, two, those whose World War II occupation was so essential to the war effort that they were not permitted to relinquish their civilian occupation.

I recognize and share the concern of those of my colleagues who wish to withhold retirement annuities from those few pre-World War II reservists who deliberately, through whatever ruse they could devise, avoided meeting their obligation to their Nation. At the same time, we should not arbitrarily and vindictively refuse to look at these cases one by one to insure ourselves that we are not unjustifiably depriving honorable men of benefits they are due through long years of service to their State and country.

My attention was called to this issue by a constituent who served nearly 30 years in the National Guard and learned when he reached his 60th birthday this June that he was ineligible for retirement. He wrote to me to ask for an explanation of his exclusion from benefits and in researching his military record, I learned he fits both categories I described above.

My constituent was a member of the National Guard before World War II, but when his unit was called up, he was classified IV–F because he was totally deaf in one ear. However, he was not content to sit out the war in the relative safety of the Midwest.

To find a way to serve his country, this man traveled to the west coast, worked nights in defense shipyards and went to maritime school during the day. When he completed his schooling, he signed onto a merchant vessel and served 11½ months in the Pacific theater. His vessel then moved to the Atlantic Ocean and he served out the balance of the war transporting supplies and troops across the English Channel as a member of the War Department's Transport Service.

As a member of the Transport Service, his occupation was classified essential and even if armed services medical standards were modified, he would not have been drafted. As I am sure my colleagues remember, under Executive order, in order to insure that defense industries had the manpower they needed, all entrants to the Armed Forces were processed by the Selective Service System and no individual over age 18 was allowed to enlist.

A further irony is involved in this man's case. That is, he was given a medical examination during the time he served in the European theater and when his physical problem was discovered, he was relieved of his deck duties. Rather than accept a discharge while the war was going on, he elected instead to take a two-grade demotion with a reduction in pay and work below decks in an assignment where perfect hearing was not considered essential.

He did not return to this country until the war was over and his vessel was decommissioned in 1946. He then rejoined his National Guard unit and served until his 60th birthday.

Earlier in this Congress, we enacted legislation (Public Law 95–202) requiring the Secretary of Defense to review the civilian service of certain categories of persons such as members of the women's air force (WASP) to determine if these persons were entitled to veterans' benefits. To implement that law, proposed regulations are now in final drafting stages prior to publication in the Federal Register. It is my understanding a Civilian Military Service Review Board, chaired by a representative of the Department of the Air Force, will be assigned the responsibility of reviewing records and making a recommendation as to whether or not the civilian service performed should be accepted or rejected as comparable to the military service performed by members of the Armed Forces.

This Board, of course, has not yet been constituted, but because of the similarity of the problem, I feel it would be appropriate for this Congress to write strict criteria and assign to this same or to a similarly constituted Board the additional task of judging the character of the alternative occupation performed by prewar reservists who failed to enter on active duty during World War II.

While this issue is before us, I would hope that we could reach a final resolution and end any present injustice to those individuals who have justly earned retirement benefits by their long years of service to their country.●

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 11823.

The question was taken.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 3, rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

DUNOIR BASIN ADDITION TO WASHAKIE WILDERNESS

Mr. RONCALIO. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 12349) to provide for the DuNoir Basin addition to the Washakie Wilderness, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 12349

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in accordance with section 3(b) of the Wilderness Act (16 U.S.C. 1132(b)) certain lands in the Shoshone National Forest, Wyoming, which comprise approximately thirty-four thousand five hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "DuNoir Basin, Washakie Wilderness Additions—Proposed", dated June 1978, are hereby designated as wilderness, and shall be incorporated in, and deemed a part of the Washakie Wilderness as designated by Public Law 92-476.

SEC. 2. As soon as practicable after this Act takes effect, the Secretary of Agriculture shall file a map and legal description of the enlarged Washakie Wilderness with the Energy and Natural Resources Committee of the Senate and the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, and such map and description shall have the same effect as if included in this Act: Provided, however, That correction of clerical and typographical errors in such legal description and map may be made. Such map and legal description shall be on file and available for public inspection in the Office of the Chief of the Forest Service, Department of Agriculture.

SEC. 3. The Washakie Wilderness shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture in accordance with the provisions of the Wilderness Act governing areas designated by that Act as wilderness areas, except that any reference in such provisions to the effective date of the Wilderness Act shall be deemed to be a reference to the effective date of this Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. RONCALIO) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. JOHNSON) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. RONCALIO).

Mr. RONCALIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this is legislation mandated by our earlier action of some 6 years ago in Public Law 92-476, in which we asked the Forest Service to study a 28,000-acre area in Wyoming that had at that time ended up as a problem which was unable to be solved by either putting it into a wilderness designation then or opening it to timber harvest. Those who were involved some 5 years ago agreed to maintain the area as a special management unit, and the administration has now recommended wilderness for the entire 28,800-acre study area.

We are now proposing that the 28,800-acre DuNoir Special Management Unit, which is one of the truly lovely areas of my State of Wyoming, plus some 5,700 acres of contiguous roadless lands which pose no resource conflicts, be put into a permanent wilderness designation. Before doing this, however, we took out of the proposed 43,000 acres originally in H.R. 12349 about a 9,000-acre area that has some oil and gas potential and also a proposed timber salvage sale. This enabled us to make sure there would be enough in the coming timber salvage sale to add some yield to the timber operations in Wyoming.

I would recommend to the Members, if they have an interest in this legislation, to read the report. It is an excellent report, and it was prepared by Mr. Andy Wiessner of my staff.

He visited the area just recently, and I have visited the area on several occasions, and I am very proud of it. I want to do my part in seeing that it gets the wilderness protection it so clearly deserves.

On page 2 of the report, the Members will find that we list there the fact that this is the last area of the entire upper Wind River Valley where there has not been clearcutting. I think one such area should be preserved. That is the reason we advocate this truly spectacular basin.

The Wyoming Game and Fish Department is very hopeful that we will pass this legislation because there are something like 1,000 or 1,200 elk which migrate through this basin annually, and there is a resident herd of some 300 to 400 animals in this relatively small area.

In addition, there are bighorn sheep, moose, mountain lion, mule deer, bear, and other big game.

Using field glasses, I have seen several hundred baby ducks on some of the lakes in the area.

It is also our opinion that this comprises a pristine watershed and presents outstanding opportunities for outdoor recreation activity. The watershed is important to the many ranches of the lower DuNoir Creek Valley, and it provides a year-round clean water supply. These values could be jeopardized, and certainly the elk habitat would be seriously jeopardized by logging.

There is a possibility that this legislation will go now here in the Senate, but I hope very much that they will accept this bill, which strikes a reasonable compromise between resource development and the preservations of the DuNoir Basin's incomparable values. I urge a favorable vote for the bill.

Mr. Speaker, one more item deserves mention before we end our discussion on H.R. 12349, and that is the matter of public access to the DuNoir Basin. To facilitate public access, the committee deleted approximately 60 acres at the very southern boundary of the proposed wilderness between Esmond Creek and the East Fork of DuNoir Creek. As is noted on pages 5 and 6 of the committee report, this acreage was deleted "to accommodate a trailhead and parking facilities to serve hunters and other recreational visitors to both the east and west forks of DuNoir Creek." It should be made clear, however, that by the use of the word "trailhead" the committee means only limited facilities such as parking, trash receptacles, and ramps for the unloading of horses.

In short, the trailhead should be designed as a jumping off point for those wishing to enter the wilderness, and not as a destination in and of itself. It should be emphasized, therefore, that the type of facilities envisioned by the committee do not include picnic tables, developed campgrounds or other improvements for overnight camping. These types of improvements are already present at Brooks Lake and other locations in the Upper Wind River Valley, and would be completely inappropriate for a remote and primitive area such as the general vicinity of the proposed trailhead.

I would also note that the committee report on H.R. 12349 instructs the Forest Service to establish the trailhead in a manner that will protect adjacent private lands from trespass and unauthorized use. Limiting the trailhead facilities to the minimum facilities discussed above will help insure that these private lands are not adversely impacted.

In addition, I would reiterate the committee report's expression of gratitude—and add my personal thanks—to the adjacent private landowners who have been understanding and cooperative in the committee's attempts to locate a trailhead—and right-of-way to the trailhead—that will be the least disruptive to wildlife. I am confident the Forest Service will operate and maintain the trailhead, and right-of-way to the trailhead, so that these private lands will be clearly identified as such, and the public will be aware that they are not part of the wilderness and not authorized for public use without specific permission from the landowners involved.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would just briefly urge my colleagues to vote for this wilderness bill. This is one that the gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. RONCALIO) has been working on and has been urging passage for sometime.

I think it is appropriate that, as the gentleman leaves the Congress, this bill should be passed overwhelmingly as a tribute to the gentleman from Wyoming, who has served so long and faithfully as the sole Member of the House of Representatives from that State.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has been, indeed, a friend to the whole Rocky Mountain West, and, in most every instance that I know of, has tried to reconcile the conflicting values of wilderness, timber, and multiple-use concepts, and has in almost every instance worked out a kind of compromise that would allow these conflicting interests to wind up supporting the various wilderness bills which have been passed under his aegis.

Mr. Speaker, this is another example of the gentleman's eagerness to try to work out the conflicting interests and solve these kinds of problems.

The Congress is going to sorely miss TENO RONCALIO.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 12349. This bill would designate 34,500 acres of the DuNoir Basin in the Shoshone National Forest, Wyo., as an addition to the existing Washakie Wilderness.

The DuNoir Basin is a unique and beautiful area that includes the last remaining nonclearcut drainage in the Upper Wind River Valley. It offers a haven for wildlife as well as outstanding opportunities for outdoor recreationists to enjoy the wilderness. Elk migrate through the basin each year, and there is a resident elk herd of about 400 animals. Bighorn sheep, moose, cougar, mule deer, and other big game share the habitat. Trail Lake, near the southern boundary of the proposed wilderness, has rare nesting trumpeter swans, as well as a thriving duck population.

As introduced by the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Indian Affairs and Public Lands, Mr. RONCALIO, H.R. 12349 provided for 43,760 acres of wilderness. After considering testimony regarding potential resource conflicts, the subcommittee deleted 9,200 acres encompassing lands covered by oil and gas leases, a salvage timber sale area with some 8 million board feet of fire-damaged timber, and several hundred acres of standard timber. Another 60 acres was deleted for a trailhead facility.

As amended and reported by the committee, the bill is supported by the Carter administration, the Wyoming Department of Game and Fish, and a clear majority of the citizens living in the DuNoir area. According to the Congressional Budget Office, enactment of H.R. 12349 will result in no additional cost to the Federal Government.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the sponsor and principal force behind this legislation, the gentleman from Wyoming, who retires from the Congress at the end of this session. This DuNoir Wilderness Act should stand as a monument to his diligent efforts to provide the citizens of his State and of the Nation with wilderness areas through legislation that balances fairly the often competing needs and concerns of economic and environmental interests. By accommodating legitimate concerns of affected parties and interests in evaluating relative resource values involved with wilderness, Mr. RONCALIO has brought to the floor a bill essentially without controversy or opposition. It is a pleasure to express my support for H.R. 12349 and to urge the House to approve it without delay.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. RONCALIO) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 12349, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. BEARD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 3 of rule XXVII and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

SOCIAL SERVICES AMENDMENTS OF 1978

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 12973) to amend title XX of the Social Security Act to increase the entitlement ceiling and otherwise provide for an expanded social services program, to promote consultation and cooperative efforts among States, localities, and other local public and private agencies to coordinate services, to extend certain provisions of Public Law 94–401, and for other purposes as amended.

H.R. 12973

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Social Services Amendments of 1978".

INCREASE IN AMOUNTS ALLOCATED TO STATES

SEC. 2. (a) Section 2002(a)(2)(A) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "$2,500,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "the dollar figure determined under subparagraph (E) for such fiscal year".

(b) Section 2002(a)(2) of such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(E) The dollar figure in effect under subparagraph (A) for any fiscal year beginning on or after October 1, 1978, shall be equal to the dollar figure in effect under such subparagraph for the preceding fiscal year, increased—

"(i) in the case of any fiscal year to which clause (ii) does not apply, by an amount equal to 16 percent of the dollar figure which would have been in effect under such subparagraph for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978, if section 3(a) of Public Law 94–401 had not been enacted, or

"(ii) in the case of any fiscal year immediately following a fiscal year for which the dollar figure in effect under subparagraph (A) exceeded the dollar figure referred to in clause (i), by an amount equal to 75 percent of the amount specified in such clause (62.5 percent of such amount in the case of the first such year); except that in no case shall the dollar figure in effect under subparagraph (A) exceed $3,450,000,000 for any fiscal year.".

CONSULTATION WITH LOCAL OFFICIALS

SEC. 3. (a) Section 2004 of the Social Security Act is amended by inserting "(a)" after "SEC. 2004.", and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) A State's comprehensive services program planning does not meet the requirements of this section unless, prior to the publication of the proposed comprehensive services program plan in accordance with subsection (a), the State official designated under paragraph (2) of that subsection gives public notice of his intent to consult with the chief elected officials of the political subdivisions of the State in the development of that plan, and thereafter provides each such official with a reasonable opportunity to present his views prior to the publication of the plan.".

(b) Paragraph (2) of section 2004(a) of such Act (as so designated by subsection (a) of this section) is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (I);

(2) by striking out "; and" at the end of subparagraph (J) and inserting in lieu thereof ", and"; and

(3) by adidng at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(K) a description of the process of consultation that was followed in compliance with subsection (b) of this section, and a summary of the principal views expressed by the chief elected officials of the political subdivisions of the State in the course of that consultation; and".

(c) Section 2007 of such Act is amended—

(1) by striking out ", and" at the end of paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon;

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and" and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) the term 'political subdivisions of the State' means those areas of the State that are subject to the jurisdiction of general purpose local governments.".

MULTIYEAR PLAN

SEC. 4. (a) Paragraph (1) of section 2004(a) of the Social Security Act (as so designated by section 3(a) of this Act) is amended to read as follows:

"(1) the beginning of the fiscal year of either the Federal Government or the State government is established as the beginning of the State's services program period, and the end of such fiscal year or the succeeding fiscal year is established as the end of the State's services program period; and".

(b) Section 2004(a) of such Act (as so designated) is amended by adding at the end thereof (after and below paragraph (5)) the following sentence:

"In any case where a State's services program period extends for two fiscal years (as permitted under paragraph (1)), such State's services program planning meets the requirements of this section only if its comprehensive services program plan also provides that additional public comment on such plan will be accepted for a period of at least forty-five days immediately preceding the beginning of the second such fiscal year.".

(c) Section 2004(a) of such Act (as so designated) is further amended—

(1) by striking out "services program year" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "services program period";

(2) by striking out "annual" in paragraph (2) (in the matter preceding subparagraph (A)) and in paragraph (4); and

(3) by striking out "during that year" in paragraph (2) (in the matter preceding subparagraph (A)) and inserting in lieu thereof "during that period".

EXTENSION OF SPECIAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO CHILD DAY CARE SERVICES AND PROVISIONS RELATING TO ALCOHOLICS AND DRUG ADDICTS

SEC. 5. (a) The amount of the limitation which is imposed by section 2002(a)(2)(A) and (E) of the Social Security Act as amended by section 2 of this Act, and which is otherwise applicable to any State for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, shall be reduced to the extent necessary to assure that the amount of such limitation (for such fiscal year) does not exceed an amount equal to (1) the maximum dollar amount of the limitation (imposed by such section 2002(a)(2)(A)) which would be applicable to such State for such fiscal year (without regard to the amendments made by section 2 of this Act) if section 3(a) of Public Law 94–401 had been extended so as to apply in the case of such fiscal year, plus (2) an amount equal to the sum of (A) the total amount of expenditures (i) which are made during such fiscal year in connection with the provision of any child day care service, and (ii) with respect to which payment is authorized to be made to the State under title XX of such Act for such fiscal year, and (B) the aggregate of the amounts of the grants, made by the State during such fiscal year, to which the provisions of section 3(c)(1) of Public Law 94–401 are applicable.

(b) Section 3(b) of Public Law 94–401 is amended by inserting after "the provisions of such subsection" the following: ", or which become payable to any State for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, by reason of section 2 of the Social Services Amendments of 1978 (but not in excess of the amount described in section 5(a)(2) of such Amendments),".

(c)(1) Section 7(a)(3) of Public Law 93-647 is amended by striking out "October 1, 1978", and inserting in lieu thereof "October 1, 1979".

(2)(A) Section 3(c)(1) of Public Law 94-401 is amended by inserting after "fiscal year specified in subsection (a)," the following: "or during the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979 (but not in excess of the amount described in section 5(a)(2) of the Social Services Amendments of 1978),".

(B) Section 3(c)(2)(A) of Public Law 94-401 is amended—

(i) by inserting "(i)" after "the amount, if any, by which"; and

(ii) by inserting after "such fiscal period or year," the following: "or (ii) the aggregate of the sums (as so described) granted by any State during the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, exceeds the amount by which such State's limitation for that fiscal year is increased pursuant to section 2 of the Social Services Amendments of 1978 (but not in excess of the amount described in section 5(a)(2) of such Amendments),".

(3)(A) Section 3(d)(1) of Public Law 94-401 is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: ", and during the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979 (but not in excess of the amount described in section 5(a)(2) of the Social Services Amendments of 1978).

(B) Section 3(d)(2) of Public Law 94-401 is amended—

(i) by striking out "either such fiscal year" in the matter preceding subparagraph (A) and inserting in lieu thereof "any such fiscal year"; and

(ii) by striking out subparagraph (A) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(A) the amount by which the limitation (imposed by section 2002(a)(2) of such Act) which is applicable to such State for such fiscal year is increased pursuant to subsection (a) or pursuant to section 2 of the Social Services Amendments of 1978, over".

(4) Section 50B(a)(2)(B) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (definition of Federal welfare recipient employment incentive expenses) is amended by striking out "October 1, 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "October 1, 1979".

(5) Section 5(b) of Public Law 94-401 is amended by striking out "September 30, 1978" and "October 1, 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1979" and "October 1, 1979", respectively.

(6) Section 4(c) of Public Law 94-120 is amended by striking out "only for the period" and all that follows and inserting in lieu thereof "from and after October 1, 1975.".

EMERGENCY SHELTER

SEC. 6. Section 2002(a)(11) of the Social Security Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (C);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (D) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(E) any expenditure for the provision of emergency shelter, for not in excess of thirty days in any six-month period, provided as a protective service to an adult in danger of physical or mental injury, neglect, maltreatment, or exploitation.".

SOCIAL SERVICES FUNDING FOR TERRITORIAL JURISDICTIONS

SEC. 7. (a) Section 2002(a)(2) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out subparagraphs (C) and (D) and inserting in lieu thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(C)(i) From the amounts made available under section 2001 for any fiscal year beginning with the fiscal year 1979, the Secretary shall allocate to the jurisdictions of Puerto Rico, Guam, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Virgin Islands for purposes of payments under sections 3(a)(4) and (5), 403(a)(3), 1003(a)(3) and (4), 1403(a)(3) and (4), and 1603(a)(4) and (5) with respect to services, in addition to any amounts available under section 1108, the applicable dollar amounts specified in or determined under clause (ii).

"(ii) The dollar amounts to be allocated to the jurisdictions of Puerto Rico, Guam, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Virgin Islands under clause (i)—

"(I) in the case of the fiscal year 1979, shall be $15,000,000, $500,000, $100,000, and $500,000, respectively;

"(II) in the case of the fiscal year 1980 or any subsequent fiscal year, shall be amounts each of which bears the same ratio to the corresponding dollar amount specified in subdivision (I) of this clause as the dollar amount in effect under subparagraph (A) for that fiscal year (as specified in subparagraph (D)) bears to $2,900,000,000.".

(b)(1) The last sentence of section 2001 of such Act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "(and to territorial jurisdiction as described in subsection (a)(2)(C) thereof)".

(2) Subparagraph (E) of section 2002(a)(2) of such Act (as added by section 2(b) of this Act) is redesignated as subparagraph (D); and such subparagraph as so redesignated is further amended by striking out "except that in no case" in the matter following clause (ii) and inserting in lieu thereof "except that the dollar figure determined under the preceding provisions of this subparagraph for any fiscal year shall be reduced by the sum of the amounts to be allocated to the territorial jurisdictions for that fiscal year under subparagraph (C), and in no case".

(B) The first sentence of section 2002(a)(2)(A) of such Act (as amended by section 2(a) of this Act) is amended by striking out "(E)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(D)".

TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS

SEC. 8. (a) Section 2002(a)(3)(B) of the Social Security Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "annual"; and

(2) by striking out "2004(2)(B) and (C)" and inserting in lieu thereof "2004(a)(2)(B) and (C)".

(b) Section 2003(b) of such Act is amended by striking out "services program year" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "services program period".

The last sentence of section 2003(d)(1) of such Act is amended by striking out "2004(1)" and "services program year" and inserting in lieu thereof "2004(a)(1)" and "services program period", respectively.

(d) Section 2003(e)(1) of such Act is amended by striking out "subsection (g)" and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (d)".

(e) Section 2005 of such Act is amended by striking out "service program year" and inserting in lieu thereof "services program period".

(f) Section 1108(a) of such Act is amended by striking out "2002(a)(2)(D)" in the matter preceding paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof "2002(a)(2)(C)".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 9. This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall be effective with respect to fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1978; except that the amendment made by section 3 shall be effective, in the case of any State that has published a proposed comprehensive services plan for the fiscal year 1979, only with respect to its next succeeding comprehensive service plan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California (Mr. CORMAN) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from New York (Mr. CONABLE) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. CORMAN).

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 12973 is critically important legislation to insure the continuation and further expansion of social services programs affecting over 5 million people in this country. The bill provides for reasonable increases during the next 3 years in the ceiling of funds for the title XX social services program under the Social Security Act.

The $2.5 billion ceiling on funding for social services under the Social Security Act was originally established in 1972. Since then there has been only a $200 million or 8-percent increase in the ceiling on title XX funds. The result has been that States have cut back on services and limited eligibility for services. Examples of these essential services are:

Child day care services which enable low-income families to work and at the same time insure that essential services are provided for their children;

Homemaker services are provided to over 400,000 individuals, including the aged and the disabled. This enables them to continue to live in their own homes and prevents the need for costly institutional care.

Title XX funds also provide for counseling and training services for welfare recipients to enable them to increase their employment potential and assist them in obtaining employment.

The physically and mentally handicapped are provided services in their own community to enable them to have meaningful lives and oftentimes live with their own family as compared to an institution.

Many senior citizen centers are funded with title XX funds.

H.R. 12973 also provides for important improvements in the title XX planning process. These include recommendations made by the President as part of his urban policy initiative. It will involve greater cooperation between States and local officials and enable States to do longer range planning under the title XX social services program. The bill also contains a 1-year extension of a number of temporary provisions related to day care which expire on September 30.

H.R. 12973 will also provide States with greater flexibility in the use of title XX funds. It will allow States to use title XX funds for emergency shelter for adults who are in need of protective services as is now allowed in the case of children in danger of abuse or neglect. It also makes permanent certain temporary provisions of law which provide States greater flexibility in serving drug addicts and alcoholics.

The bill provides a separate title XX authorization for oscial services in Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands, and the Northern Marianas.

The following is a more extensive explanation of the provisions of H.R. 12973:

Section 2 raises the statutory ceiling on Federal title XX funds for fiscal 1979, the permanent ceiling would be increased to $2.7 billion plus an additional amount, not to exceed $200 million, that is to be used by States for day care services as provided under section 5 of this bill. The ceiling would be further increased to $3.15 billion in fiscal year 1980 and $3.45 billion in fiscal year 1981. The $200 million of nonmatched Federal funds for day care services would be in effect only through fiscal 1979. The following table shows estimated increases in State allocations under this bill for fiscal 1979:

TITLE XX SERVICES: ESTIMATES INCREASES IN STATE ALLOCATIONS UNDER H.R. 12973 (FISCAL YEAR 1979)

| | Full allocation if current $2.5 billion ceiling remained in effect[1] | H.R. 12973 full allocation of $2.9 billion | Amount of allocation earmarked for child care |
|---|---|---|---|

These increases are essential to maintain the current level of social services provided under title XX and to allow for some expansion of certain essential services. Even with the temporary $200 million increase which has been in effect since October 1, 1976, because of inflation, title XX funds can only purchase three-fourths of what they bought in 1972 when the $2.5 billion in Federal funds was established. A number of States which have been at their ceiling for several years have been compelled to cut back important services. Some States have responded to the limited funding by lowering the income level which families must meet in order to be eligible for services, thereby reducing the eligible population.

It is intended that increases in Federal title XX funds provided by this bill go toward service expansion or offsetting cost increases resulting from inflation after fiscal 1978; and that States will not reduce non-Federal expenditures that could currently be used as a match to claim Federal title XX dollars as a result of the additional funds provided by this legislation. Such action by a State would defeat the purpose of this legislation, which is to assist States in maintaining current levels of services during a period of inflation and also to expand needed social services.

Under current law title XX requires that a State publish a proposed comprehensive annual services plan at least 90 days prior to the beginning of the services program year and receive comments on the proposed annual plan for at least 45 days. Section 3 requires States to give public notice of intent to consult with local elected officials and provide them the opportunity to present their views prior to publication of the proposed title XX plan. The principal views of the local officials are to be summarized in the proposed title XX plan. This provision was included in the President's urban policy initiative.

Section 4 provides the option for a State to establish a title XX program period for 2 years, rather than just 1 year as under current law. If a State opts for a 2-year program plan, it must provide a 45-day period prior to the beginning of the second year of the program period during which the State will receive comments on its title XX plan. Current law requires annual publication of a proposed title XX plan 90 days prior to the beginning of the services program year; receipt of comments on the proposed plan for at least 45 days, and publication of a final title XX plan prior to the beginning of the program year. The purpose of this modification in the title XX planning process is to enable a State to engage in longer term planning for social services, but at the same time allowing for annual comments on the State program from affected and interested parties.

Section 5 provides that in fiscal year 1979, in addition to the $2.7 billion provided under the ceiling, an additional $200 million in Federal funds would be available, with no matching requirement, to be used for child day care services as provided in Public Law 94-401. To qualify for this funding, States must spend for day care under title XX an amount equal to their share of $200 million.

This section also extends for another year, through September 30, 1979, other provisions of Public Law 94-401 relating to child day care services. These provisions include: First, grants to hire welfare recipients for child care services; second, the delay in implementation of certain Federal child care standards; third, modification in standards for family day care homes; and fourth, tax credits for hiring welfare recipients to provide child care services.

Included in the legislation which established the title XX social services program was a requirement that the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare submit a report with recommendations on the appropriateness of the Federal interagency day care requirements (FIDCR). On July 11, Secretary Califano submitted the appropriateness report to the Congress. I include at this point in the RECORD, the letter from Secretary Califano to the Speaker transmitting the report to the Congress:

THE SECRETARY OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE,
Washington, D.C., July 11, 1978.

HON. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, JR.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have the honor to transmit herewith the Report on the Appropriateness of the Federal Interagency Day Care Requirements (FIDCR), pursuant to the provisions of the Social Services Amendments of 1974 (Public Law 93-647).

Support of child care arrangements for working parents and for other parents in need of day care for their children is one of the many important activities carried out by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. HEW-supported day care is important because it affects the care of millions of youngsters in the critical formative years of their lives.

The regulation of day care is one of the more controversial aspects of HEW administrative responsibilities. The FIDCR impose Federal regulations on certain federally funded day care programs, thus raising classic issues of the proper uses of regulatory power and the proper relationship of the Federal Government to States and municipalities. The quality of day care varies enormously across regional lines and across economic strata. Day care is fraught with subjective judgments about what is best for the child. In addition, day care has not been a target of major academic research until recent years and the amount of knowledge on the subject is still comparatively small. This report explores those issues and relationships, and proposes directions that revised Federal regulations might take.

The process of revising the FIDCR has already begun in this Department. That process, as described in this report, will involve widespread involvement of Congress, the day care community, and the public. This report pulls together and systematically investigates available material on day care. The report lays the groundwork for public discussion of the difficult choices in this area and of the trade offs that inevitably accompany those choices. The report should facilitate decisionmaking as the FIDCR revision process goes forward.

A major deficiency in the development of the original FIDCR in 1968 was the lack of public involvement. This Department intends to avoid that pitfall in the revision of the FIDCR, and to produce regulations that result from, and are worthy of, public support. This report should make that process better informed and more effective.

Department staff working on this report have attempted to respond positively to criticism and suggestions from the professional community and from the public. Congress generously and wisely granted a statutory extension of the deadline for this report, thereby greatly enhancing the quality of the report by giving the staff more time to assimilate and include preliminary data from the National Day Care Study and by enabling the Department to hold public panel meetings around the Nation on a draft of the report and to respond to public concerns.

Clearly written new Federal regulations that enjoy broad public support can go far in bettering the conditions of day care for millions of children in this country, while dealing intelligently with the legitimate concerns of providers and other levels of government. I look forward to working with the Congress, with day care providers, administrators, and consumers, and with the public during the FIDCR revision process.

JOSEPH A. CALIFANO, Jr.

WASHINGTON, D.C., June 1978.

On July 12, the Department of HEW issued a press release which discussed some of the findings of the FIDCR appropriateness report. It also included a description of the future plans of the Department related to revisions of the FIDCR. The following is an excerpt from the press release:

HEW found that regulation of Federally supported day care is appropriate and suggested that consideration be given to extending the revised requirements to all day care supported with Federal funds. The Department also found that the requirements can be rewritten, based on 10 years of experience, to improve their ability to further the well-being of children.

The report sets forth several considerations which the Department will address in making revisions. They include:

Recent research findings that child development is best promoted in small groups of children and caregivers.

The importance of caregiver training in child-related fields.

The integral role of educational and developmental services in day care.

The need for different standards in different kinds of care: for in-home, family home, group home and center care; for children of different ages; for children with special needs; for different administrative agencies.

The need to clarify roles and responsibilities of providers of care, and state and local administrators.

The importance of ongoing communications between parents and providers.

Federal support for States in implementing the revised requirements.

The report cautions that enforcement of more stringent day care requirements could increase costs to providers and purchasers of day care services. HEW plans to evaluate costs and benefits of the revised requirements.

Secretary Califano announced on April 26 that HEW intends to revise the FIDCR after extended consultation with individuals and organizations involved in day care services, including those who provide, license or use such services.

After drafting proposed revisions, the Department will seek extensive public participation in the development of a final set of revised regulations. Plans include the following:

A public forum in every state.

Publication of a Notice of Proposed Rulemaking (NPRM) in the Federal Register.

Nationwide dissemination of the NPRM through mailings and through placement in publications of organizations concerned with day care.

Public hearings after publication of the NPRM.

Field briefings of representatives of the day care community about the proposed regulations.

A preliminary draft of the Department report was reviewed at public hearings in Washington, D.C., Dallas, and Seattle earlier this year. The final report incorporates many of the comments made at those hearings.

Section 5 makes permanent certain temporary provisions of law which expire on September 30, 1978, related to the use of title XX funds for services to alcoholics and drug addicts.

Section 6 allows title XX funds to be used for the payment of emergency shelter, for not in excess of 30 days in any 6-month period, provided as a protective service to an adult in danger of physical, mental injury, neglect, maltreatment, or exploitation.

Under the present title XX program, funds may be used to provide emergency shelter for a child, but not an adult. This would provide additional flexibility to States in the use of title XX funds to enable them to meet the needs of adults for emergency shelter as a protective service in accordance with State determined needs.

Section 7 establishes a separate $16.1 million social services entitlement program within the Federal title XX ceiling for offshore areas in the following amounts:

| | Million |
|---|---|
| Puerto Rico | $15.0 |
| Guam | 0.5 |
| Virgin Islands | 0.5 |
| Northern Marianas | 0.1 |

These amounts would be increased by the same ratio as the Federal statutory ceiling is increased beyond the fiscal 1979 funding level.

Under the title XX social services program, Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands receive an allotment for social services only from amounts that the States and the District of Columbia certify, after the beginning of the program year, they will not need from the formula allotments for that year. Such an allotment cannot exceed $15 million for Puerto Rico and $500,000 each for Guam and the Virgin Islands. The actual amount available to the territories is not known until approximately 3 months after the beginning of the fiscal year. The uncertainty of this procedure has seriously hindered the efforts of these areas to effectively plan their social services activities.

I want to commend Representatives DON FRASER and MARTHA KEYS for their leadership in initiating the legislation to provide for the increase in the title XX ceiling. The provisions of that legislation are now incorporated into H.R. 12973. On February 8, Representatives FRASER and KEYS introduced H.R. 10833 to provide for increasing the title XX entitlement ceiling over the next 3 years until it would reach $3.45 billion beginning in fiscal year 1981. They then urged Members of the House to join them in cosponsoring legislation to provide for such increases and has resulted in over 130 Members of the House cosponsoring legislation identical to H.R. 10833.

Mr. Speaker, I urge passage of this important legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Kansas (Ms. KEYS).

Ms. KEYS. Mr. Speaker, title XX of the Social Security Act provides block grants to States on a 75/25 match basis for social service programs. The grants enable States to determine their unique needs and spending priorities and then structure their social service programs to meet those needs.

In 1972, the Congress imposed a $2.5 billion ceiling on this program. In the 6 years since the establishment of the ceiling, the value of that $2.5 billion has shrunk to $1.7 billion.

The legislation before us would provide for a modest increase in the ceiling over the next 3 years. This gradual increase will offer some small portion of relief from the past effects of the ceiling and it will permit States to adopt longer range plans for their social service programs. The bill provides for an increase of $200 million in 1979, $250 million in 1980, and $300 million in 1981. The first year's increase has already been approved by both the House and Senate as part of the 1978 budget resolution.

I joined my colleague, Mr. FRASER, in sponsoring this legislation because of the severe impact which the 1972 ceiling is having upon 1978 programs for children, the elderly and the handicapped. My own State of Kansas is a typical example of the cuts in services which have occurred as a result of the outdated ceiling. Last year programs in my State faced nearly a 50-percent reduction in services as a result of inflationary pressures. Around the country costs at the administrative level are increasing leaving fewer dollars for direct services. At the same time, both the cost of and the demand for direct services is on the rise.

Long waiting lists for title XX programs are indicative of the many needs which are going unmet. In Kansas, nearly 1,000 elderly are awaiting homemaker services, 335 handicapped are in need of residential services and 113 handicapped children are waiting for day care openings.

Kansas is not the only State which finds itself in this position. Forty-eight States have now reached their ceiling. Congressman FRASER and I have polled the States and 46 of them have written to us saying that the cap has forced them to cut back on services and to limit eligibility. According to HEW, 14 States have already reduced their eligible population.

Further reductions have occurred in many States as a result of shifts in population. Between 1977 and 1978, 24 States suffered such a reduction. In the last several years, we have been shifting the same inadequate pot of money between the 50 States—with some winners and many more losers.

I was pleased when my colleague, Senator DOLE, introduced this bill with 11 other Senators. The legislation has become a bipartisan effort to respond to the genuine needs of the elderly, children, and the handicapped.

The bill has been endorsed by 24 organizations—

Children's Defense Fund.

Child Welfare League.

Society for Crippled Children and Adults.

AFL–CIO.

National Association for Retarded Citizens.
Family Service Association of America.
National Association of Social Workers.
American Public Welfare Association.
National Association of Counties.
American Association of Retired Persons.
Urban Elderly Coalition.
United Way of America.
National Association of State Mental Retardation Program Directors.
National Governor's Association.
American Parents' Committee.
Catholic Charities.
National Council of Senior Citizens.
National Council on Aging.
Goodwill Industries.
League of Women Voters.
Easter Seal Society.
Epilepsy Foundation.
National Council of State Legislatures.
U.S. Conference of Mayors.

The legislation also provides for a number of changes which strengthen the title XX program. The bill—

Requires State officials to consult with elected city, county, and local officials during the development of the State's comprehensive social services plan;

Allows States to adopt a comprehensive services plan for a 2-year period to coordinate with State budgeting if there is a 45-day public comment period each year;

Extends for 1 year the Public Law 94–401 provisions which target $200 million for day care on a nonmatching basis;

Makes permanent the present temporary provisions allowing States to use title XX funds for certain services to alcoholics and drug addicts;

Allows States to use title XX funds to provide up to 30 days of emergency shelter for adults;

Establishes an entitlement of $16.1 million for social services in the territories.

Many States have accepted the responsibility of providing for social services and aiding in the efforts to meet inflation. We fully expect the States to maintain their efforts in these areas. The funds in this bill are not to be used by the States to replace funds already being spent, but must be used to expand current services and offset new inflation.

Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleagues will support this increase in the title XX cap. Without such a measure we will surely see more elderly denied homemaker services, children denied day care, mentally retarded turned away from sheltered workshops and abused children without protective services. This legislation will help us fulfill our commitments to children, the elderly and the handicapped—all those most in need of assistance.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, although this bill was reported from committee by a voice vote, it is not an insignificant bill, and it should be considered very carefully by the House. I think those of us who were here in 1972 recall the reasons why it was necessary to put a lid on the expenditures for social services. That particular part of the welfare law, the title XX part, is subject to 75 percent Federal matching. Cash welfare is subject generally to about 50 percent Federal matching.

Some very distinguished Governors, including Ronald Reagan, the former leader of the chairman of the subcommittee, discovered that by converting cash welfare into social services they could get considerably greater matching funds. Other Governors, including my former leader from New York, Nelson Rockefeller, discovered eventually that emulating Governor Reagan would also ease some of the welfare budget of their States. The result was that there was a sudden rush for this 75 percent money, and it became necessary for the Congress to put a ceiling on the amount of Federal money which could be expanded for social services. This was done in 1972. The ceiling was placed at $2½ billion, substantially below the requests for that particular year.

There has been some stabilizing in social services since that time, but in October 1976 we started giving an additional $200 million for day care as a social service that we felt at that time and in that environment required some special available funds.

The result of all this, Mr. Speaker, is that we have had a very restricting limit on the amount of money available for social services for some time, and this bill represents a modest beginning of, in effect, cost-of-living increases on the very expensive part of the States' budgets. I think it is a reasonable adjustment. I think it is due at this time since we have had a very rigid lid on social services for some time.

I urge the enactment of the measure.

I would like now to yield to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. GRADISON), who is a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 12973 was reported to the House by a voice vote in the Ways and Means Committee. However, this strong consensus should not be regarded as an indication of insignificance; to the contrary, this measure would make some important changes in the program of grants to the States for social services.

The changes embodied in H.R. 12973 include the following:

First. An increase in the ceiling for Federal title XX funds to a total of $2.9 billion in fiscal year 1979, $3.15 billion in the development of a State's comprefiscal year 1981;

Second. A requirement that State officials consult with local elected officials in the developmentof a State's comprehensive social services plan;

Third. Authority for States to adopt a 2-year planning cycle for the title XX service plans rather than the current 1-year time frame;

Fourth. A 1-year extension of certain temporary provisions which target $200 million of title XX funds for day care services on a nonmatching basis, provide grants and tax credits to encourage the hiring of welfare recipients for child care services, and delay the implementation of certain Federal child care standards;

Fifth. Permanent rather than the current temporary authority for States to use title XX funds for certain services to alcoholics and drug addicts;

Sixth. Allowance for States to use title XX funds to provide up to 30 days of emergency shelter for adults;

Seventh. Establishment of a separate entitlement authorization of funds, within the overall title XX ceiling, for social service programs in Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands, and the Northern Marianas.

The committee believes that each of these changes will assist States to make social services programs more effective in fulfilling the important goal which these grants serve. Of the proposed changes, perhaps the most noteworthy is the increase in the permanent funding ceiling, which since 1972 has been fixed at $2.5 billion. The need for this arises from the fact that in spite of a temporary additional $200 million entitlement for day care that has been in effect since October 1, 1976, inflation has taken a considerable toll upon social service programs in the States that have been at their ceilings. Confronted with a fiscal pinch, 14 States, according to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, have decreased the maximum eligibility level for services since fiscal year 1976. Ninety-two percent of the States are now charging fees for designated services provided to families with incomes below 80 percent of the States median family income level.

The committee expects the increased funds in this bill to be used by States to offset inflationary cost increases or to meet expanded or changing service needs.

It should also be remembered that these social service programs are developed in a publicized, open planning process that is founded upon the concept of public participation. One of the real strengths of this program is its reliance upon a State and local planning process rather than upon directives from Washington. We believe that the changes proposed here will increase the responsiveness of social service plans to local needs and interests.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of this legislation by the House of Representatives.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN).

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CONABLE) for yielding me this time.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I think it is highly unfortunate that this legislation is being brought up today under the suspension of the rules procedure—and that comment does not necessarily go to the merits of the legislation—undoubtedly it can only be fully comprehended by the expert members of the Committee on Ways and Means. However the magnitude of this legislation compels me to say that I think that the leadership of the House should be severely criticized for continuing what has now become a parliamentary trend over the last 2 years.

If the Legislative Digest that is published by the House Republican Conference headed by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. JOHN ANDERSON, is correct, this bill increases the permanent ceiling for funding of title XX to roughly $9 billion over the fiscal years between now and including fiscal year 1981, assuming that all of the money authorized would be spent by the Federal and State Governments involved. It is also estimated by the Congressional Budget Office, that this bill will add to the title XX costs, in addition to the present authorizations, in excess of $3 billion.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that despite the fact that this bill is brought to us from the committee by a voice vote, without any significant opposition, that its consideration under suspension of the rules is part of a larger trend that is definitely harming the ability of those Members who may wish to make responsible changes in legislation on the House floor. For instance, during this year we have seen the Comprehensive Rehabilitation Services Amendments of 1978 brought before this House under suspension of the rules containing at least a $7 billion expenditure. We have seen the Comprehensive Older Americans Act amendments authorizing more than $4 billion taken up under suspension of the rules.

We have seen an attempt by the leadership to bring before us an increase in Federal assistance for college tuition payments in a manner that would have prevented the offering of amendments by those Members of the House who wished to either expand or redirect the tuition credit program. That was prevented because a majority of the Members were aware of what was happening and voted down the ordering of the second on that suspension.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I am indebted to a minority member of the staff for calling my attention to an article by Elizabeth Drew that appeared in the New Yorker Magazine detailing the abuses of the suspension system in the present Congress.

Until only a few years ago Congress only considered suspensions twice a month on the first and third Mondays. Then Tuesdays were added and recently the number of suspension days were increased to Monday and Tuesday of every week. Then the rules were changed again to allow votes on suspensions to be postponed until the end of all the suspensions in order to accommodate the late arriving Members from the hinterland, who were not here at the time the votes were originally requested. This gives late arriving Members the opportunity to vote on all of the suspensions in the late afternoon, even though they have heard none of the debate. And now here we are, discussing a bill of this magnitude with exactly 29 Members on the floor of the House, although there may be now 30 or 32 Members who are now present since I rose to speak.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONABLE. I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN).

Mr. BAUMAN. I thank the gentleman for the additional time.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Speaker says that the suspension calendar should be used on only noncontroversial, nonexpensive legislation. Other leaders on both sides of the aisle have spoken of the necessity to treat legislation in a more serious manner. The fact that notwithstanding that this bill may pass later today by a wide margin, I still think we owe it to our constituencies to discontinue the serious abuse of the suspension procedure.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAUMAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONABLE. I thank the gentleman for yielding. Since I am extensively described in Miss Drew's article, I certainly do not quarrel with the gentleman when the gentleman says that the growth of the suspension process may be an abuse, and I agree also with the gentleman's statement that this is a significant bill and requires serious consideration by the House. I, however, do wish to take some issue with the figures the gentleman mentioned about the magnitude of the increase that is involved, and I am not familiar with the comments of the Republican conference report on it.

The entitlement increase, actually the net cost of which would be somewhat less than the ceiling figure, is $200 million for 1979, $650 million for 1980, $950 million for 1981, $950 million for 1982, and $950 million for 1983. In other words, I suspect what the gentleman is talking about when he is talking about a $10 billion additional cost is he is adding the total entitlements for the next 3 years, which, however, in the past have been $2,500,000,000 and, therefore, would be in any event $7.5 billion for those 3 years.

Mr. BAUMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is referring to the increases in the permanent ceiling for title XX funding, which, according to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. ANDERSON'S legislative digest—and perhaps the gentleman would like to discuss that with him—is in excess of $9 billion in permanent ceiling, and the CBO estimate of the actual increased costs of the legislation before us, which is in excess of $3 billion.

Mr. CONABLE. Yes. It is the CBO cost estimate I am referring to, and I believe, unless I am incorrect, that the increments are as I have stated them.

Will the gentleman agree, however, that this is significant legislation and should be very seriously considered?

Mr. BAUMAN. In any case, the gentleman's comments, I think, have not in any way detracted from my concern that legislation of this magnitude and importance be treated in somewhat less cavalier fashion than the Suspension Calendar permits. I believe this kind of legislative abuse should stop and fully one-fourth of all House legislative activity now is down under suspension of the rules.

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York (Mr. RICHMOND).

Mr. RICHMOND. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 12973, a measure which will provide a 3-year increase in the ceiling of title XX of the Social Security Act and provide funding for social services at the State and local levels.

The present title XX ceiling was established in 1972 and has not been increased, except for $200 million earmarked for day care in 1976. Because of continuing inflation, the $2.5 billion provided in 1972 is now worth $1.7 billion in 1978 dollars.

In the State of New York, the ceiling has been exceeded every year since 1973. These excess expenditures were made out of State and county funds so that the erosion caused by inflation would not cut to the bone the vital programs serving the poor, the elderly, the mentally retarded, the abused and neglected children.

However, despite these expenditures of strictly State and local funds, it has been necessary for New York to reduce all essential social services to some extent. For example:

Day care was virtually eliminated for persons enrolled in non-WIN training programs throughout much of the State.

Homemaker/housekeeper services have been curtailed.

Preventive services, too, were curtailed.

In New York, the ceiling on title XX, coupled with the State and local fiscal crisis, has resulted in social services planning focused too much on cost-containment and reduction of services, instead of realistic planning for the provision of innovation and essential services.

For my State, the increase in the title XX ceiling we are considering today will mean an additional $63.75 million dollars over the 3-year period of the bill: $17 million in fiscal year 1979; $21.25 million in fiscal year 1980; and $25.5 million in fiscal year 1981.

This bill provides significant increases for all other States and territories for critically important social services programs such as: child care; health services for alcoholics and drug addicts; emergency shelter for adults; homemaker chore services; and transportation and training for the handicapped.

I urge my colleagues to support this measure and vote overwhelmingly for its passage.

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BRODHEAD).

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my strong support for the bill H.R. 12973, the Social Services Amendments of 1978. Some States, including the State of Michigan, have reached their Federal spending ceiling for title XX. It is imperative that the ceiling be raised so that services to those with a greater need are not reduced.

The increases provided by this bill are essential for the States if they are to maintain an effective program of services under their title XX program for low-income people. The ceiling on title XX funds was increased temporarily from its $2.5 billion level to $2.7 billion, but the effects of inflation have meant that even at the temporary $2.7 billion level, States can only purchase three-fourths of what they could purchase in 1972 when the program was implemented. Several States have been required to cut back their services or reduce their eligible population because of insufficient funds. It is intended that the increases provided by this legislation will go toward the expansion of services or offsetting cost increases resulting from inflation.

Some of the services offered under title XX include:

First. Day care for children: This program would receive $200 million in Federal funds to encourage continued expansion of day care services in the States.

Second. Emergency shelter: This program is to aid persons who have been physically or mentally abused. It also would assist in reuniting broken families.

Third. Services for the elderly: Many services are offered to the elderly including hot meals, counseling, senior citizen centers and many others. Without these services, many senior citizens may find it very difficult to live independently which may result in their being admitted to institutions which would be very costly to their families or to the Government.

This bill would also provide the States with the option of establishing a 2-year title XX program period rather than just 1 year. This would enable States to plan longer-term social service programs.

I would like to congratulate my colleagues Mr. FRASER and Ms. KEYS for introducing this bill. It is my hope that the House of Representatives will pass this much-needed bill by a large vote.

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO).

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 12973. One of the first problems I encountered as a freshman Congressman in 1977, was a myriad of social service programs in my district which were severely limited by the 1972 ceiling, and while properly imposed, in 1972 under title XX, it does not address current needs.

I am pleased to note that the gentlewoman from Kansas (Ms. KEYS) and the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER) introduced a bill, which I have cosponsored, that the chairman and members of the Committee on Ways and Means have had the good judgment to act upon, and we have this legislation before us today, to provide a response to the severe inflation problems and special needs that title XX is designed to meet. This innovative program does provide services not just to welfare recipients and those receiving social services, but also to those who fall within the income guidelines that are outlined in the initial law. This provides important services in Minnesota and throughout the country.

I hope that we can maintain this flexibility that has been a hallmark of title XX. If there is any doubt, I remind my colleagues that the States and political subdivisions that have had these title XX programs in effect, have undergone a reordering of their priorities, with an introspective look at the nature of the programs and services that they are funding and endeavored to leverage the most benefit for consumers and clients in these jurisdictions as was possible. I hail the optional 2-year program plan that has been proposed here as a good measure, and the local participation, and especially the increase in funding as necessary and justified.

This legislation increases the ceiling on Federal title XX funds and will be a great benefit to my State of Minnesota and my district. The current $2 5 billion ceiling combined with the inflation has been a continuing problem in Minnesota. These two factors have resulted in many problems which remain unresolved even though we have the ability and the willingness to solve them.

In May of 1977 I testified before the Subcommittee on Public Assistance and Unemployment Compensation in favor of this legislation. At that time I described the problems facing Ramsey County. The situation has not improved since that time. Minnesota received $46.35 million in title XX funds last year. We have been at this level of funding since 1973. As with many other States, Minnesota moved quickly to implement title XX programs. As a consequence we have not been able to rely on expanded Federal support to achieve increases in programs. Indeed, the $2.5 billion ceiling has resulted in considerable reduction in programs from previous levels.

Local effort in the form of property taxes has been increased to support social service programs in Ramsey County. It is doubtful that this local support can be increased any further. The State has increased its funding commitments to general relief and indigent assistance.

Without the increase in the ceiling Ramsey County will be forced to eliminate many social service programs. Passage of H.R. 12973 will insure the continuance of many excellent programs such as day care services, senior citizens activity centers, community services for the mentally and physically handicapped, homemaker services and protective services.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation. Title XX is a successful program in our area, and I hope that this success is replicated and perpetuated in other jurisdiction. With the new authorization and commitment that is included in this measure today, the needs of many low income people can be effectively addressed.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN).

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 12973, the Social Services Amendments of 1978. This bill will raise the Federal ceiling on social services funded under title XX of the Social Security Act and make some technical changes in program operations under title XX.

The principal feature of the bill is that it increases the statutory ceiling on Federal title XX funds. For fiscal 1979, the permanent ceiling will be raised to $2.9 billion, including $200 million to be used by the States for day care services. The measure further provides that the ceiling will be increased to $3.15 billion for fiscal 1980 and to $3.45 billion for fiscal 1981.

These are the same increases provided in a bill which I cosponsored, H.R. 11238. This, incidentally, was the first bill I cosponsored when I became a Member of Congress.

In May, I conducted a senior citizens' workshop for residents of the 18th Congressional District in New York City. At this workshop I received testimony from representatives of senior citizens' organizations and groups actively involved in social services concerning legislation and other action at the Federal level that would improve the quality of life for our senior citizens. I was impressed that so many of those testifying emphasized the importance of raising the ceiling on Federal funding for title XX.

Title XX of the Social Security Act provides block grants of funding from the Federal Government to the States at a 75/25 matching rate. It is a general revenue sharing type program that enables the States to determine their own needs and to structure their social service programs accordingly.

The general emphasis of these programs has been to improve the self-sufficiency of low-income people. Among the services States have provided with title XX funding are: child day care services; counseling, education and training services aimed at increasing employment of welfare recipients; senior citizen activity centers; homemaker services to enable senior citizens to remain in their own residences; community services for the mentally and physically handicapped; protective services; and family planning services.

Those who spoke at the senior citizens' workshop in the 18th Congressional District pointed out the vital services that are provided at the local level for senior citizens with title XX funding. They noted the impact of inflation on these programs and the urgent need to increase the Federal title XX contribution to meet rising costs and to sustain current services. In this regard, their comments were underscored by the Ways and Means Committee's report to accompany H.R. 12973, which noted that title XX funds today can only purchase three-fourths of what they bought in 1972 when the $2.5 billion ceiling on Federal funds was established.

Title XX Federal expenditures for the State of New York under the $2.5 billion ceiling are estimated to be $212.5 million for fiscal year 1978. With the cap in place, New York State's allocations for fiscal year 1979 would be $210.6 million. With the ceiling raised from $2.5 billion to $2.9 billion in fiscal 1979, New York State's allocation would rise to $244.4 million. In addition, the ceiling increases provided in H.R. 12973 will allow New York to receive $49 million more in fiscal 1980 and $71 million extra in fiscal 1981. These increases should help to restore some of the purchasing power which social services programs have lost in New York as a result of rising costs hitting the current title XX ceiling.

Under the title XX ceiling now in effect, States like New York are finding that they must cut back essential senior-citizen and social services programs. The hardships imposed by such reductions have led an impressive array of national organizations to support legislation to raise the ceiling on title XX Federal expenditures. Among these groups are: American Association of Retired Persons, American Parents' Committee, Catholic Charities, Child Welfare League of America, Easter Seal Society, Epilepsy Foundation, Goodwill Industries, Family Service Association of America, League of Women Voters, National Association of Retarded Citizens, Society for Crippled Children, Urban Elderly Coalition, and the United Way of America.

The legislation before us today is unlikely to fund a host of new social services programs. However, it will enable many successful locally oriented programs for senior citizens and lower income citizens to continue their valuable contributions to improving the quality of life in this country.

I urge my colleagues to allow these efforts to move forward by voting in favor of H.R. 12973, the Social Services Amendments of 1978.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. FORD).

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, there should be absolutely no opposition to the passage of the Social Services Amendments of 1978. As the Representative of an urban district where there is a significant poverty population and as a cosponsor of this legislation, I feel it is essential that the Members vote to increase the ceiling on title XX funds. The present fund ceiling has caused many problems nationwide. In Tennessee, for example, social service contracts had to be cut 20–30 percent last year, not even allowing any allocation for cost-of-living increases in any respect whatsoever.

This has severely hurt these federally funded programs and has affected the level of service delivery. Unless Tennessee and other States can get an increase in title XX money, services will be cut even more during a period when expansion is needed as well as the initiation of new services. As responsible legislators, we cannot allow such a stalemate to persist in this country.

I urge passage also because title XX dollars have been used to employ a large number of AFDC mothers to work at day care centers. This employment has been beneficial in several respects including the obvious one of putting able-bodied human beings to work, and also the not so obvious one of upgrading the standards in day care centers. Title XX Federal regulations require that day care centers meet specific staff-child ratio standards, and certainly the employment of AFDC mothers is a realistic means in helping to meet these standards. Of the AFDC mothers in the State of Tennessee employed with title XX funds, 50 percent come from my district.

One also must consider the need for a continuation of vendor day care programs which have been cut back as of July 1 because of the uncertain future of this legislation. These centers must be restored to operation immediately and the only way this can be done is through the passage of the social services amendments.

The 1978 amendments give a positive and economic approach to program planning. The provision which allows States to adopt a comprehensive title XX social services plan for a 2-year period would save time and dollars. Needs accessments, program priorities, and other planning factors do not change to any great extent every year. This makes the annual plan an exercise which could easily be readapted into a 2- or even 3-year planning period.

And, finally, I urge my colleagues to pass this legislation because of the many other human needs programs title XX dollars fund and address. Some of these programs, which were started in Tennessee such as the emergency shelter program, would not continue to exist if the ceiling is not increased.

I strongly ask you to vote favorably on the Social Services Amendments of 1978.

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California (Mr. MILLER).

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I take the well today to congratulate the Committee on Ways and Means for reporting out this legislation. I specifically want to call attention to one aspect of the bill that I think is a very important step in terms of our Government's efforts to stem the tide against child abuse and spouse abuse in this country, and that is in connection with section 6, which would allow the title XX funds to be used to provide emergency shelter for adults.

I think it is important to remember that what has happened in the past is that when trauma and crisis has struck a family in terms of child abuse or in those cases where the abuse has been rained both upon the child and upon the spouse, because of the existing law, we took the child to one shelter and we forced the adult to either stay home or to be with friends because title XX would not allow shelter in that situation to be funded.

Under the provision of this law, if it is adopted, we can be sure that the mother and child or the father and child will stay together, and for the first time we can use the Federal Government to reduce the trauma surrounding the crisis in a family that comes about as a result of abuse rather than to increase the trauma suffered by the child or by the family.

The many thousands of women who are victimized every year by their spouses will for the first time have the ability to know that they can seek shelter, they can bring their children with them, and they can hold on to what little is left of the integrated family.

I think this is an important step forward, and I certainly want to commend the gentlewoman from Kansas (Ms. KEYS) for the leadership she has shown, as well as the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. GRADISON) and the gentleman from California (Mr. CORMAN) in this effort. This has been a discriminatory policy that has existed far too long in the law, and hopefully it will be rectified with the passage of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, again I say that I think for the first time this shows an element of humaneness in our policy toward the family in this country.

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York (Mr. CONABLE) gave us some interesting history of this program which was most accurate. But there is one other bit of information that I thought my colleagues might be interested in.

The original $2.5 billion ceiling was suggested in 1972 by then Gov. Jimmy Carter of Georgia and then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, Wilbur Mills. We believe that that ceiling fit the needs of the States in 1972, but it does not fit the national needs in 1978. I urge a yes vote on passage of the bill.

● Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 12973, the Social Services Amendments of 1978. I think it is time that this House lifts the $2.5 billion ceiling on services funded by title XX of the Social Security Act. This ceiling has been in place since 1972 and as well all know, since that time inflation has been eating into the purchasing power of these funds.

In addition, the bill provides for a $15 million entitlement under title XX for Puerto Rico. As many of my colleagues are aware of, Puerto Rico's participation in this program is limited to making use of those funds which are not used by the rest of the States. This has historically limited the availability of these funds to Puerto Rico and in addition has hampered our planning for the use of the available funds since our Department of Social Services is notified too late in the fiscal year in order for them to plan for the maximum and most efficient ways in which to utilize the available funds.

Mr. Speaker, for these reasons I fully support H.R. 12973 and urge my colleagues to vote aye on this piece of legislation.●

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, while a cosponsor of this legislation I rise only in qualified support of the bill. While I certainly applaud its main provision—to lift the 6-year-old ceiling placed on title XX expenditures, I do feel we have missed an important opportunity to make other urgently needed reforms in the program which would make it more responsive to those in the population it was designed to serve.

My main concern is the failure of title XX to fully serve the needs of the elderly of this Nation. On October 27, 1977 the Subcommittee on Human Services of the House Select Committee on Aging conducted an oversight hearing on title XX to determine its effectiveness in serving the elderly. As chairman of the subcommittee I authorized a study be conducted among the social service directors of the 10 largest States and other selected communities. A total of 24 responses were received to the question: How effectively does title XX bring services to the elderly? Of those responding, 63 percent were critical of XX citing mediocre service delivery, insufficient data collection and insufficient funding levels.

I am pleased that we have addressed the most commonly cited shortcoming of the program—the $2.5 billion ceiling. The failure to have this ceiling be adjusted simply to accommodate 6 years of inflation, not even increased service demand, was quite serious. The National Association of Counties stated that the $2.5 billion provided in 1972 is now worth only $1.7 billion in 1978 dollars. They add "this decrease in real dollars coupled with increasing caseloads has forced counties to eliminate services."

Under H.R. 12973, title XX funds would increase by $200 million in fiscal year 1979, $250 million in fiscal year 1980 and by $300 million in fiscal year 1981. This increase is welcome in many of the larger States like New York who have traditionally spent all their allotted Federal title XX funds and have provided additional services with their own funds.

This legislation will provide important relief to hard pressed localities in California. My Subcommittee on Human Services recently conducted 2 days of hearings in California to measure the impact of proposition 13 on services to the elderly. We were especially concerned about the impact of proposition 13 on State and local governments' abilities to provide the necessary matching funds for some 215 Federal programs. One program which was mentioned quite often was the title XX program which California has been "overmatching" for a number of years to compensate for the lack of increase in Federal funds. Facing reductions in State revenues of some $8 billion by the next fiscal year, this legislation will help cushion some of the blow.

For my home State of New York which has actively participated in title XX, H.R. 12973 will mean at least $27 million in new funds to provide a myriad of services to the needy of the State. New York like a number of other States has traditionally spent its full amount of XX funds. I had hoped to have been able to amend this legislation to provide a mechanism by which those States which did not fully expend their title XX allotment would return their money so it could be distributed to those States which spent their limit.

However even the funding increase in the title XX program does not eliminate all the problems which the elderly have confronted in terms of acquiring benefits and services. As long as the elderly are not defined as a specific target population they will continue to be underserved by the program. Presently the target groups are broadly defined as children and adults without any real specification about what constitutes an adult. As a result it is far too difficult to determine what percentage of XX funds go to the elderly. A combination of a more specific definition of service target groups and accurate data on moneys provided are essential for the integrity of this program.

We are aware of the strong interest which the elderly have in title XX. It is a good program which does provide valuable services to the aged including home-delivered meals—homemaker services and protective services. Yet more is needed as Nelson Cruikshank, Chairman of the Federal Council on Aging recommended at my subcommittee hearing of September 27:

> Basic social services should be available to the frail elderly as an entitlement without any means test.

We are taking an important step today but by far it is not the ultimate in improving the title XX program. I have concentrated on the elderly being underserved, other groups are as well. Title XX in 1973 was hailed as an innovation in social services delivery. Let us hope what we do in 1978 and beyond will continue to make this program better for the elderly and all those it was intended to serve.●

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to join in support of raising the ceiling on Federal title XX funds, allowing States to restore many of the necessary and crucial social service programs such as child day care services; homemaker services, counseling, education and training services, senior citizen activity centers and community services for the mentally and physically handicapped, which have been cut back as a result of the effects of inflation and the present ceiling. The unfortunate results of the ceiling have included a cutback in available services, lowering the eligibility income limit so as to reduce the number of recipients, and an increase in fees for social services. As is the case in so many Federal programs, the people most in need of a particular services are being priced out of the market for such services. Those individuals cannot afford to pay more for social services, and those served—the elderly, handicapped and mothers and children—cannot and must not go unserved.

By raising the ceiling on title XX funds by $200 million in fiscal year 1979, $250 million in fiscal 1980 and $300 million in fiscal year 1981, the social service programs will be more responsive to the needs of those citizens who are most in need of these social services.

Governor Carey of New York has stated that unless the ceiling on title XX were lifted, many of our State's disadvantaged would be forced to remain unserved. He states:

> In many areas of the State, services have been reduced to a minimum, because of State and local fiscal problems. Even with these reductions, the continuing decline in both the allocation available to New York and in the value of the service dollar is adversely impacting our ability to provide even basic services.

Many States in our Nation are facing similar problems in the area of social services. Each State will benefit from the raised ceiling. The original legislation which proposed to raise the ceiling on title XX funds had 129 cosponsors, indicating its wide support among Members of the House.

Such significant groups as the National Association for Retarded Citizens, the National Association of Retired Persons, Catholic Charities, the Epilepsy Foundation and the Family Association of America, to name a few, have expressed their desire to see the title XX ceiling raised. Without these necessary funds groups such as these would no longer be able to provide the quality services that they have been providing for so many years.

I urge my colleagues to join with me in supporting this worthy legislation, and in assuring that our underserved receive the services that they so desperately need and deserve.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. CORMAN) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 12973, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. BEARD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 3, rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

INCREASE PENSION FOR CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL OF HONOR RECIPIENTS

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 11889) to amend title 38, United States Code, to increase from $100 to $200 the monthly rate of special pension payable to each person who has been awarded the Medal of Honor.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 11889

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 562(a) of title 38, United States Code, is amended by striking out "$100" and inserting in lieu thereof "$200".

SEC. 2. The amendment made by the first section of this Act shall take effect January 1, 1979.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS).

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to revise and extend my remarks, and that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous matter on H.R. 11889, the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the reported bill would increase the benefits payable to recipients of the Congressional Medal of Honor. The amount payable has not been increased for a number of years. I strongly support the bill and yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Mississippi, chairman of our Subcommittee on Compensation Pension, and Insurance, who will briefly outline the merits of the proposed legislation.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 11889 would increase the special pension benefits payable to holders of the Congressional Medal of Honor. Under current law, the Veterans' Administration pays this special pension to those heroic individuals who have been accorded our country's highest military award.

Our hearings disclosed that many of the receipients of the Congressional Medal of Honor are living on fixed and limited incomes. Some are reported to have incomes at or below the poverty level. Sixty percent of these beneficiaries are now 60 and above. One is 100 years of age.

The current benefit of $100 per month has not been increased for 17 years. The bill before you will provide a payment of $200 monthly to some 269 individuals currently receiving the pension.

The bill would cost about $300,000 during the next fiscal year. The increase is supported by the Administration in its report to us and in testimony at our hearings. In his report to the committee dated March 27, 1978, the Administrator said:

> Although the principal object of decorations is to provide recognition of distinguished service and heroism and the Medal of Honor itself carries this recognition without a cash value being attached, we consider this to be an appropriate time to again add to the amount of this pension, in light of the lengthy period which has elapsed since the previous increase and the general increase in the cost of living in the interim. We do not believe that an increment to the specal pension would diminish the symbolic significance of the Medal of Honor.

The reported bill, if enacted, would not be inflationary and is well within our budgetary allocations.

I am sure my colleagues agree with me that the proposed increase is a reasonable indication of our Nation's gratitude to those who fought so bravely in defense of our country and whose outstanding and distinguished service was recognized with the Congressional Medal of Honor.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11889, a bill that would increase the amount of special pension awarded to recipients of the Congressional Medal of Honor.

Mr. Speaker, of the almost 30 million veterans now living in this country, only 283 hold this most distinguished award—fewer than 1 out of very 100,000 veterans. This statistic alone points to the uniqueness of the award, and the special nature of the valorous acts that have earned it. Americans hold their Medal of Honor winners in awe. These men have performed feats of courage under extraordinary conditions, and are the very symbol of what has made our country strong and great.

It is entirely fitting, in my opinion, that we raise the monthly amount of pension from $100 to $200. The $100 pension became effective in 1961. In 1978 $200 are, sadly, not even the equivalent of $100 in 1961.

Mr. Speaker, our Government doles out hundreds of dollars a month to virtually any person in this country who decides he or she does not want to work. Surely we can reward the sort of extraordinary service that begets the Medal of Honor with the amount contained in H.R. 11889.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE), the distinguished ranking minority member of the subcommittee.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 11889 is a bill which warrants our support. The previous speakers have outlined what it does. It simply increases the pension awarded to recipients of the Congressional Medal of Honor from $100 to $200 a month. I will not dwell on the history of the pension, because it has already been discussed I would, however, note the uniqueness of the Congressional Medal of Honor. Today, there are only 283 living recipients. No price tag can be put on the contribution these individuals have made to our country and its freedoms. Their actions in combat were way above and beyond the call of duty. At the time of their actions, they could not have been thinking of the benefits they would reap. It is fitting that Congress has honored their contribution with this special pension. It certainly is merited. I urge you to join me in voting for this bill.

● Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11889. This bill would increase the special Congressional Medal of Honor pension now being paid to the few most outstanding heroes of our country living today.

The Congressional Medal of Honor has been reserved for the bravest who have served in the Armed Forces. The law provides today that there shall be in the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, the Department of the Air Force, and the Department of Transportation, respectively, a roll designated as the "Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard Medal of Honor Roll."

Each surviving person who has served on active duty in the Armed Forces of the United States and has been awarded a Medal of Honor for distinguishing such person conspicuously by gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of such person's life above and beyond the call of duty while serving upon written application to the Secretary shall have his name on such roll. It is these persons that the special monthly Medal of Honor pension recognizes by offering a tangible addition to this honor. Currently, the program is fixed at a monthly payment of $100. This benefit has not been increased for 17 years.

The bill proposes a monthly pension rate of $200. It would go to fewer than 270 holders of our country's highest decoration.

I am aware that many of the men who have received this medal are living on very limited incomes. Most of the beneficiaries are above age 60 and many are much older than that. The cost of the bill is estimated at some $300,000 during the next fiscal year.

I urge each of you to support this modest expenditure for these outstanding defenders of our Nation.●

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to voice my support for H.R. 11889. This bill calls for increasing the rate of special pension paid to Congressional Medal of Honor recipients from $100 to $200 monthly. I would like to give some brief background information if I could to explain why I support this bill. I do not have to explain the significance of the honor bestowed upon recipients of this award. A monetary stipend has been paid to recipients since 1916, although at that time the Medal of Honor winner had to be over age 65. The stipend totaled $10 in 1916 and has been increased only once since that time. In 1961, the Congress increased it to $100. The special pension is intended to recognize valorous and heroic service, over and above any other compensation which might be payable on account of service with our Armed Forces. One does not come by winning this honor easily. I believe that it is the appropriate time to increase the pension. I hope you agree with me and vote for H.R. 11889.●

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I ask my colleagues to support the bill unanimously.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 11889.

The question was taken.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 3 of rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

BENEFITS FOR SURVIVORS OF PERMANENTLY DISABLED VETERANS

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 11890) to amend title 38 of the United States Code to provide that the survivors of a veteran who was rated totally and permanently service-connected disabled for a period of at least 10 years would be entitled to dependency and indemnity compensation as though the veteran had died from a service-connected disability, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 11890

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 410 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by redesignating subsection (b) as subsection (c) and by inserting after subsection (a) the following new subsection (b):

"(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a) of this section, when any veteran dies from natural causes and was in receipt of or entitled to receive compensation at the time of death for a service-connected disability permanently and totally disabling and so rated for ten or more years immediately preceding death or continuously from the time of discharge, the Administrator shall pay dependency and indemnity compensation to such veteran's surviving spouse, children, and parents in the same manner as if the cause of death were service-connected except that this subsection shall not apply so as to entitle a surviving spouse who was married to such veteran less than five years preceding such veteran's death.".

SEC. 2. This Act shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS).

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include extraneous material on the bill, H.R. 11890.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, under current law, dependency and indemnity compensation benefits are payable to the widow and children of veterans who die from service-connected causes. The reported bill would extend entitlement for such benefits to the survivors of a few veterans who, at the time of death, had a permanent and total disability rating due to service-connected disability, even though the cause of death may have been from natural causes.

Many of these veterans are blind due to service injuries and because of their blindness, have been unable to accumulate an estate for their widows and children. Many are amputees whose service-connected disabilities may not have been the primary cause of death. It is a good bill and I now yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Mississippi, the very able chairman of our Subcommittee on Compensation, Pension and Insurance, SONNY MONTGOMERY, for an explanation of the bill.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the bill we have under consideration, H.R. 11890, responds to a long-time recommendation of a number of the major national service organizations.

During the hearings conducted March 21 and 22, the point was made that those who are totally disabled from service-incurred disease or injury over a long period of time must not only rely upon their Veterans' Administration compensation to meet the needs of their families but face the problem of being unable to accumulate an estate to care for their families after death.

The widows and children of those veterans who die of service-connected causes are entitled to receive monthly DIC payments from the Veterans' Administration. A few long-time permanently and totally disabled veterans whose deaths cannot be related to their service-connected disability have no such assurance.

While pensions usually are available, the reduced circumstances facing families of these service-connected veterans are of concern to your committee.

The reported bill has sufficient safeguards to protect against the possibility of turning the DIC program into just another form of nonservice-connected pension.

The bill requires that the veteran have suffered total service-connected disability for 10 or more years immediately preceeding death, or, if a lesser time, to have been so disabled continuously since discharge from service.

The life expectency of totally disabled veterans is considerably less than the normal life expectancy. The committee does not feel that providing dependency and indemnity compensation (DIC) benefits to such survivors would dilute the honor and tribute to those killed in action. The committee believes that the longtime spouse of a deceased totally and permanently service-connected disabled veteran deserves to receive DIC benefits for the contribution made in helping the veteran live with a long and severe disability. To that end, the bill requires that the veteran's widow have experienced with him a good part of that loss. This is achieved by requiring the marriage to have existed for 5 or more years.

This bill will primarily benefit the survivors of veterans who are either blinded or paralyzed from service-connected causes and over the years have not been in economic situations whereby they could provide adequate resources for their survivors.

The bill would become effective on October 1, 1978. The first year cost would be about $700,000.

I urge the adoption of the bill.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11890, a bill to provide an automatic presumption of service-connected death for certain veterans rated permanently and totally disabled at the time of death.

Current law requires that the VA adjudicate the cause of death of a veteran with a service-connected disability, to determine whether or not his death was the result of that disability. If an affirmative determination is made, then the widow, children, and in some cases surviving parents, are entitled to dependency and indemnity compensation and other benefits. These benefits are justified as much on the basis of the deceased veteran's lack of ability to accumulate an estate as they are on the disability itself. Presently we are unintentionally playing a cruel game with the veteran's spouse and family, where they must be forced, in his declining years, to hope that he dies of precisely the right reason in order to qualify them for benefits.

This bill eliminates that injustice, and at the same time will not significantly alter the final determination. The administration, while opposing H.R. 11890, pointed out that the Veterans' Administration "compassionately and liberally" applies present law in its adjudications. Studies show the rate of favorable adjudications varies from 75 to 87 percent. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, taking the uncertainty out of the process is well worth any small number of additional cases that might be resolved in favor of a survivor.

There is one portion of this legislation that I disagree with, Mr. Speaker, and while I intend to vote for the bill, it is my hope that we can eventually eliminate this language. I refer to the requirement that a veteran's death be from "natural causes" in order to qualify the survivors for service-connected benefits. In other words, once a veteran has been completely and totally disabled for 10 years, or continuously from the date of his leaving the service, he must also die of "natural causes" in order for his wife to claim DIC benefits. Such a requirement flies in the face of the express intent of this bill, which is to eliminate the uncertainty of an eventual adjudication, and to make up for a veteran's inability to accumulate an estate. We are creating yet another anomaly, although we are solving a part of the problem.

What we are now saying is that the wife of a veteran totally disabled for more than 10 years can eliminate one worry—she does not have to worry about death from natural causes—but she still has to worry about an accidental death, for instance from a car accident. I fail to see how an accidental death affects a veteran's earlier inability to accumulate an estate, and I hope my colleagues on the Veterans' Affairs Committee will join me in eliminating this provision in future sessions of the Congress.

For now, though, Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill goes a long way toward remedying a problem that has caused a great deal of grief and uncertainty to many families. We should remember that these are the families of those who have given a great deal in the service of our Nation. I will be proud to vote for H.R. 11890, and I hope my colleagues will join me.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished ranking minority member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE).

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas, my good friend, Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT, for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my unequivocal support for this measure, and return the compliment by thanking Mr. MONTGOMERY for his leadership in promoting this legislation; and also to thank the chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) for bringing it to the House floor so expeditiously. Mr. ROBERTS and Mr. MONTGOMERY have already explained the provisions of the bill, so I will not be repetitious here except to say that I feel that this action is relatively easy to justify.

To be specific, let me note two reasons. A totally disabled veteran's life expectancy is known to be considerably shorter than nondisabled individuals. The disability oftentimes leads to dependency on the veteran's family. That often precludes the veteran from establishing an estate of any type for his dependents.

The current DIC program is intended to provide partial compensation for those veterans who have died from service-connected causes. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that the veterans, organizations have long advocated a bill such as this. I believe the time is now. I think the bill is important, and I hope that all my colleagues will join in support of it.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from South Dakota (Mr. ABDNOR).

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 11890 is a bill which I am more than happy to voice my support for. The proposed legislation is more than equitable. I think that it alleviates a problem which has caused what could be termed as less than appropriate through the years. Existing law requires that a direct causal relationship be established between the service-connected disability and the cause of death, despite the fact that the veteran was totally disabled as the result of service-connected injuries prior to death. The law makes no room for flexibility. I think you will agree with me when I say that this statute required reconsideration. The Veterans' Affairs Committee looked very closely at the question of presumption of service connection. Testimony indicated that service connection may not be the reason for death; however, death can result as an indirect result of the disability. To illustrate this point, I would like to cite two examples the Paralyzed Veterans Association related when they testified in support of this bill. First. "A PVA member recently died after an automobile accident and was thrown into the ditch by the impact of the crash. Although the bruises he sustained were considered minor, this veteran was a quadriplegic. He had been traveling in a sparsely traveled area, so no one saw him there or assisted him. The veteran froze to death as a direct result of his inability to move." Second, "Another PVA member in New Mexico was robbed and beaten by a taxi cab driver who had known that the PVA member had just cashed his compensation check. After beating the veteran he threw him out of the cab. Again, no one noticed the veteran and he was unable to go for help by himself. This veteran died of exposure, whereas he might have survived if he had not been disabled." I could cite more examples. Under current law, the survivors of the deceased veteran would not be eligible for DIC because the death was not caused directly by the disability. Yet, the disability was directly responsible for the death.

I think you will agree with me when I say that we need to correct this unfortunate situation. This bill proposes to do just that. I urge you to join me in voting for this bill.

● Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11890.

This bill provides that the survivors of a veteran who was rated totally and permanently service-connected disabled for a period of at least 10 years would be entitled to dependency and indemnity compensation as though the veteran had died from a service-connected disability.

I have received various letters from veterans residing in Puerto Rico requesting my support and endorsement for this legislation. Besides their sincere requests, I believe in the merits of this legislation. The House Committee on Veterans' Affairs is correct in stating that veterans who are totally disabled from service-incurred disease or injury must not only rely upon the Veterans' Administration compensation benefits to meet the needs of their families, but they face the problem of being unable to accumulate an estate to care for their families at death.

This legislation is geared to make justice and I urge you to vote for its approval.●

● Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11890. I would like to commend the distinguished gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS), chairman of the committee, and my good friend, Mr. MONTGOMERY of Mississippi, who chairs the Subcommittee on Compensation, Pension and Insurance before moving forward with this bill.

We have long heard from the surviving widows and children of a few severely disabled veterans who have died of causes which we were unable to connect with their period of military service. As a result, these survivors of veterans who were permanently and totally disabled because of service-connected disability for many years have not been entitled to receive dependency and indemnity compensation. Some have received pension benefits at much lesser rates.

The reduced circumstances of the families of these service-connected veterans who have suffered long-time disability because of their service has been a concern to me and I am sure to other Members.

This bill would appear to be an equitable solution to our problem. The bill requires that the veteran have suffered total service-connected disability for at least 10 years immediately preceding death or continuously from the time of his discharge from service. A further protection offered by the bill is the requirement that death be from natural causes and the last safeguard which seeks to prevent turning the service-connected dependency and indemnity compensation program into just another pension bill is the requirement that the veteran's spouse have suffered with him his reduced circumstances for not less than 5 years. I believe this is a good bill, and I urge my colleagues to vote for it.●

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 11890, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 3, rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate has been concluded on all motions to suspend the rules.

Pursuant to clause 3, rule XXVII, the Chair will now put the question on each motion, on which further proceedings were postponed, in the order in which that motion was entertained.

Votes will be taken in the following order: H.R. 11823; H.R. 12349; H.R. 12973; H.R. 11889; and H.R. 11890, all by the yeas and nays.

The Chair will reduce to 5 minutes the time for any electronic vote after the first such vote in this series.

RESERVISTS RETIREMENT ELIGIBILITY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The unfinished business is the question of suspending the rules and passing the bill H.R. 11823, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 11823, as amended, on which the yeas and nays are ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 390, nays 8, not voting 34, as follows:

Mr. Shipley with Mr. Whalen.
Mr. Ryan with Mr. Whitten.
Mr. Meeds with Mr. Wiggins.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof), the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WELCOME BACK MR. MICHEL

(Mr. RHODES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to remind the House that just 3 days ago we were all profoundly shocked by a wanton attack on one of our Members by two people who were bent upon robbery and mayhem, apparently. That gentleman, of course, is the Republican whip, the gentleman from Peoria, Ill., Mr. BOB MICHEL. As we know, they grow them pretty tough in Peoria, and the gentleman from Illinois has shaken off the whole effect of the wanton attack. He is not quite as good as new, and one might not recognize him unless introduced to him first, but, nevertheless, he is on the floor today. I am so pleased to announce the return of BOB MICHEL to the House of Representatives.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days to revise and extend their remarks on the bill, H.R. 12973.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON CEMETERIES AND BURIAL BENEFITS OF COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS TO SIT TOMORROW DURING 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Cemeteries and Burial Benefits of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs be permitted to sit tomorrow during the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is this for hearing purposes only?

Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, we probably will not need the time. We are meeting at 9 o'clock, and we have five witnesses coming in from out of the district, coming some distance. We want to give them each 10 minutes. We should be done, but we may run over a little bit, and this is to protect ourselves.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Can the gentleman assure us that there will be no markup?

Mr. CARNEY. There will be no markup. It is strictly hearings.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON COMPENSATION AND HEALTH AND SAFETY OF COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR TO SIT TOMORROW DURING 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Compensation and Health and Safety of the Committee on Education and Labor be permitted to sit during the 5-minute rule tomorrow at 10 o'clock a.m., July 26, to hear appropriate testimony.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman assure us that there will be no markup of any legislation and that it is just for hearing purposes?

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, there will be no markup at all.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS SUPERVISION, REGULATION, AND INSURANCE OF COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS TO SIT TOMORROW DURING 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Financial Institutions Supervision, Regulation, and Insurance of the Committee on Banking, Finance, and Urban Affairs, be permitted to meet tomorrow morning during the 5-minute rule for the purpose of hearing witnesses only. There will be no markup.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the distinguished chairman assure us they will not markup any bill?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, definitely not, there will be no markup.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I appreciate that. That is good enough.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I am so happy to see that our friend, the gentleman from California, is now immersed in the business of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I say to the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON), welcome to our side.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. ST GERMAIN)?

There was no objection.

REQUEST TO CONSIDER SENATE AMENDMENT TO H.R. 2777, THE NATIONAL CONSUMER COOPERATIVE BANK ACT

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 2777) to provide for consumers a further means of minimizing the impact of inflation and economic depression by narrowing the price spread between costs to the producer and the consumer of needed goods, services, facilities, and commodities through the development and funding of specialized credit sources for, and technical assistance to, self-help, not-for-profit cooperatives, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That this Act may be cited as the "National Consumer Cooperative Bank Act".

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. The economic and financial structure of this country in combination with the Nation's natural resources and the productivity of the American people has produced one of the highest average standards of living in the world. However, the Nation has been experiencing inflation and unemployment together with an increasing gap between producers' prices and consumers' purchasing power. This has resulted in a growing number of our citizens, especially the elderly, the poor, and the inner city resident, being unable to share in the fruits of our Nation's highly efficient economic system. The Congress finds that user-owned cooperatives are a proven method for broadening ownership and control of the economic organizations, increasing the number of market participants, narrowing price spreads, raising the quality of goods and services available to their membership, and building bridges between producers and consumers, and their members and patrons. The Congress also finds that consumer and other types of self-help cooperatives have been hampered in their formation and growth by lack of access to adequate cooperative credit facilities and lack of technical assistance. Therefore, the Congress finds a need for the establishment of a National Consumer Cooperative Bank which will make available necessary financial and technical assistance to cooperative self-help endeavors as a means of strengthening the Nation's economy.

TITLE I—NATIONAL CONSUMER COOPERATIVE BANK

CREATION AND CHARTER OF BANK

SEC. 101. There is hereby created and chartered a body corporate, the National Consumer Cooperative Bank, hereinafter referred to as the "Bank", as an instrumentality of the United States, and until otherwise provided, shall be a mixed ownership Government corporation. The Bank shall have perpetual existence unless and until its charter is revoked or modified by Act of Congress. The right to revise, amend, or modify the charter of the Bank is specifically and exclusively reserved to the Congress. The principal office of the Bank shall be in Washington, District of Columbia, and, for the purpose of venue, shall be considered a resident therof. It shall make loans and offer its services throughout the United States, its territories and possessions, and in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. The Bank shall—

(1) encourage the development of new and existing cooperatives eligible for its assistance by providing specialized credit and technical assistance;

(2) maintain broad-based control of the Bank by its voting stockholders;

(3) encourage broad-based ownership, control, and active participation by members in eligible cooperatives;

(4) assist in improving the quality and availability of goods and services to consumers; and

(5) encourage ownership of its equity securities by cooperatives and others as provided in section 104, so that the date when all of the Bank's class A stock owned by the United States has been fully redeemed (the "Final Government Equity Redemption Date") occurs as early as practicable.

GENERAL CORPORATE POWERS

SEC. 102. The Bank shall have the power to make and service loans, commitments for credit, guarantees, furnish financially related services, technical assistance and the results of research, issue its obligations within the limitations imposed by section 107 in such amounts, at such times, and on such terms as the Bank may determine, and to exercise the other powers and duties prescribed in this Act, and shall have the power to—

(1) operate under the direction of its Board of Directors;

(2) adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal, which shall be judicially noted;

(3) elect by its Board of Directors a president, one or more vice presidents, a secretary, a treasurer, and provide for such other officers, employees, and agents as may be necessary, and define their duties in accordance with regulations and standards adopted by the Board, and require surety bonds or make other provisions against losses occasioned by acts of employees;

(4) prescribe by its Board of Directors its bylaws not inconsistent with law, which shall establish the terms of office and the procedure for election of elective members; provide in a manner not inconsistent with this Act for the classes of its stock and the manner in which its stock shall be issued, transferred, and retired; and prescribe the manner in which its officers, employees, and agents are elected or selected, its property acquired, held and transferred, its loans, commitments, other financial assistance, guarantees and appraisals may be made, its general business conducted, and the privilege granted it by law exercised and enjoyed;

(5) enter into contracts and make advance, progress, or other payments with respect to such contracts, without regard to the provisions of section 3648 of the Revised Statutes;

(6) sue and be sued in its corporate name and complain and defend, in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal;

(7) acquire, hold, lease, mortgage, or dispose of, at public or private sale, real and personal property and sell or exchange any securities or obligations, and otherwise exercise all the usual incidents of ownership of property necessary or convenient to its business: Provided, That any such acquisition or ownership of real property shall not deprive a State or political subdivision thereof of its civil or criminal jurisdiction in and over such property or impair the civil rights of inhabitants of such property under Federal, State, or local laws;

(8) obtain insurance against loss in connection with property and other assets;

(9) modify or consent to the modification with respect to the rate of interest, time of payment of any installment of principal or interest, security, or any other term of any contract or agreement to which it is a party or has an interest pursuant to this Act;

(10) utilize and act through any Federal, State, or local public agency or instrumentality, or private agency or organization, with the consent of the agency or organization concerned, and contract with such agency, instrumentality, or organization for furnishing or receiving technical services and benefits of research, services, funds or facilities; and make advance, progress, or other payments with respect to such contracts without regard to section 3648 of the Revised Statutes;

(11) within the limitations of section 107, borrow money and issue notes, bonds and debentures or other obligations individually or in concert with other financial institutions, agencies or instrumentalities, of such character and such terms and conditions and at rates of interest as may be determined;

(12) issue certificates of indebtedness to its stockholders or members and pay interest on funds left with the Bank, and accept grants or interest free temporary use of funds made available to it;

(13) participate with one or more other financial institutions, agencies, instrumentalities, or foundations in loans or guarantees under this Act on terms as may be agreed upon;

(14) accept guarantees from other agencies for which loans made by the Bank may be eligible;

(15) establish one or more branch offices and one or more advisory councils in connection with any such branch offices, as may from time to time be authorized by the Board of Directors;

(16) buy and sell obligations of, or insured by, the United States or any agency or instrumentalities thereof, or securities backed by the full faith and credit of any such agency or instrumentality and, after the final Government Equity Redemption Date, make such other investments as may be authorized by the Board of Directors;

(17) approve the salary scale of officers and employees of the Bank, in accordance with regulations and standards adopted by the Board of Directors, without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, but, except as otherwise provided in this Act, the General Schedule pay rates shall be applicable until all class A stock held by the Secretary of the Treasury has been retired; and

(18) have such other incidental powers as may be necessary or expedient to carry out its duties under this Act.

The stock or other securities or instruments issued by the Bank shall, to the same extent as securities which are the direct obligations of the United States, be "exempt securities" within the meaning of the laws administered by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS

SEC. 103. (a) The Bank shall be governed by a Board of Directors (hereinafter referred to as the "Board") which shall consist of thirteen members. Subject to the provisions of subsection (b) of this section, all members of the Board shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, for terms of three years or until their successors have been appointed and qualified. The President shall appoint seven members of the Board from among the officers of the agencies and departments of the United States Government: Provided, That at any one time no more than one member shall be from any one agency or department. The remaining members shall be from the general public (and not from the officers or employees of the United States Government) but shall have extensive experience in the cooperative field representative of the following classes of cooperatives: (1) housing, (2) consumer goods, (3) low-income cooperatives, (4) consumer services, and (5) all other eligible cooperatives, and for these appointment the President shall consider nominees submitted by national associations of cooperatives. Any member appointed by the President may be removed at any time with or without cause by the President. If a vacancy occurs on the Board for any reason other than a resignation pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, a new member shall be appointed by the President to serve until the next annual meeting of the Bank, at which time the vacancy shall be filled for the remainder of the unexpired term by the President or the holders of class B and class C stock, as provided in this section 104.

(b) At the first annual meeting occurring after the time when the amount of paid-in capital of the Bank attributable to the shares of class B stock and class C stock equals or exceeds $3,000,000, three members of the Board appointed by the President from the general public shall resign. Similarly, when the amount of paid-in capital attributable to the shares of class B and class C stock equals or exceeds $10,000,000 the terms of the other three members appointed by the President from the general public shall terminate. An additional member of the Board designated by the President (who shall be a member who had been appointed by the President) shall resign at each of the annual meetings occurring after the time when the amount of paid-in capital attributable to the class B and class C stock equals or exceeds seven-thirteenths and eight-thirteenths of the total amount of paid-in capital of the Bank. As members of the Board resign in accordance with the foregoing provisions, the directorships vacated shall be deemed shareholder directorships and shall be filled by the holders of class B stock and class C stock in accordance with the provisions of subsection (c) of this section. Five remaining members of the Board appointed by the President shall resign on the Final Government Equity Redemption Date. Thereafter, one member of the Board shall continue to be appointed by the President from among proprietors of small business concerns, as defined under section 3 of the Small Business Act, which are manufacturers or retailers.

(c) At all elections of Directors by holders of class B stock and class C stock, nominations shall be made by the classes of eligible cooperatives specified in subsection (a). Vacant shareholder directorships shall be filled, whether by appointment or election, so that at any time when there are three or more shareholder directors on the board, there shall be at least one director representing each of the classes of housing cooperatives, low-income cooperatives, and consumer goods and services cooperatives. Each nominee for shareholder directorship of a particular class shall have at least three years experience as a director or senior officer in the class of cooperatives to be represented. No one class of cooperatives specified in subsection (a) shall be represented on the Board by more than three directors.

(d) When all five remaining members of the Board appointed by the President have resigned pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, their successors and the successors to shareholder directors shall thereafter be elected pursuant to such rules as the Board may from time to time prescribe in the by-laws of the Bank.

(e) No director shall be eligible to be elected for more than two consecutive full three-year terms. No officer of the Bank shall be eligible to serve simultaneously as a director on the Board of the Bank. The Bank shall give adequate advance notice to all voting stockholders of nominees and of the procedures for nominating other candidates. Each voting stockholder shall make the information required in this paragraph available to its members.

(f) The Board shall annually elect from among its members a chairman and vice chairman and select a secretary who need not be a member. The Board shall establish the policies of the Bank governing its funding, lending, and other financial and technical assistance, and shall direct the management of the Bank.

(g) The Board shall meet at least quarterly. Its meeting shall be open to members or representatives of all eligible cooperatives and other eligible organizations, as observers only, and to persons or representatives of groups who identify their interest in the Bank and who are invited to attend a meeting, subject to such rules as the Board may establish for the conduct of such meetings. Those rules shall include the manner of giving notice of meetings, the procedure for the conduct of meetings, the manner of submitting topics for the agenda, the allocation of time of presentations, and debate. The chairman, when sustained by the majority of the Board present, may adjourn the open meeting into an executive session on motion of the chairman, any Board member, or at the request of any applicant, borrower, officer, or employee when the matter under discussion involves an application, a loan, a personnel action, or other matter which might tend to impinge on the right of privacy of any person.

(h) Members of the Board appointed by the President from among the officers of the agencies and departments of the United States Government shall not receive any additional compensation by virtue of their service on the Board. Until the Final Government Equity Redemption Date, members of the Board appointed by the President from among the general public or elected by the holders of the class B and class C stock shall (1) receive compensation at a rate equal to the daily equivalent of the rate prescribed for grade GS-18 under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, for each day that they are engaged in the performance of their duties on the Board, and (2) be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the same manner as persons employed intermittently in the Government service are allowed expenses under section 5703(b) of title 5, United States Code, for each day that they are away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance of their duties on the Board.

CAPITALIZATION

SEC. 104. (a) The capital of the Bank shall consist of capital subscribed by borrowers from the Bank, by cooperatives eligible to become borrowers, by organizations owned and controlled by such borrowers, by foundations, trust or charitable funds, by public bodies, and by the United States. Beginning with the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, the United States shall purchase class A stock and for that fiscal year there are authorized to be appropriated $100,000,000 for such purposes, and there are authorized to be appropriated for the next four succeeding fiscal years an amount not to exceed $200,000,000 in the aggregate. Any amounts so authorized but not appropriated or not utilized to purchase such stock of the Bank in any such fiscal year is authorized to be appropriated or reappropriated and so used in subsequent fiscal years.

(b) The capital stock of the Bank shall include class A, class B, and class C stock and such other classes with such rights, powers, privileges, and preferences of the separate classes as may be specified, not inconsistent with law, in the bylaws of the Bank. Class A preferred stock held by the United States shall be a preferred stock with first preference with respect to assets and dividends over all other classes of stock issued by the Bank. So long as any class A stock is outstanding, the Bank shall not pay any dividend on any other class of stock at a rate greater than the statutory dividend payable on the class A stock. Class B and class C stock shall be common stock with voting rights as provided for herein and shall be issued only to eligible borrowers and organizations controlled by such borrowers organizations eligible to borrow, and shall be transferable only on the books of the Bank and then only to another eligible borrower. No holder of voting stock of the Bank shall be entitled to more than one vote regardless of the number of shares of stock of other classes held, except as provided in subsection (g) of this section.

(c) Class A stock with a par value of $100 per share shall be issued by the Bank to the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the United States in exchange for capital furnished pursuant to subsection (a) of this section. The holder of class A stock shall be entitled to dividends at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury taking into consideration the average market yield, during the month preceding the close of each fiscal year, on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturity: Provided, That until October 1, 1990, such dividends shall not exceed 25 per centum of gross revenues for the year less necessary operating expenses, including a reserve for possible losses. Such dividends shall be payable annually into miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury and shall be cumulative. Any such dividend payment may be deferred by the Board of Directors with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, but any dividend payment so deferred shall bear interest at the same rate as the rate at which dividends accumulate on the class A stock. Without the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Bank shall not pay any dividend or distribution on, or make any redemption or repurchase of, any other class of stock at any time when the cumulative dividends of the class A stock shall not have been paid in full (together with any unpaid interest thereon). Upon any liquidation or dissolution of the Bank, the holder of class A stock shall be entitled to receive out of the assets of the Bank available for distribution to its stockholders, prior to any payment to the holders of any other class of stock of the Bank, an amount not less than the aggregate par value of all class A stock outstanding, plus all accrued and unpaid dividends accrued thereon to and including the date of payment (together with all unpaid interest thereon). The class A stock shall be redeemed and retired as soon as practicable consistent with the purposes of this Act (such redemption to be at a price equal to the par value of the class A stock so redeemed plus cumulative dividends accrued thereon to the date of redemption): Provided, That beginning on October 1, 1990, there shall be redeemed as a minimum with respect to each fiscal year a number of shares of class A stock having an aggregate par value equal to the aggregate consideration received by the Bank for the issue of its class B and class C stock during that fiscal year. Each such redemption shall take place not later than ninety days after the close of each fiscal year.

(d) Class B stock shall be held only by recipients of loans under section 105 of this Act, and such borrowers shall be required to own class B stock in an amount not less than 1 per centum of the face amount of the loan at the time the loan is made. Such borrowers may be required by the Bank to own additional class B or class C stock at the time the loan is made, but not to exceed an amount equal to 10 per centum of the face amount of the loan, or from time to time, as the Bank may determine. Such additional stock ownership requirements may be on the basis of the face amount of the loan, the outstanding balances, or on a percentage of interest payable during any year or any quarter thereof, as the Bank will provide adequate capital for the operation of the Bank and equitable ownership thereof among borrowers.

(e) Class C stock shall be available for purchase and shall be held only by borrowers or by organizations eligible to borrow under section 105 of this Act or by organizations controlled by such borrowers, and shall be entitled to dividends in the manner specified in the bylaws of the Bank. Such dividends shall be payable only from income, and, until all class A stock has been retired, the rate of such dividends shall not exceed the rate of the statutory dividends on class A stock.

(f) Nonvoting stock of other classifications and other priorities may be issued at the discretion of the Board, to other investors, except that so long as any class A stock is outstanding, the Board shall not authorize or issue any class of stock, whether voting or nonvoting, that would rank prior or equal to the class A stock as to dividends or upon liquidation or dissolution.

(g)(1) The bylaws of the Bank may provide for more than one vote on the basis of—

(A) the amount of class B stock, class C stock, or both classes held, with such limitations as will encourage investments in class C stock;

(B) the amount of patronage of the Bank; and

(C) number of members in the cooperative.

(2) Such bylaws shall avoid—

(A) voting control of the Bank from becoming concentrated with the larger affluent or smaller less affluent organizations;

(B) a disproportionately larger vote in one or more of the groups of cooperatives referred to in section 103(c) of this Act; and

(C) the concentration of more than 5 per centum of the total voting control in any one class B or class C stockholder.

(h) The Bank may accept nonreturnable capital contributions on which no interest, dividend, or patronage refund shall be payable from associations, foundations, or funds or public bodies or agencies at the discretion of the Board. For the purpose of accepting such contributions, the Bank will be a governmental unit within the meaning of section 170(b)(1)(A)(v) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(i) After payment of all operating expenses of the Bank, including interest on its obligations, and after setting aside appropriate funds for reserves for losses, for cumulative dividends on class A stock and dividends on class C stock and for any redemption of class A stock in accordance with subsection (c), the Bank shall annually set aside the remaining earnings of the Bank for patronage refunds in the form of class B or C stock or allocated surplus in accordance with the bylaws of the Bank. After ten years from the date of issue of any such stock, or at such earlier time as all the Government-held stock is retired, patronage refunds may be made in cash, or partly in stock and partly in cash.

ELIGIBILITY

SEC. 105. (a) For the purpose of all titles of this Act, subject to the limitations of subsection (d) of this section, an eligible cooperative as an organization chartered or operated on a cooperative, not-for-profit basis for producing or furnishing goods, services or facilities, primarily for the benefit of its members or voting stockholders who are ultimate consumers of such goods, services, or facilities, or a legally chartered entity entirely owned and controlled by any such organization or organizations, if it—

(1) makes such goods, services or facilities directly or indirectly available to its members or voting stockholders on a not-for-profit basis;

(2) does not pay dividends on voting stock or membership capital in excess of such percentage per annum as may be approved under the bylaws of the Bank;

(3) provides that its net savings shall be allocated or distributed to all members or patrons, in proportion to their patronage, or shall be retained for the actual or potential expansion of its services or the reduction of its charges to the patrons, or for such other purposes as may be authorized by its membership not inconsistent with its purposes;

(4) makes membership available on a voluntary basis, without any social, political, racial, or religious discrimination and without any discrimination on the basis of age, sex, or marital status, to all persons who can make use of its services and are willing to accept the responsibilities of membership, subject only to limitations under applicable Federal or State laws or regulations;

(5) in the case of primary cooperative organizations restricts its voting control to members or voting stockholders on a one vote per person basis and takes positive steps to insure economic democracy and maximum participation by members of the cooperative including the holding of annual meetings and, in the case of organizations owned by groups of cooperatives, provides positive protections to insure economic democracy; and

(6) is not a credit union, mutual savings bank, or mutual savings and loan association.

(b) No organization shall be ineligible because it produces, markets, or furnishes goods, services, or facilities on behalf of its members as primary producers, unless the dollar volume of loans made by the Bank to such organizations exceeds 10 per centum of the gross assets of the Bank.

(c) As used in this section, the term "net savings" means, for any period, the borrower's gross receipts, less the operating and other expenses deductible therefrom in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles, including, without limitation, contributions to allowable reserves, and after deducting the amounts of any dividends on its capital stock or other membership capital payable during, or within forty-five days after, the close of such period.

(d) An eligible cooperative which also has been determined to be eligible for credit assistance from the Rural Electrification Administration, the National Rural Utilities Cooperative Finance Corporation, the Rural Telephone Bank, the Banks for Cooperatives or other institutions of the Farm Credit System, or the Farmers Home Administration may receive the assistance authorized by this Act only (1) if the Bank determines that a request for assistance from any such source or sources has been rejected or denied solely because of the unavailability of funds from such source or sources, or (2) by agreement between the Bank and the agency or agencies involved.

(e) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, a credit union serving predominantly low-income members (as defined by the Administrator of the National Credit Union Administration) may receive technical assistance under title II.

ANNUAL MEETING

SEC. 106. The Bank shall hold an annual meeting of its stockholders which shall be open to the public. At least 30 days' advance notice of the time and place of the annual meeting shall be given to all stockholders. Borrowers from the Bank shall also give notice of the meeting to their members, who shall be entitled to attend. At such meeting the Bank shall give a full report of its activities during the year and its financial conditions and may present proposals for future action and other matters of general concern to borrowers and organizations eligible to borrow from the Bank. Members and representatives of borrowers may present motions or resolutions relating to matters within the scope of this Act and may participate in the discussion thereof and other matters on the agenda.

BORROWING AUTHORITY

SEC. 107. (a) The Bank is authorized to obtain funds through the public or private sale of its bonds, debentures, notes, and other evidences of indebtedness. Such obligations shall be issued at such times, bear interest at such rates, and contain such terms and conditions as the Board shall determine after consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That the amount of such obligations which may be outstanding at any one time pursuant to this section shall not exceed five times the paid-in capital and surplus of the Bank.

(b) The Bank is also authorized, but not required, and only as long as any of its class A stock is held by the Secretary of the Treasury, to issue its obligations to the Secretary of the Treasury, in amounts not to exceed in the aggregate such amounts as are provided in appropriations Acts and the Secretary of the Treasury may in his discretion purchase any such obligations. Each purchase of obligations of the Bank under this subsection shall be upon such terms and conditions as to yield a rate of return not less than a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturity. The Secretary of the Treasury may sell, upon such terms and conditions and at such price or prices as he shall determine any of the obligations of the Bank acquired by him under this subsection.

(c) The Bank may purchase its own obligations, and may provide for the sale of any such obligations through a fiscal agent or agents, by negotiation, offer, bid, syndicate sale, or otherwise, and may deliver such obligations by book entry, wire transfer, or such other means as may be appropriate.

(d) Obligations issued under this section shall not be guaranteed by the United States and shall not constitute a debt or obligation of the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof other than the Bank.

LENDING POWERS

SEC. 108. (a) The Bank may make loans and commitments for loans under this subsection to any organization determined by the Bank to be eligible under the provisions of section 105 of this Act, and may purchase or discount obligations of members of such organizations if the Bank, to the exclusion of all other persons, entities, agencies, or jurisdictions, also determines that the applicant has or will have a sound organizational and financial structure, income in excess of its operating costs and assets in excess of its obligations, and a reasonable expectation of a continuing demand for its production, goods, commodities, or services, or the use of its facilities, so that the loan will be fully repayable in accordance with its terms and conditions. Commencing on October 1, 1983, the Bank shall not make any loan to a cooperative for the purpose of financing the construction, ownership, acquisition, or improvement of any structure used primarily for residential purposes if, after giving effect to such loan, the aggregate amount of all loans outstanding for such purpose would exceed 30 per centum of the gross assets of the Bank. The Board of Directors shall use its best efforts to insure that at the end of each fiscal year of the Bank at least 35 per centum of its outstanding loans are to—

(1) cooperatives at least a majority of the members of which are low-income persons, and

(2) other cooperatives, if the proceeds of such loans are directly applied to finance a facility, activity, or service that the Board finds will be used predominantly by low-income persons.

The Board shall adopt and publish in the Federal Register rules defining the term "low-income persons" for purposes of this subsection. The criteria to be applied and the factors to be considered by the Bank in making loans, loan commitments, purchases, discounts, and guarantees shall include an assessment of the impact of the loan on existing small businesses in the eligible organizations' business territory. The criteria and factors shall be stated in rules of the Bank which shall be published and made available to applicants and, upon request, to any other person or organization.

(b) Loans under this section shall be repayable in not more than forty years and, except for loans with final due date not longer than five years from the date of the loan, shall be amortized as to principal and interest. In setting the terms, rates, and charges, it shall be the objective of the Bank to provide the type of credit needed by eligible borrowers, at the lowest reasonable cost on a sound business basis, taking into account the cost of money to the Bank, necessary reserve and expenses of the Bank, and the technical and other assistance attributable to loans under this section made available by the Bank, but so long as the Bank makes loans from the proceeds of the sale of class A stock, the interest rate shall not be less than the rates generally prevailing in the area from other sources for loans for similar purposes and maturities, taking into consideration the cost to the borrower of required purchase of class B stock in the Bank. The loan terms may provide for interest rates to vary from time to time during the repayment period of the loan in accordance with the rates being charged by the Bank for new loans at such times. The proceeds of a loan under this subsection may be advanced by the borrower to its members or stockholders under circumstances described in the by-laws or rules of the Bank.

(c) Subject to section 102(13), the Bank may guarantee all or any part of the principal and interests of any loan made by any State or federally chartered lending institution to any borrower if such loan is to an organization that would be an eligible borrower from the Bank for a direct loan and is on terms and conditions (including the rate of interest) which would be permissible terms and conditions for such a direct loan. The Bank may impose a charge for any such guarantee. No loan may be guaranteed by the Bank if the income therefrom to the lender is excluded from such lender's gross income for purposes of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(d) Any loan guaranteed under subsection (c) shall be assignable to the extent provided in the contract of guarantee as may be determined by the Bank. The guarantee shall be uncontestable, except for fraud or misrepresentation of which the holder had actual knowledge at the time he acquired the loan. The Bank in lieu of requiring such lender to service such guaranteed loan until final maturity or liquidation, may purchase the loan for the balance of the principal and accrued interest thereon without penalty, if it determines that (1) the liquidation of the loan would result in the insolvency of the borrower or deprive the borrower of assets essential to its continued operation, and (2) the loan will be repayable with revision of the loan rates, terms, or payment periods or other conditions not inconsistent with loans made by the Bank under subsection (a) of this section, which revisions the lender or other holder of such guaranteed loan is unwilling to make.

(e) As long as any of the class A stock of the Bank is held by the Secretary of the Treasury, the aggregate amount of commitments by the Bank to make or guarantee loans shall not exceed such amounts as may be specified in annual appropriation Acts.

TAXATION

SEC. 109. Until the Final Government Equity Redemption Date, but not thereafter, the Bank, including its franchise, capital, reserves, surplus, mortgages, or other security holdings and income shall be exempt from taxation now or hereafter imposed by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority, but any real property held by the Bank shall be subject to any State, county, municipal, or local taxation to the same extent according to its value as other real property is taxed.

QUARTERS AND SPACE

SEC. 110. Until the Final Government Equity Redemption Date, space for the principal office and any branch offices of the Bank shall be provided by the General Services Administration. Thereafter, the Bank may lease, construct, or own quarters and provide for the space requirements of its principal and other offices.

REPORTS TO CONGRESS

SEC. 111. The Board of the Bank shall report annually to the appropriate committees of the Congress on the Bank's capital, operations, and financial condition and make recommendations for legislation needed to improve its services.

AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 112. In addition to appropriations specifically authorized in this Act, there are authorized to be appropriated $2,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for each of the two succeeding fiscal years, ending September 30, 1980, and September 30, 1981, such sums as may be necessary: Provided, That none of these appropriated sums shall be used to retire any indebtedness of the Bank incurred pursuant to section 107 of this Act. Any sums so appropriated shall remain available until expended.

APPEALS

SEC. 113. (a) If an application for assistance under this Act is denied in whole or in part, the applicant shall be informed within thrity days in writing of the reasons for the denial or restriction.

(b) Any applicant for assistance under this Act receiving notice of denial or restriction of the application may, within thirty days of receipt of such notice, request the Board of Directors to review the application and notice of denial or restriction for a determination of whether the action of the Bank was correctly within the terms of the Act, the regulations, and the policy of the Board. The Board shall consider the request for review at its next meeting and promptly inform the applicant of its determination and the reasons therefor.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

SEC. 114. The Board of Directors shall adopt and publish its own conflict of interest rules which shall be no less stringent in effect than the Federal Executive conflict of interest rules contained in Executive Order Numbered 11222 in prohibiting participation or action or the use of inside information for personal advantage on any matter involving a corporation, trust, partnership, or cooperative organization in which a board member, officer, or employee holds a substantial financial interest or holds a position as board member or senior officer, the activities of which organization might be relevant to, be competitive with, or be inconsistent with the objectives of any bank created under this Act. These rules shall require—

(1) each nominee for elected membership on the Board established under this Act to make public and file with the election official before the date of election a statement of his financial interest and position, if any, such organizations; and

(2) each senior executive officer and appointed member of the Board to file with the appointing officer, before entering that office a statement of his financial interest and position, if any, in such organizations, which shall be available for inspection upon request.

The provisions of this section shall remain in effect until the Final Government Equity Redemption Date.

EXAMINATION AND AUDIT

SEC. 115. Until the stock of the Bank held by the United States has been fully retired, the operations of the Bank shall be examined annually under the direction of an agency or instrumentality of the Federal Government designated by the President, including the General Accounting Office, and reports of such examination shall be forwarded to the Congress. The President shall, no later than the date that 66⅔ per centum of the class A stock is held by others than the Secretary of the Treasury, establish an Office of Supervision and Audit which shall be responsible for audits and examinations of the Bank, shall assure that the objectives of this title are carried out, and shall review and comment on the bylaws of the Bank and the general policies of the Bank and shall make an annual report to the Congress.

TITLE IV—OFFICE OF SELF-HELP DEVELOPMENT AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

ESTABLISHMENT

SEC. 201. (a) There is hereby established within the Bank an Office of Self-Help Development and Technical Assistance (hereinafter the "Office").

(b) The Office shall have a Director who shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall not be a member of the Board. Subject to review by the Board, the Director shall promulgate and publish in the Federal Register policies and procedures governing the operation of the Office.

AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 202. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Office $10,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for the next two succeeding fiscal years an aggregate amount not to exceed $65,000,000, for the purpose of making advances under section 203 of this Act. Any amounts appropriated to the Office shall be deposited by the Office in a separate account in the Bank (hereinafter the "Account"), and shall remain available until expended. Repayments of capital investment advances made pursuant to section 203(a) and interest supplement advances made pursuant to section 203(b) and payments of interest thereon pursuant to section 203(c) shall also be deposited in the Account. No other funds of the Bank shall be transferred into the Account. The Account shall be used by the Office only as authorized in section 203.

CAPITAL INVESTMENTS AND INTEREST SUPPLEMENTS

SEC. 203. (a) The Office may make a capital investment advance out of the Account to any eligible cooperative, either in conjunction with or without a loan if the Office determines that—

(1)(A) the applicant's initial or supplemental capital requirements exceeds its ability to obtain such capital through a loan under section 108 or from other sources; or

(B) the membership of the applicant is, or will consist, substantially of low-income persons, as defined by the Board of Directors, or the applicant proposes to undertake to provide specialized goods, services, or facilities to serve their needs; and

(2) the applicant cannot obtain sufficient funds through a loan under section 108 or otherwise, and the applicant presents a plan which the Office determines will permit the replacement of a capital investment advance out of member equities within a period not to exceed thirty years.

(b) The Office may make advances out of the Account to pay all or part of the interest payable to the Bank or any other lender by an eligible cooperative applicant which the Office determines cannot pay a market rate of interest because it sells goods or services to, or provides facilities for the use of, persons of low income: Provided, That such advances will not exceed an amount equal to 4 per centum of the principal amount of the indebtedness of such applicant to the Bank or such other lender for any year in which the net income of the cooperative is insufficient to meet scheduled interest payments.

(c) Capital investment advances made by the Office pursuant to subsection (a) and interest supplement advances made by the Office pursuant to subsection (b) shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Board of Directors of the Bank, and the Board of Directors may authorize an interest rate applicable to such advances lower than the rate applicable to loans by the Bank pursuant to section 108.

ORGANIZATIONAL ASSISTANCE

SEC. 204. The Office shall make available information and services concerning the organization, financing, and management of cooperatives to best achieve the objectives of this Act and to best provide the means through which various types of goods, services, and facilities can be made available to members and patrons. The Office may enter into agreements with other agencies of Federal, State, and local governments, colleges and universities, foundations, or other organizations for the development and dissemination of such information, and services described in this title. The Office may make or accept grants or transfer of funds for such purposes.

INVESTIGATION AND REVENUES

SEC. 205. The Office may undertake investigations of new types of services which can more effectively be provided through cooperative not-for-profit organizations and make surveys of areas where the increased use of such organizations will contribute to the economic well-being of the community.

FINANCIAL ANALYSIS AND MARKET SURVEYS

SEC. 206. The Office may, at the request of any eligible cooperative, provide a financial analysis of the applicant's capital structure and needs and its cost of operations, survey the market for the goods or services the cooperative makes or desires to make available to its members or patrons or the users of its facilities.

DIRECTOR AND MANAGEMENT TRAINING AND ASSISTANCE

SEC. 207. The Office shall develop and make available, alone or in concert with other organizations, a program for training directors and staff of eligible cooperatives to improve their understanding of their responsibilities; the problems of and solutions for effective and efficient operation of their organizations or of cooperatives in general; and may by any means it deems appropriate, conduct membership studies, provide membership education programs, and programs for informing consumers and the general public of the advantages of cooperative action. Management supervision, review, and consultations shall be available from the Office to any eligible cooperative.

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

SEC. 208. The Office shall work closely with all United States Government agencies offering programs for which consumer cooperatives may be eligible to assure that information concerning all such programs is made available to eligible cooperatives.

AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 209. There are authorized to be appropriated to the Office $2,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for each of the two succeeding fiscal years, such sums as may be necessary for the administration of this title. Any sums so appropriated shall remain available until expended.

FEES FOR SERVICES

SEC. 210. The Office may make the technical assistance services under this title available for such fees as it may establish, except that such services as the Office may determine may be made available without charge to eligible cooperatives depending on the nature of the services or on ability to pay. Any fees collected shall be accounted for separately and be available for expenses of the Office.

TITLE III—GENERAL PROVISIONS

AMENDMENTS TO EXISTING LAW

SEC. 301. (a) Section 201 of the Government Corporation Control Act (31 U.S.C. 856) is amended by redesignating paragraph (6) the second time it appears therein as paragraph (7), by striking out "and" immediately before "(9)" and by inserting ", and (10) the National Consumer Cooperative Bank" immediately before the period at the end thereof.

(b) Section 302 of the Government Corporation Control Act (31 U.S.C. 867) is amended by striking out "or" before "the Federal Land Banks" and inserting immediately after "the Federal Land Banks," the following: "or the National Consumer Cooperative Bank,".

(c) The second sentence of subsection (d) of section 303 of the Government Corporation Control Act (31 U.S.C. 868(d)) is amended by inserting "National Consumer Cooperative Bank," immediately before "Rural Telephone Bank".

SEC. 302. Section 5315 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(122) President, National Consumer Cooperative Bank.

"(123) Director, Office of Self-Help Development and Technical Assistance, National Consumer Cooperative Bank.".

Mr. ST GERMAIN (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the first request of the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. ST GERMAIN)?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I take this reservation for the purpose of asking a question. If the gentleman's motion should prevail, would not the bill be passed and go to the White House?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. ASHBROOK. The speaker, further reserving the right to object, I think there is a principle involved here. I do not think under a unanimous-consent request that we should pass new legislation to spend hundreds of millions. We should be drawing in not expanding. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman withhold temporarily and yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, the reason for asking to do it in this manner is that, indeed, the Senate amendment does cut the authorizations back for the self-help fund. That is entirely in keeping with the tightening of the budget.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, my reason for objecting is that I would hope the bill would get lost somewhere and not get passed.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman knows this particular legislation only passed by one vote here in the House.

Mr. ASHBROOK. What day was that?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. About July of last year.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. In July.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I opposed the bill and still do now. I must say, the Senate version, if that is possible, is substantially better than the House-passed version. It is far less money.

It is really the Ralph Nader bank. That is what it will be known as. It is a whole new banking system which I do not think we need; but if we go to conference, my point is that we will come back with a much worse bill.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I still feel, as one opposing this, that to not object would be to assent. I do not want to agree to this.

Therefore. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC STABILIZATION OF COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS, TO SIT BEYOND 10 A.M. ON WEDNESDAY, JUNE 26

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, be permitted to sit beyond 10 a.m., on Wednesday, July 26, 1978, to conduct a hearing only on the administration's anti-inflation program.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 12426, NEW YORK CITY FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1978

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 12426) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide financial assistance for the city of New York, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of July 18, 1978.)

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the statement be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MOORHEAD) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MCKINNEY will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MOORHEAD).

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. RONCALIO).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. RONCALIO was allowed to speak out of order.)

IN SUPPORT OF CLARIFICATION OF REMARKS OF AMBASSADOR YOUNG

Mr. RONCALIO. Mr. Speaker, I thank my gracious friend from Pennsylvania for yielding to me.

This is an out-of-order 1 minute I take to advise my colleagues of the fact that yesterday morning our good friend, the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. ALEXANDER) introduced into the RECORD the verbatim interview of Ambassador Young. He telephoned him the morning of the incident, and asked for the transcript so we could all read it firsthand. I commend BILL ALEXANDER for that.

Mr. Speaker, I think we have a duty to read that verbatim account. It is a tremendous contribution to better understanding of America in Africa. It is an excellent defense of our policy in Africa. It is must reading for all 535 of us.

Mr. Speaker, I hope all of us, every Member of the House, including my good friend, the gentleman from Illinois, who discussed this matter, will read this interview word for word. It illustrates a lot of the heat of passion and the frustration all of us feel once in awhile when they take a word or two out of context from a long hour-and-a-half debate and throw it in the headlines the next morning.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the chairman of the full Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. REUSS), who also served so ably as chairman of the conference committee.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, the conference report on H.R. 12426 represents a genuine compromise between strong conflicting views of the two Houses. It was arrived at after quite a few hours of hard debate and bargaining. As usual in the case of compromise, both Houses gave something in order to get something, and I believe we have here a good, workable program which will do the job of getting New York City back on its fiscal and financial feet.

The conference report provides for $1.65 billion in guarantees of city-related securities over the 4-year period beginning July 1 of this year; the guarantees can be issued only for securities purchased by the city and State employee pension funds; some seasonal assistance is provided for this year only; the $1.65 billion is to be available in annually specified amounts, which will provide the opportunity for close monitoring of compliance by New York City and State with the various conditions which the program imposes, which incidentally are expanded beyond what the House bill required.

Mr. Speaker, this conference report contains tighter, more stringent provisions than were in the bill which we passed in this House in early June. But if New York City follows the prudent fiscal and financial course it has set for itself and does the things it has promised it will do in the next 4 years, this bill which the conferees have developed will work, and New York should be back in the public credit markets by June 30, 1982.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support the conference report on H.R. 12426, the New York City Loan Guarantee Act of 1978.

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report on the bill H.R. 12426. I agree with the chairman of the full Banking Committee, who also served very ably as chairman of the conference committee, that the conference report represents a genuine compromise. Even though the two bills passed each house by nearly 2-to-1 margins, there were strong conflicting views between the two houses.

Title I of the conference can be divided into five basic headings: (A) Total Amount of Guarantees and Their Duration; (B) Conditions for Eligibility; (C) Division of Guarantees into Slices, Eligible Purchasers, and One-House Veto; (D) Remedies in the Event of Default; and (E) Inspections, Audits and Reports. Title II of the conference covers matters under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Ways and Means.

A. TOTAL AMOUNT OF GUARANTEES AND THEIR DURATION

The conference agreement would provide for up to $1.65 billion to New York City (instead of the $2 billion in the House bill and $1.5 billion in the Senate bill) for up to 15 years (instead of 10 years in the Senate bill), except that $325 million may be used for short-term debt issued before January 1, 1979, and maturing not later than July 1, 1979 (the Senate had no provision for any short-term financing and the House had no special limitation thereon). Authority to issue guarantees would terminate on June 30, 1982.

B. CONDITIONS FOR ELIGIBILITY

The conferees agreed to make the guarantees contingent upon the following:

First. A finding that State, private and public credit sources would meet the remainder of the city's unguaranteed debt through June 30, 1982, in amounts sufficient to assure financing of all city debt after that date in the public credit markets;

Second. Reasonable prospects that obligations will be repaid and that the interest rate is reasonable;

Third. The maintenance of an independent fiscal monitor for the entire period the guarantees are outstanding;

Fourth. That the city's budget will be balanced by 1982 and thereafter, and plans for maintaining balanced budgets for the entire guarantee period;

Fifth. Annual independent audits of the city's financial statements and the establishment of an independent audit committee;

Sixth. Maintenance of the 1979 level of State financial assistance through 1982;

Seventh. The establishment of a State reserve fund of 5 percent of the principal outstanding and of 1 year's interest, to be used in the event of default;

Eighth. The establishment of a Productivity Council to enhance productivity of city employees;

Ninth. A requirement that the city offer short-term notes to the public in 1980, 1981, and 1982 and long-term bonds in 1981 and 1982, unless the Secretary determines that any such offer would be inconsistent with the financial interests of the city; and

Tenth. A requirement that 15 percent of the city's long-term borrowings in 1982 and thereafter be used to repay guaranteed obligations subject to waiver or modification by the Secretary.

C. DIVISION OF GUARANTEES INTO SLICES, ELIGIBLE PURCHASERS AND ONE-HOUSE VETO

The conferees accepted a modified Senate provision limiting the $1.65 billion loan guarantee authority to debt held by city and State employee pension funds and apportioning the guarantees as follows: $500 million each in fiscal 1979 and 1980, and $325 million each in 1981 and 1982, all long-term and cumulative. The $325 million for 1979 short-term (seasonal) guarantees could be used only to the extent that city pension fund debt purchases would impair the funds' tax-exempt status (the effect is to permit guarantees of seasonal purchases by State pension funds). Amounts for fiscal 1980 and 1981 could be vetoed by either house of Congress before the start of the city's fiscal year; the $325 million for fiscal 1982 would be available only if the city presents a balanced budget; if the balanced budget is presented earlier than 1982, the $325 million would be available then. The Secretary of the Treasury must assess a guarantee fee of at least one half of one percent of outstanding principal.

D. REMEDIES IN THE EVENT OF DEFAULT

In the event of default, the Secretary is required to withhold Federal payments to the city or the State. In the event of insolvency, the United States has priority claim over other creditors. The Secretary may waive this right if necessary to help the city meet its financing needs. The Secretary may bring civil action to enforce compliance.

E. INSPECTIONS, AUDITS AND REPORTS

Finally, full authority would be provided for inspection, audits and reports by the Treasury and the General Accounting Office. Appropriations must precede issuance of guarantees.

Title II, which is under the jurisdiction of the conferees from the Committee on Ways and Means, would provide for Federal taxation of interest on guaranteed obligations and prohibit their acquisition by the Federal Financing Bank.

Mr. Speaker, your conferees have produced legislation which will reestablish the financial position of New York City, will not establish a precedent for other cities, and will not cost the taxpayers one thin dime.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of the conference report.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. STANTON), the ranking minority member on the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Speaker, I favor adoption of the conference committee report on H.R. 12426, the New York City Financial Assistance Act of 1978.

Mr. Speaker, I am philosophically opposed to long-term loan guarantees for New York City. But I am also firmly convinced that New York City must have Federal help if it is to avoid bankruptcy. And since H.R. 12426 as revamped by the conference committee is the only vehicle at hand to help New York City, I am supporting the conference committee report.

The House and Senate conferees labored diligently on this legislation and produced a bill which I fervently hope will not only enable New York City to avert bankruptcy but to get back into the financial markets and solve its basic problems. Of course, the only permanent solution to New York City's problems rests not with Washington but with New York City itself and its municipal administration.

Mr. Speaker, I think the House-Senate conference on H.R. 12426 served a highly useful purpose because the resulting product is superior to that which emerged from the individual Houses of the Congress.

The House bill was overgenerous in its treatment of New York City—too loosely written.

The Senate measure was a more restrictive package and was an improvement over the House legislation in its monitoring of New York City finances. But the Senate bill lacked the option of short-term loan guarantees—an option which, in my view, New York City definitely must have.

The result of the conference was to bring before the House and Senate a New York City assistance bill which gives the city $1.65 billion in long-term loan guarantees—hedged around with carefully drawn restrictions—and also up to $350 million in short-term guarantees to be used in the first 6 months of the first fiscal year.

Let me call the attention of the House to the tightening up of New York City financial monitoring which is provided for in the conference committee report. The guarantees will be spaced out over 4 years. To forestall a parade of distressed cities seeking loan guarantees in Washington, the guaranteed securities can be sold only to New York City's municipal pension fund and the State of New York pension fund. There will be opportunities for Congress to exercise a one-House veto in the second and third years. And the fourth-year guarantees would be forthcoming only if New York City achieves a balanced budget according to generally accepted accounting principles.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is needed and I therefore support it.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I think probably the only good thing that I can find in this conference report, as a supporter of New York, is that it does not have an abortion or human rights amendment on it.

I have a feeling that the House of Representatives totally sold out to the Senate and I think in selling out to the Senate on many points that we lost sight of our overall objective.

Of course, I am going to vote for this conference report. Of course, I am going to support it because I support the city of New York; but it seems to me that the expressions that have been made by those who favor helping New York City, have been put in great jeopardy by the conference report which we have in front of us. We have come perilously close to making an insufficient amount of guarantees available to New York City, guarantees that are not going to cost the Federal taxpayer one single dime because we have the collateral of all of the Federal transfer programs to the city and of all of the Federal transfer programs to the State; we have made the city a person under the bankruptcy laws for the first time in the history of the United States; we have set aside a reserve fund; we have provided for a one-House veto; and we have cut the funds drastically.

Mr. Speaker, I have questioned who was elected to office during the conference, but I have acquiesced because I did not have the cards. I suppose it is bad enough that The New York Times has quoted me as saying to the Senate conferees that I would hope they would send back my underwear and socks after the conference because I certainly lost both of them. However, I did not have the cards.

Mr. Speaker, I think the only reason I am up here complaining about the conference report on which I worked long and hard and which I am going to vote for is that, in true conscience, I want to say something is going on in this House today which disturbs me beyond comparison.

Mr. Speaker, I used to think that it was my friends from the farm belt who were putting it to the cities; but I have turned around now and I help my farm friends whenever I can because I realize they have their problems; but now it is the very constituency which lives in half of my district that is taking from the cities.

Mr. Speaker, I have a very vociferous opponent, but I hope he will go back to my district and say that this is what I said in the House.

Mr. Speaker, the lack of concern for the basic problems of the cities of this country bothers me greatly. This Congress refuses to realize what it has historically done for almost 150 years to these cities—that we have taken the tax money from the cities in this country at a faster rate and returned it at a lesser rate than in the case of any other part of our population—all of these are facts which bother me.

Mr. Speaker, in the stripping and stripping and pin-cutting which went on in this conference on New York City, I found an attitude which was not, "Let us do what is best for New York City; let us make New York City healthy; let us make it again part of the economic mainstream." Rather, I found an attitude underlying the conference which I find underlying most of our thoughts on urban problems in this House; and that is, "Let us put it to the urban centers. Let us make them continue to pay."

Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, I am going to tell the Members simply this: I do not intend to spend the rest of my life in the House, but I do intend to spend long enough in this country, alive on this Earth, to know that the problem of America today is coping with its urban centers which have supplied most of the money that built the South, the West, and the rest of the country, as well as other parts of the world. If we cannot cope with those urban problems, if our attitude is going to be continually, "Let us put it to the urban dweller and the urban government," we are going to have a tremendous problem because 70 percent of the people in this country are urbanists. They live in the suburbs and in the great cities of this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, as any housewife knows, one always squeezes a melon before he or she buys it because, most assuredly, if the melon's core is rotten, the melon is no good.

Mr. Speaker and colleagues, I would simply say that if we do not face that problem in this Nation, if we continue with the same attitude which I saw at this conference, then our core is most certainly going to stay rotten; and we as a Nation will fall with it.

Mr. Speaker, I imagine the reason for my speech today is one more try to plead somehow on the record that this legislative body realize what we as a nation have done to the economics of the urban centers of this country and that we know now that we must undo what we have done or else we surely will not survive.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr.

Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO), a member of the subcommittee and a member of the conference committee.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, we faced a difficult task on this conference report. The attitude on the part of the Senate was that they had, in essence, adopted the body of legislation that was passed by the House, and then acted to improve upon it. Indeed, they had taken some of the very restrictive requirements that were embodied in the House legislation and added to them such provisions as one-House veto, prohibited use of seasonable financing, which has, of course, been the vehicle which was utilized the last 3 years in terms of meeting the city's financial need with tough restrictions.

Now, the fact that we faced a deadline, or the fact that we were beyond a deadline, obviously was very much in the minds of all the conferees. The deadline, of course, was the seasonal bonding authority terminated July 1 and realization that the plight of the city was going to become worsened, we believed, by the lack of resolution with regard to the conference and a policy of whether or not Congress was going to authorize seasonal financing or long-term bond guarantees for the city of New York.

To frame the issue remember that the Senate position was $1.5 billion plus interest, with a 10-year limitation on some of the bonds and 15-year on others. There was the legislative veto and the seasonal bond prohibition. Our position was $2 billion inclusive of interest, which our colleague from Connecticut (Mr. MCKINNEY) had been successful in placing into the legislation in committee, and which I think was a proper limitation, and no seasonal bond limitations.

The conferees are presenting a figure of 1.65 in terms of bond plus interest, and of course we recognize that this is a compromise depending on what the interest rates are.

The other types of compromises that were made here, I think, were necessary, and I think they were reasonable.

Mr. Speaker, I think this legislation will permit New York to attain the type of autonomy and health which we all desire it to have. I rise in support of the conference report to accompany H.R. 12426, the City of New York Financial Assistance Act of 1978.

I am especially mindful of the national costs that have occurred because of indecisive congressional action and the increased costs that many sound political subdivisions experienced when no resolution existed for New York City fiscal soundness.

The conferees had the task, as I have mentioned, of reconciling some differences in the House and Senate bills, but led by our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. REUSS), and our good chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MOORHEAD), we were able to agree on the legislation which I believe is better than either of the original bills that were brought into the conference.

It is my understanding that New York City and New York State banks see this legislation as capable of achieving the purpose of helping the city to be restored to sound fiscal health. Salient features of the conference report have been fully reported. It is not necessary to further belabor the objectives which have been resolved.

Mr. Speaker, I commend all the conferees who participated in the work, and this reasonable agreement. I especially want to pay tribute to the staff people, both of the House and the Senate, who were so helpful to me as a freshman Member serving on this conference for the first time. I strongly urge my colleagues to vote in favor of the conference committee report and provide the fiscal stability that the city and State need to continue its recovery.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON).

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it can only be hoped that the impressive success which New York City has scored in making its case to Congress will now be repeated as it begins to do battle with an even more fearsome fiscal situation. The war is far from over, and far from won. It will require heroic measures of intelligence, honesty, and willpower for the city to overcome its wanton past and earn the confidence Congress has chosen to place in it by the present legislation.

In coming to the aid of New York City, it has not been the intention of Congress to provide what some have called a "bailout," simply enabling the city to continue living beyond its means. This would be entirely unproductive and shameless. To the contrary, our response has been a limited and highly structured one; and it has been meant only as the last best hope to pull the city to its own feet so that one day soon the Federal Government will no longer be needed as a crutch.

It should be clear for all to see that the city is so beleaguered by deficit, deteriorating capital plant, and the flight of tax base and investment, that the alternative to our action would be the spectacle of our largest city teetering on the brink of financial collapse and all the legal, political, and social chaos that could ensue. It is argued in some quarters that only a formal bankruptcy will permit the discipline to be imposed that elected governments sometimes do their best to avoid. But the consequences of such an unprecedented action for New York's flesh-and-blood citizens, for the municipal bond markets that other cities depend on, and for our image and economic situation abroad, would make such an action seem Draconian and vengeful.

Moreover, it is not as if the city has now been let off scot-free. The legislation that has emerged from conference has, to a large extent, combined the most restrictive conditions in the individual House and Senate bills. The result has been a type of Federal assistance that other cities will not easily be tempted to seek.

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from New York (Ms. HOLTZMAN).

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to compliment the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MOORHEAD) for the extraordinary leadership he has shown on this legislation to provide loan guarantees to New York City and to thank the members of the conference committee, the members of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, and the Members of the House who supported efforts to allow New York City to stand on its feet financially speaking.

That is all New York City has asked for and that is what this conference report is designed to do.

I do share some of the concerns, however, suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MCKINNEY); namely, that with all the restrictions, limitations, and inhibitions placed on the guarantees by the Conference Report, we may be suffocating the city as it tries to get to its feet. I hope that does not happen. I hope the city gets on its feet.

Again I express my gratitude to the Members of the House and the conference committee.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK).

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the conference report on H.R. 12426, which provides for another Federal bailout of New York City. The citizens of our Nation should not be expected to subsidize the excesses and mismanagement of this city forever.

As my colleagues will recall, in 1975 Congress approved an emergency piece of legislation designed to help New York City avert bankruptcy. The bill as enacted provided $2.3 billion in Federal loans.

At that time we were told by New York officials that the legislation was for one time only. We were told on the House floor by supporters of the legislation that New York City only wanted the opportunity to "put its own house in order," a chance to "work its way back to fiscal solvency" and "work itself out of its difficulties."

Two and a half years have now gone by and the emergency legislation is expiring. Not surprisingly, officials from the "Big Apple" are back before Congress, hat in hand, seeking renewed aid. I will vote against this $1.65 billion bailout just as I did the $2.3 billion bailout in 1975.

The Federal Government is on the verge of becoming a permanent guarantor of New York City's finances. The taxpayers of our Nation are in danger of perpetually loaning their money to pay one city's bills.

Congress should call a halt to this nonsense. Ohioans should not be required to bankroll the profligate policies of New York City politicians.

It is hard to feel much sympathy for New York City. Its problems are self-inflicted. The simple truth is that the city has acted as if there were no tomorrow, spending more, taxing more, and borrowing more than any other city in the country.

Look at the facts. This city, which wants Federal help, outspends the average city on a per capita basis by 46.5 percent. This city, which is asking for another bailout, pays the averag city employee a wage package in excess of $26,700.

Approximately 7 years ago I voted against the Federal bailout of the Lockheed Aircraft Corp. As I stated in my August 4, 1971, Washington Report:

> Increasing reliance on the Federal Government as an inexhaustible, bottomless pit of funds is a trend I have frequently deplored. This dependency has eroded individual initiative, as well as local and State Government initiative.

This trend is continuing today, with New York City once again before Congress seeking Federal assistance. I oppose the practice of putting failing cities on welfare just as I oppose the practice of putting failing corporations on welfare. Residents of the 17th District of Ohio should not have to subsidize the mistakes and extravagance of New York City.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to my good friend on the committee, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. KELLY).

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the conference report.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the issue is unchanged. Those Members of the House who believe that it is perfectly all right to mismanage Government and then in a tidy package send the bill to the taxpayers will think that the committee report is a good solution. Those Members of the House who believe that the only solution to New York's problems is for the New York City government to quit spending so much money and be responsible to the people will think the committee report is a bad solution.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Members of this body can take no pride in the fact that but for the sense of responsibility and leadership of the chairman of the full Banking Committee in the other body we would probably be melting down the Capitol dome for transmission to New York to further finance the mismanagement there.

Mr. Speaker, it is patently wrong to take the view that a vote against financing New York City is an effort to punish New York City for past mistakes.

The current management of the city is basically the same as the old. The general practices and policies of living beyond what the taxpayers can afford that drove New York to the brink of bankruptcy in 1975 continue unabated under the present administration, despite protestations that a "new spirit" has taken hold in the management of city affairs.

As an example, the present administration is still giving pay raises when it is bankrupt. In the real world, raises are not available to the employees of a bankrupt company, particularly if those employees already enjoy the highest salary and fringe benefit packages in the land.

Given the city's precarious financial condition, wage cuts—not increases—should have been the order of the day. But nobody in the new city administration suggested this course of action by calling on the people of New York to make sacrifices to save their city.

If we are at a point where government must save the city from its people, then we are at a point in our history beyond which we cannot survive much longer.

The people of New York can and must save New York.

The Senate Banking Committee concluded in its February report that New York could meet its financial needs without additional aid from the Federal Government.

Since the House voted $2 billion in aid to New York City, disclosure of a $1 billion cash surplus on hand at the start of the city's new fiscal year simply underscores that finding.

Without the projected multimillion dollar pay raise, and with additional funds raised locally, New York City can do exactly what the Senate Banking Committee said it could do.

A recent poll in my district found Congressmen had a minus 51 job rating. Since that time proposition 13 has been passed. Responsibility in the Congress requires that we not ignore either one of these urgent indicators.

In approving a second Federal bailout for New York City, Congress is acting irresponsibly by not requiring the people of New York to solve their own problems, and by leaving the door open for future bailouts of other cities that have mismanaged their affairs.

The New York bailout is a sad commentary on our times when, increasingly inefficiency is rewarded, and those that do for themselves are left out in the cold.

I will not go into the litany of what New York City could, or should, have done to help itself. It fell on deaf ears during consideration of the bill.

The hope and salvation of New York City lies in the ability of the people of New York to regain control of their city from the special interest groups that have been bleeding it to death.

Federal loan guarantees—by subsidizing ongoing mismanagement—represent a setback for those who would set the city on the right track.

But taxpayers' patience is running thin. Proposition 13 made it to California last month. It is only a question of time before it, or a similar concept, reaches New York City's shores.

The taxpayers of New York City have been footing the bill for the city's mismanagement during the last decade. It is high time they got some relief. And they will, the U.S. Congress notwithstanding.

The question is will this Congress have the courage to require New York City to live within its means or will the people have to do it themselves.

The mood of the people, as demonstrated by proposition 13, establishes that if the duly elected officials of Government will not act in a responsible way to protect the taxpayers, then the people will take control. It is a sad commentary on the stewardship of Government when this is necessary.

The Federal Government's financing New York City in this fashion encourages continued mismanagement by allowing public service unions to extract more pay raises from an already overburdened people.

New York City taxpayers are the most taxed people in our Nation. Because we will not protect the people we set the stage for more revolt by taxpayers from unreasonable taxation.

We make it necessary for the people to seek leadership among volunteers rather than to depend upon those elected to the responsibility.

Where will it end?

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI).

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for yielding.

First I would like to commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MOORHEAD) for his commitment, for his tenacity, and for this final product, as well as thank the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. McKINNEY) and the other members of the committee. The distinguished chairman of the full committee, Mr. REUSS, also demonstrated exemplary leadership on behalf of this bill.

This was not an easy undertaking. At the outset it was hopeless. We had advocates and adversaries. There was hostility. But only the good will and the thoughtful considerations of our colleagues of New York City's fiscal plight and genuine effort to reform is responsible for the success of this legislation at this juncture.

The Congress is to be congratulated for its thoughtful deliberations over a very critical issue.

The gentleman from Florida (Mr. KELLY) just mentioned that it is a question of extending mismanagement. The analogy to his comment would be: Let the sick child die and wait for another to be born.

We concede there has been mismanagement in the city of New York. I have been one of the foremost critics of previous administrations. This is a new administration with evidence of genuine commitment to changing the direction of the city of New York and its management. The evidence of this has been substantial. There has been improved management coupled with great sacrifice by the people of New York.

What this legislation does is save a city. Save a city that, had it collapsed, would have impacted negatively on this entire Nation and its economy.

As far as guarantees are concerned, it does not establish a precedent because Congress guarantees loans to the tune of $300 billion. This legislation is minor by comparison. This legislation, I am certain, is salutory and I am confident that, notwithstanding the restrictions, and I believe that they are proper, that it is a good conference report. It is important that the management of the city keep its feet to the fire and hew to the line in its commitment to the Members of this Congress.

An examination of this bill would bring one to the inescapable conclusion that New York City is not getting this aid without stringent conditions. Far from being an unconditional bailout, the final version of this legislation contains the kind of requirements which if applied to all programs under which we made loan guarantees would radically restructure Federal spending policies.

This conference report is definitely the product of compromise, and in some eyes even concession. We have reduced the total amount of the guarantee down to $1.65 billion. An option is provided although limited for long- and short-term loan guarantees. The city can be subjected to inspections and audits from the Treasury Department as well as the GAO.

I have reservations about the one-House veto provision contained in the report for the guarantees provided in fiscal year 1980 and 1981. However, on balance the objection does not merit opposition to the report.

The gravity of the problem made it essential that Federal assistance be provided. We did so in 1975. Progress was made but regrettably insufficient to satisfy the private credit markets which in turn froze the city out in their most recent bid for financing. Thus we arrive at this point today.

Of the $300 billion in loan guarantees which have been provided by this Nation—none has been as important to as many people from this Nation. The survival of New York is not just a local necessity for her 8 million citizens but also for the Nation as a whole. This conference report deserves your support today.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIAGGI. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say, speaking for this Member, that besides the invincible leadership of the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI) that my vote for this package is solely because of the persuasiveness of the gentleman from New York (Mr. CAPUTO) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN).

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HYDE) for his comments.

I might add that, as chairman of the task force for the lobbying effort for this legislation, that the gentlemen from New York (Mr. GREEN, Mr. CAPUTO, and Mr. MITCHELL) were members of that task force, and they applied themselves diligently and relentlessly as did all members of the New York congressional delegation in helping produce the overwhelming vote in the House which to my way of thinking spoke of the future of this legislation.

I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY).

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. McKINNEY) for yielding me this time, and I rise in opposition to the conference report.

Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that this conference report will be approved today, but I cannot in good conscience let this moment pass without asking once again, "Is it proper and is there any need for the U.S. Government to become involved in insulating New York City from the natural economic forces which it has brought upon itself?"

I would like to call the Members' attention to an article in the New York Times on July 18, 1978. This article states that New York City began this fiscal year with $997 million in the bank. That means that the city had on hand cash enough to meet nearly two-thirds of the obligations which this bill is going to guarantee. This brings us to the question which a number of us have been raising now for 3½ years. That is, Why should the Federal Government step in to guarantee the obligations of a city whose spending and taxing policies are clearly so far out of line with fiscal responsibility that the capital markets remain closed to the city?

Are we in Congress "fools rushing in where wise men fear to tread"? We were told that this bill was vital to the solvency of the city, and we were told, furthermore, that unless this bill was law by June 30, when the last fiscal year was over, immediate bankruptcy would result. We were told the need was $2.3 billion. We were told that only a combination of short- and long-term financing would do. Then we were told the transit workers sacrificed, the pension funds sacrificed, the banks sacrificed, and so forth. I expected to see every New Yorker walking around with a bullet in his teeth. And what do we see?

A city with nearly a billion dollars in the bank. Responsibility and blame have been passed around like an old shoe, but when the city felt the time was right to pass the hat, it came straight to the Federal Government, and now we pass it back full. Today, this body will no doubt be praised for saving a great city. Our humanity and concern will be extolled. But I still cannot help wondering if we have let ourselves become caught up in another area in which we have no legal or moral place to be.

I am going to vote against this bill because it simply is a piece of legislation which the local interests, not the facts, have called for. I do not doubt that New York City needs help, financial and otherwise, but I am convinced that New York still can do much for itself. That it has done so in the past and continues to do so now is perhaps the best indication that it has the capacity for helping itself so in the future. But given politics and the state of our economy, I wonder if a city which a few short weeks ago had nearly a billion dollars in its bank accounts needs the help of the Federal Government. Local financing, we are told, will be available to the city sometime in the future, perhaps 4 years hence. Of course, by that time there will be a new Congress, and perhaps a new hat to be passed.

Before you vote on this conference report, look at the facts, look at the Constitution, and then decide.

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, at this time I have no further requests for time.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to my friend, the gentleman from New York (Mr. CAPUTO).

Mr. CAPUTO. I thank the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. Speaker, I will be leaving the House in a few months, and one of the memories I shall take with me is the support my hometown of New York City received in this moment of need. I shall appreciate that for a long time to come.

I wonder if I could engage the Chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MOORHEAD) in brief colloquy on one matter. As the subcommittee chairman knows, the severability language was not in the House version. I just want to be sure I understand what it means. It uses the word "provisions," stating that if any provision is held invalid by a court of competent jurisdiction, the balance of the provisions will be valid. "Provisions" is not a self-explanatory word. I want to be sure that if the one-House veto provisions that appear in section 104 are ruled invalid by a court of competent jurisdiction, the balance of the language in that very same section would continue to be valid. That is what we intend; that is what this language means; and that is the interpretation we expect the courts will use, if that becomes necessary.

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAPUTO. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Yes, sir. As the gentleman has stated, the severability clause was not in the House bill and, in my judgment, is not necessary because the courts would rule on that anyway. I think that when Congress passes a bill, it intends, with or without the severability, but certainly with the severability clause, that the courts should maintain all of the rest of the bill that can possibly be maintained, despite the fact that one provision, such as, for example, the one-House veto, might be declared unconstitutional.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to my alternate, the gentleman from Ocean City, Md., and that great supporter of New York (Mr. BAUMAN).

Mr. BAUMAN. I thank the gentleman for part of his characterization.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the conference report.

Mr. Speaker, when future historians view the sincerity of the collective congressional will to restrain spending and to end deficits, I am sure they will look back on this episode today. This bill is only the second act and not the third act of a multiact play. I predicted in 1975 when this bailout proposition was first put to Congress that New York City would be back. They are back again today, and they will be back again in the future. However technical and however carefully circumscribed the content of the legislation so as to protect the interests of the Federal Government, the basic issue that is avoided is the fiscal irresponsibility of the politicians of New York City which has brought Congress to this position today. That irresponsibility continues today. This bill is literally a copout on their part. It avoids the real issue. Perhaps maybe we should not be too hard on them because certainly they learned from examples set at the Federal congressional level and Federal executive level where living beyond one's means have become a way of life. But that is no reason why today we should put our imprimatur on more of this same insane fiscal policy that has gotten our Nation into the economic predicament we face today.

I would like to save New York City, too, but like a stern parent, the better way to instill discipline is not to indulge the child further but to try to teach it new ways and to mend its old ways. That is not what this legislation does, and whether we love New York or not, we are not going to help it in the long run by acceding to this kind of bailout, and that is just what it is.

Mr. Speaker, it is particularly distressing to me as a conservative to see the Members of the Republican Party in this House providing the margin of victory for the passage of this legislation. Without their votes the bill would fail. This is another reason why the party has failed to present the American electorate with a clear choice on the issue of deficit spending. I include as part of my remarks a recent Gallup Poll which undoubtedly was influenced by the public perception that there are far too many liberals in both parties who care little about inflation and spending. The passage of the bill before us may be yet another proof that the public perception is sadly correct.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 24, 1978]

REPUBLICANS LOSING EDGE ON KEY ISSUE OF SPENDING

PRINCETON, N.J.—One of the principal reasons for the GOP's relatively poor showing to date in the race for Congress is its failure to gain the advantage on key voter issues, including an issue on which Republicans have traditionally held an edge over their Democratic rivals—that of reducing federal spending.

The latest Gallup Poll report on the race for Congress shows that if elections for the House of Representatives were being held now, the political composition of the House would remain pretty much as it is today—more than 2-to-1 Democratic.

The proportion of voters who currently credit the Republican Party as better able to reduce federal spending (26 percent) is matched by the proportion who say the Democrats would perform better in this respect (28 percent). The balance either say they see no difference in the ability of the two parties to deal with this problem (31 percent) or do not express an opinion (15 percent).

Following is the question on federal spending:

"Which political party—the Republican Party or the Democratic Party—can do a better job of reducing federal spending?

| | Percent |
|---|---|
| Democratic | 28 |
| Republican | 26 |
| No difference | 31 |
| No opinion | 15 |

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN).

Mr. GREEN. I thank the gentleman from Connecticut for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report on H.R. 12426, the New York City Financial Assistance Act of 1978. At the outset, let me extend to the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from New York my thanks for their kind words on my efforts on behalf of this legislation.

I am pleased that the House-Senate Conference Committee has recommended to us a bill to provide up to $1.65 billion in Federal guarantees on New York City municipal bonds.

The guarantees, for securities with a maturity period of up to 15 years, will be provided in four annual installments. For fiscal year 1979, the city of New York will be authorized to receive up to $750 million in guarantees. Of that amount, no more than $500 million can be used for long-term obligations. The remaining $250 million, plus up to $75 million in unused long-term guarantees, can be used for short-term, seasonal financing. The total $325 million for seasonal financing will be available to the extent that the Department of the Treasury determines: first, that guarantees will be applied to obligations issued prior to January 1, 1979, and maturing prior to July 1, 1979; and second, that the city's pension funds are unable to provide sufficient seasonal financing without failing to meet Internal Revenue Code requirements. The intent of this provision is to permit guarantees of seasonal purchases by New York State pension funds.

For fiscal year 1980, $250 million in new long-term guarantees would be made available in addition to the repaid $250 million in seasonal loans, for a total long-term guarantee authority of $500 million. It is significant to point out that the amounts available in this second year under H.R. 12426 could be vetoed by resolution of either House of Congress before the beginning of the city's fiscal year.

In the third year covered by this legislation, fiscal year 1981, $325 million in new long-term guarantees would be provided. Unused guarantee authority from previous years could also be carried forward and made available. The one-House veto provision would continue to be in effect during this year.

For the final year, fiscal year 1982, up to $325 million in new long-term guarantee authority would be provided if the city presents a budget balanced according to generally accepted accounting principles. The one-House veto would not be available during this last year of the act's authority.

While this legislation, now entitled the "New York City Loan Guarantee Act of 1978," is not the optimum approach sought by New York City officials, it will enable the city to help itself to recover financially by regaining access to the private credit markets.

Reentry into private credit markets is the most important feature of long-term Federal guarantees and the most salient issue during the course of the debate on New York City financing legislation. An extension of the seasonal loan program of 1975 would not have permitted the city to raise necessary capital and restore investor confidence to allow it to return to the municipal bond market.

That is why the legislation before us today, the conference report on H.R. 12426, is so essential. For the first time, long-term Federal loan guarantees will be available—guarantees which will back up the city's municipal bonds and permit private support of the city's efforts to move onward.

The reason that we have the opportunity to give final approval to a long-term Federal loan guarantee measure is largely attributable to the strong House vote against a 3-year continuation of seasonal financing. The 92 votes by which the House endorsed the original long-term guarantee bill, coupled with the nearly 3-to-1 rejection of the short-term substitute proposal, set in motion momentum for a long-term guarantee approach that was reflected in the votes in the Senate Banking Committee and on the Senate floor.

The 44 Republican votes in favor of passage demonstrated the bipartisan appeal of long-term Federal loan guarantees and contributed substantially to making the vote margin as significant as it was. Especially noteworthy was the fact that 14 of my Republican colleagues who opposed the Seasonal Financing Act of 1975 voted in favor of this year's long-term guarantee bill.

I believe that the votes in favor of H.R. 12426 were influenced by the tough action that New York City has taken to reduce expenditures and by the strict conditions of eligibility and penalties contained in the bill. My colleagues should note that the rigorous conditions set forth in H.R. 12426 have been made even tougher by the conferees. Permit me to take a moment to highlight some of the conditions of eligibility in the New York City Loan Guarantee Act of 1978.

Under the conference measure, the city must balance its budget according to accounting principles set by New York State for the years prior to fiscal year 1982. Beginning in fiscal year 1982, it must balance its budget according to generally accepted accounting principles. It would have to continue to meet this standard for all subsequent years that the guarantees are in effect. In addition, the Department of the Treasury could impose even stricter standards. Moreover, the city will have to submit a 4-year fiscal plan each year for the duration of the guarantees.

The city must bring expenditures other than capital expenses into balance with revenues. Operating expenses and capital expenses will have to be maintained separately. Further, the city must establish a Productivity Council to review and implement methods to improve the productivity of the city's labor force.

Federal guarantees can be provided only if the remainder of the city's long- and short-term financing comes from the private market. In addition, to test the private market, the city must offer to sell short-term notes on the private market in fiscal years 1980 through 1982 and long-term bonds in fiscal years 1981 and 1982.

As in H.R. 12426, the city will pay a guarantee fee of at least one-half of 1 percent of the principal of the guaranteed obligations. The conference bill provides that 15 percent of the city's long-term borrowings in 1982 and the years following is to be used to repay the federally guaranteed loans. The Department of the Treasury could waive or modify this provision.

The conference measure also places new conditions on the State of New York. Federal guarantees can be issued after June 30, 1979, only if State assistance to the city does not fall below the fiscal 1979 levels. The State also must establish a reserve fund consisting of 5 percent of the principal amount outstanding and 1 year's interest on the guarantees to be used in the event of a default.

These are some of the additional conditions imposed by conference committee version of the New York City Loan Guarantee Act. I can imagine very few cities—or States—that would submit to such rigorous Federal oversight and intervention in exchange for loan guarantees.

With respect to remedies, it should be kept in mind that the Department of the Treasury can withhold "any payment from the United States to the city or State which may be or may become due pursuant to any law" as an offset against any default by New York City. In addition, in the event of default or bankruptcy, the United States has a priority claim over other creditors. The Treasury Department also is authorized to bring civil action to enforce compliance with the provisions of the act.

What we have before us is a strict blueprint for the application of Federal long-term loan guarantees which will support the self-help initiatives taken by New York City. I commend the efforts of all the House conferees in working to bring such a measure from the conference committee.

The conference report on H.R. 12426 deserves a strong vote of approval from both Houses of Congress. I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of this conference report so that New York City can continue the work it has undertaken to regain its financial health.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time and I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report just agreed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CITY OF COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS TO SIT DURING 5-MINUTE RULE JULY 26, 1978

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House Subcommittee on the City of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs be permitted to sit tomorrow, Wednesday, July 26, 1978, on nonlegislative business, during the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON COAST GUARD AND NAVIGATION OF COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES TO SIT DURING 5-MINUTE RULE ON WEDNESDAY, JULY 26, 1978

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Coast Guard and Navigation of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be permitted to sit tomorrow, Wednesday, July 26, 1978, during the 5-minute rule, for the purpose of holding hearings on the bill, H.R. 10371.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain the purpose of the meeting?

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, we have 3 days of hearings on the bill H.R. 10371, to provide the Coast Guard with additional jurisdiction so that it can fully deal with drug interdiction.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 11877, PEACE CORPS ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1978

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 11877) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for the Peace Corps and to make certain changes in the Peace Corps Act, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

(For conference report and statement, see Proceedings of the House of June 29, 1978.)

Mr. ZABLOCKI (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with further reading of the statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report on H.R. 11877, the Peace Corps Act amendments of 1978.

The conference report on H.R. 11877, which authorized $112.4 million for fiscal year 1979 and $3.7 million in supplemental funds for fiscal year 1978, includes the major provisions of the bill passed by the House in May.

The authorizations contained in the conference report represent a fair compromise between the amounts initially authorized by the House and Senate. Although the authorization recommended by the conference committee is an increase over the House passed figure, it is well below the $125 million which the Senate recommended, and I believe it will prove to be a worthwhile investment. As I indicated when the House initially considered H.R. 11877, the new emphasis Peace Corps is being placed on improvements in training, programing and volunteer support—all areas where committee oversight has noted deficiencies in the past—are encouraging. The agency's growing attention to basic human needs and to recruitment of qualified personnel are also positive indications of a stronger and more responsive program.

The new Peace Corps management appears to be moving cautiously and carefully in devising effective new programs to respond to requests for assistance from a growing number of countries. This authorization gives the Peace Corps necessary support to train volunteers to perform needed jobs in assisting the people of developing countries. The committee will be overseeing the activities of Peace Corps, particularly in the areas I mentioned, for indications of progress and results. We expect, and indeed will demand, that the Peace Corps live up to its stated purpose—to promote peace and friendship by providing qualified volunteers to give direct help to the people of other countries.

With these thoughts and expectations in mind, I urge my colleagues to adopt the conference report.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield mself such time as I may consume. I rise in support of the conference report on H.R. 11877. This legislation authorizes funds for the Peace Corps for fiscal year 1979. The conference agreement also contains a small supplemental authorization for fiscal year 1978, a provision requested by the administration and passed by the Senate.

The total authorization for the fiscal year 1979 programs agreed to by the conferees is $112,424,000. The amount of the supplemental fiscal year 1978 authorization is a modest $3,713,000, which includes $69,000 for increases in salary, pay, retirement, and other such employee benefits authorized by law. .

The Peace Corps has certainly had its ups and downs, and I have not hesitated to criticize its operations or management whenever I felt the situation justified it. Nevertheless, I continue to believe that the Peace Corps has generally done a good job in fielding motivated and hard-working American volunteers willing to immerse themselves in the grass roots development problems, in remote areas where the peoples' needs are great, in more than 60 countries. Always an essentially humanitarian endeavor, the Peace Corps has been increasing its emphasis on helping the poorest people in host countries to improve their ability to meet their basic human needs. This emphasis is reflected in the growing concentration of volunteer manpower in the program areas of health, food production and storage, and nutrition as opposed to the traditional emphasis on providing English teachers.

It has often been noted, but it bears repeating, that one of the most attractive aspects of the Peace Corps is its direct people-to-people nature. The fact that individual Americans will voluntarily live and work side by side with the people of host countries in an effort to help them realize their own development goals is a persuasive expression of the fundamental values and principles of American society.

I supported this bill when it originally passed the House by a wide margin on April 25. The compromises agreed to in conference on the relatively small differences between the House and Senate texts are satisfactory with respect to both funding levels and policy language. I continue to support this legislation, and I urge the House to adopt the conference report on H.R. 11877.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. WINN).

Mr. WINN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report on H.R. 11877, a bill authorizing funds for the activities and programs of the Peace Corps. I join the distinguished chairman of the committee in urging the House to adopt this conference report.

This legislation authorizes funds to enable the Peace Corps to continue its programs for people-to-people, self-help assistance to many needy persons in developing host countries. In 64 countries around the world, individual Americans are serving as Peace Corps volunteers. They are living in local communities among the people of these host countries, and they are trying to provide appropriate, practical training and technical assistance which the people of those communities can use to improve their own living conditions.

The bill as originally passed by the House authorized $96.1 million for fiscal year 1979. The Senate bill provided for $125 million. The conference committee agreed upon a compromise level for fiscal year 1979 of $112.4 million. The conference report also includes a small supplemental authorization for fiscal year 1978 of $3.7 million, which was contained in the version of the bill passed by the Senate.

The conference agreement retains a provision of the House bill to strengthen the requirements for the Peace Corp's annual report to the Congress by requiring information on Peace Corp's efforts to improve coordination with other international volunteer service agencies and with host country voluntary organizations. On the whole, however, the differences between the House and Senate on nonbudgetary issues were not serious ones.

Certainly there is room for improvement in the programing, operations, and management of the Peace Corps. But, it is generally a fairly effective program, and I feel its performance has, for the most part, shown some improvement over the last year.

On April 25, the House originally passed H.R. 11877 by a significant 195-vote margin, expressing our continuing basic belief in the unique concept which the Peace Corps represents. The compromises embodied in this conference report are satisfactory, and in light of the considerations I have just briefly touched upon, I urge the House to adopt the conference report.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN).

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report on H.R. 11877, the Peace Corps Act Amendments of 1978.

As a member of the conference committee, I believe that the report before the House represents the best efforts on the part of the House conferees to uphold the House's position. The result of our efforts also represents the best interest of the Peace Corps.

Under the terms of the conference report, $3,644,000 in supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1978 are authorized for Peace Corps programs and activities. In addition, $142,424,000 is authorized for fiscal year 1979 with 1 million earmarked for a U.S. contribution to the United Nations' volunteer program.

The conference report further provides for $69,000 in supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1978 for salaries and for employee benefits as authorized by law.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. GILMAN. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I have asked the gentleman to yield, because I am wondering about that amount of $69,000 the gentleman has mentioned. The Members will recall that last year we were advised by Mr. BROWN that the Peace Corps spent some $47,500 to pay for abortions for Peace Corps volunteers. These were the very same volunteers who were in the field in these countries supposedly to teach poor women how not to get pregnant. I am wondering if the $69,000 is for the fund that will be used for that purpose in 1979?

Mr. GILMAN. In response to the inquiry by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. YOUNG) I am informed by our staff that $45,000 was expended last year, primarily for medical evaluation of Peace Corps personnel being transported to hospital facilities.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. For abortion purposes?

Mr. GILMAN. I am informed that some of that expenditure included transportation costs for patients seeking health care, birth care and abortions care.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. The gentleman will remember that the $47,500 was the figure that we received from Mr. BROWN in which he specifically stated that the money was used for abortions for the Peace Corps volunteers. I have wondered if that is where the funds showed up in the bill, because I could not find any authorization for that and I just wondered if that was it.

Mr. GILMAN. I have been informed that the $69,000 figure is not the specific expenditure about which the gentleman inquires.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. It might be someplace else in the bill, then?

Mr. GILMAN. I would assume that the gentleman is correct.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, the committee also agreed upon the need for annual reporting on efforts to coordinate Peace Corps activities with the activities of international service organizations and host country volunteer organizations. Finally, the conferees agreed that the Peace Corps, in its efforts to encourage countries to develop their own volunteer service programs, may devote a minimal portion of its funds to furnish technical assistance, materials, tools, supplies, and training, and may conduct demonstration projects.

The Peace Corps continues to represent the true "volunteer" spirit of our Nation and remains an essential part of the overall U.S. development assistance effort. This conference report represents the best efforts of both Houses of Congress to continue this worthy tradition. The Peace Corps deserves your support. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of the conference report, No. 95–1333.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER).

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me and I rise in support of the conference report.

Mr. Speaker, the subcommittee on International Development of the Committee on International Relations has been conducting hearings on the reorganization of the Peace Corps and finding ways in which we can make the Peace Corps a more vibrant expression of our policies abroad. The committee has now voted out a bill which would, in effect, make the Peace Corps a public corporation. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the full committee is going to schedule at least 1 day's hearings so that we can have an opportunity to fully consider the reorganization of the Peace Corps. Is that true?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONKER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is correct. The full committee intends to hold hearings on the gentleman's proposal which now being considered by the Committee on International Relations.

Mr. BONKER. I thank the chairman.

I would also like to note at this time that the reorganization proposal that is incorporated in that legislation would in effect cost $12.4 million less than the amount that is provided for in the conference report.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I have no further requests for time.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

Mr. Young of Texas with Mr. Fraser.

Messrs. LUKEN, BOB WILSON, and GAMMAGE changed their vote from "yea" to "nay."

So the conference report was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE TO SIT FOR 2 HOURS TOMORROW MORNING

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce may be allowed to sit for 2 hours tomorrow morning while the House is in session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman tell us if this is for markup of a bill.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, yes, it is for markup.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Further reserving the right to object, it is a markup of what?

Mr. STAGGERS. No-fault insurance.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. No-fault insurance? Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to object, and I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Chair will state it takes 10 Members to object.

A sufficient number having arisen, objection is heard.

COMMODITY EXCHANGE ACT EXTENSION AND AMENDMENTS

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 10285) to extend the Commodity Exchange Act, as amended, for 4 years.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 10285, with Mr. MCHUGH (Chairman pro tempore) in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. When the Committee rose on Monday, July 24, 1978, all time for general debate on the bill had expired.

Pursuant to the rule, the Clerk will read the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Agriculture now printed in the reported bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 10285

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

COMPOSITION AND FUNCTIONS OF COMMISSION; CONFLICT OF INTEREST; LIAISON WITH OTHER AGENCIES; CONFORMING AND TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SECTION 1. Section 2(a) of the Commodity Exchange Act is amended by—

(1) striking out "and (vi)" in paragraph (1)(7 U.S.C. 2) in the definition of the term "commodity trading advisor" and inserting in lieu thereof "(vi) dealers, processors, brokers, and sellers of cash commodities and products thereof, (vii) nonprofit, voluntary membership, general farm organizations which provide advice on the sale and purchase of cash commodities, and (viii)";

(2) inserting "(A)" immediately after the designation of paragraph (2)(7 U.S.C. 4a (a));

(3) striking out in the second sentence of paragraph (2) "a Chairman and four other Commissioners" and inserting in lieu thereof "five Commissioners";

(4) striking out "(A)" and "(B)" in the last sentence of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "(i)" and "(ii)", respectively;

(5) adding at the end of paragraph (2) a new subparagraph as follows:

"(B) The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a member of the Commission as Chairman who shall serve at the pleasure of the President. An individual may be appointed as Chairman at the same time that person is appointed as a Commissioner. The Chairman shall be the chief administrative officer of the Commission and shall preside at hearings before the Commission. The President may, in his discretion, at any time appoint a different Chairman, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the Commissioner previously appointed as Chairman shall complete his term as a Commissioner.";

(6) striking out in paragraph (5) (7 U.S.C. 4a(d)) ", by and with the advice and consent of the Senate,";

(7) inserting in subparagraph (6)(A) (7 U.S.C. 4a(e)(1)) after "use and expenditures of funds" the words "according to budget categories, plans, programs, and priorities established and approved by the Commission,";

(8) striking out in subparagraph (6)(B) (7 U.S.C. 4a(e)(2)) "of the Commission" and inserting in lieu thereof ", plans, priorities, and budgets approved by the Commission";

(9) inserting "(A)" immediately after the designation of paragraph (7) (7 U.S.C. 4a(f));

(10) adding at the end of paragraph (7) a new subparagraph (B) as follows:

"(B) No Commissioner or employee of the Commission classified as a GS–16 or higher shall, for a period of one year beginning on the last day of service as such Commissioner or employee (i) make any appearance before, or (ii) make any written or oral communication to, the Commission, or any Commissioner or employee of the Commission, on behalf of any person (other than the United States) on any particular matter that is before the Commission if such last day of service is more than four months after the date of enactment of this subparagraph: Provided, That this restriction shall not apply to an appearance or response to a subpena or any matter of an exclusively personal and individual nature.";

(11) inserting "(A)" immediately after the designation of paragraph (8) (7 U.S.C. 4a(g));

(12) striking out in the first sentence of paragraph (8) "establish a separate office within the Department of Agriculture to be staffed with employees of the Commission for the purpose of maintaining" and inserting in lieu thereof "maintain";

(13) adding at the end of paragraph (8) a new subparagraph (B) as follows:

"(B)(i) The Commission shall maintain communications with the United States Department of the Treasury, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and the Securities and Exchange Commission for the purpose of keeping such agencies fully informed of Commission activities that relate to the responsibilities of those agencies, and for the purpose of seeking the views of those agencies on such activities.

"(ii) When a board of trade applies for designation as a contract market involving transactions for future delivery of any security or guaranteed by the United States or any agency thereof, the Commission shall promptly deliver a copy of such application to the Department of the Treasury and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. The Commission may not designate such board of trade as a contract market based on such application until forty-five days from the date the Commission delivers the application to such agencies or until such time as the Commission receives comments from each of such agencies on the application, whichever period is shorter. Any comments received by the Commission from such agencies will be included as part of the public record of the Commission's designation proceeding. In approving, refusing, suspending, or revoking the designation of a board of trade as a contract market involving transactions for future delivery of any security referred to in this section or in considering possible emergency action under section 8a(9) of the Act with respect to such transactions, the Commission shall take into consideration all comments it receives from the Department of the Treasury and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and shall consider the impact that designation, suspension, revocation, or emergency action might have on the debt financing requirements of the United States Government and the continued efficiency and integrity of the underlying market for government securities.";

(14) striking out in subparagraph (9)(A) (7 U.S.C. 4a(h)(1)) "Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry" and inserting in lieu thereof "Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry"; and

(15) striking out in subparagraph (9)(B) (7 U.S.C. 4a(h)(2)) "Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry" and inserting in lieu thereof "Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 1 be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any amendments to section 1?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GLICKMAN

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GLICKMAN: H.R. 10285 is amended by striking the "and" on page 5, line 9, deleting the period at the end of line ten on that page, and inserting in its place the following: ", and for considering the relationship between the volume and nature of investment and trading in futures contracts under the jurisdiction of the Commission and in securities and/or financial instruments under the jurisdiction of such agencies."

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I am proposing is not, in my view, a controversial amendment. It is primarily a clarifying amendment, but I am convinced that the issue addressed in my language is important to the economy. Therefore, I thought it needed to be addressed by the language in the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, my concern relates to something I expressed in the committee, and that is the relationship between futures contracts on commodities and investments in securities in general. There is no question that the activity in the futures markets over the last 5 years has expanded dramatically and that vast amounts of capital, in my judgment, have flowed out of the traditional avenue of investment, which has been the securities market, into the futures markets, primarily because there is more speculative activity there.

Mr. Chairman, during our consideration of this bill we discussed in depth the role of the CFTC and the SEC in the whole issue of futures on securities and futures on indexes.

Mr. Chairman, I came to the conclusion that the CFTC, the Agency we are reauthorizing, should keep its jurisdiction over futures, whether they be futures or aggregates in securities or futures on financial instruments; but I do believe that during the period this Agency is authorized, the agencies having jurisdiction over financial instruments, whether it be the SEC, the Treasury, the GAO, or the Commodity Futures Trading Corporation, should specifically have the obligation to consider the relationships between futures generally and futures on financial instruments, and that the jurisdiction of these matters that are under the authority of the Department of the Treasury and the CFTC should remain there.

I might close with one thing: Earlier this year I wrote to the Chairman of the CFTC, Mr. Bagley, and Chairman Schultze of the Presidents Council of Economic Advisers asking for their thoughts about the economic impact of expanded activity in the futures markets. Both made clear that they did not have any definitive, comprehensive information in this area. For example, Mr. Schultze commented:

> While these markets affect one another, there is very little information on the significance of developments in one market for performance in the other.

Both indicated the increase in volume in futures. Nobody knew what impact either one of them had on each other.

Mr. Chairman, I put this amendment in to give the agencies a little more competence in finding out during the period this Agency is being authorized what effect it will have on our capital markets.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I urge the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have no personal objection to this amendment. As far as I know, there is no objection on this side of the aisle.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN).

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there other amendments to section 1?

If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OPTIONS TRANSACTIONS; TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 2. Section 4c of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 6c) is amended by—

(1) striking out in the last sentence of subsection (a) "not have been disapproved" and inserting in lieu thereof "have been approved";

(2) amending subsection (b) to read as follows:

"(b)(1) It shall be unlawful for any person subsequent to the date of the enactment of this subsection to offer to enter into, enter into, or confirm the execution of any commodity option transaction involving any commodity regulated under this Act but not specifically set forth in section 2(a) of this Act prior to the enactment of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act of 1974, unless expressly permitted under rules or regulations that the Commission, in its discretion, may prescribe subsequent to the date of enactment of this subsection after notice and opportunity for a hearing: Provided, That this subsection shall not apply to any commodity option transaction expressly permitted under rules or regulations prescribed by the Commission, before or after the date of enactment of this subsection, to be offered to be entered into, entered into, or confirmed, to or by, a producer, processor, or commercial user of, or a merchant handling, the commodity involved in the transaction, or the products or byproducts thereof: Provided further, That if the Commission allows commodity option transactions the Commission may set different terms and conditions for different markets.

"(2) As used in this subsection, 'commodity option transaction' means any transaction or agreement which is, is held out to be, is of the character of, or is commonly known to the trade as an 'option', 'privilege', 'indemnity', 'bid', 'offer', 'put', 'call', 'advance guaranty', or 'decline guaranty'.

"(3) Nothing contained in this subsection shall affect any rights and obligations arising under any commodity option transaction entered into before the effective date of this subsection.

"(4) Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this subsection, the Commission, in its sole discretion and subject to such rules and regulations as it may prescribe without regard to the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act or any other provision of this Act, may permit any person domiciled in the United States who on May 1, 1978, was in the business of granting an option on a physical commodity and was in the business of buying, selling, producing, or otherwise utilizing that commodity to continue to grant or issue options on that commodity. Such rules and regulations, among other things, may restrict the distribution of such options to, and the offer and sale of such options by, such futures commission merchants as may be specified by the Commission. Any permission granted pursuant to this subsection may be terminated only after a hearing including a finding that the continuation of such permission is contrary to the public interest: Provided, That pending the completion of such termination proceedings the Commission may suspend the right to offer and sell options of any person whose activities in the Commission's judgment present a substantial risk to the public interest.

"(5) No rule or regulation issued or promulgated pursuant to this subsection (b) shall become effective until (i) the Commission transmits to the House Committee on Agriculture and the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry a copy of such rule or regulation, and (ii) the expiration of ten calendar days of continuous session of Congress after the date of such transmittal without either House of Congress adopting a resolution disapproving such rule or regulation.".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 2 be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there amendments to section 2?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MIKVA

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MIKVA: Page 8, lines 18 and 19, strike out "an option on a physical commodity" and insert in lieu thereof "options on physical commodities".

Page 8, line 20, strike out "that commodity" and insert in lieu thereof "physical commodities".

Page 8, line 21, strike out "that commodity" and insert in lieu thereof "physical commodities".

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, I am reluctant to interfere in the work of the distinguished Agriculture Committee, but since this affects the business community that has a larger center in my community, in Chicago, I thought it proper to do so; and also, since my concern transcends the Commodity Exchange Act and transcends the jurisdiction of the Agriculture Committee and deals with something that concerns every other Member of the House, which is that we ought not by legislation mandate monopolies.

I think that section 2, without my amendment, does just that. As I understand the language, subsection 4, section 2, page 8, allows to continue in business a company engaged in the sale of physical commodities options. One company is given a grandfather provision to stay in business, and everyone else must stay out. That is wrong.

I could have been persuaded if the act had said that everyone shall get out of the futures business of commodities altogether I could have been persuaded if there had been no grandfather clause, but if there is going to be a grandfathering, it seems to me that it ought to be spread broadly among those companies now doing business in any commodity.

My amendment says that companies now engaged in the options of physical commodities, one of them or any of them, may continue to so engage until such time as the Commission by general rules provides otherwise. I understand and sympathize with the thrust of section 2, which seeks to reverse the practice and which says that from here on in, in order to engage in these transactions, people will have to be authorized by the Commission. But, since there are people engaged in that business, it seems to me that if we are going to legalize and continue and grandfather in one such company, we ought to grandfather in all such companies. That is what my amendment does.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have a hard time in my mind finding what purpose the dealing in options serves. I was a little bit surprised at the gentleman's amendment. I have no argument with the fact that everybody should be treated equally, but I have some question on whether to open this up, as the amendment will do.

Mr. MIKVA. Let me say that the committee decided in its wisdom not to ban this activity altogether. They could have done so, and I gather that in the deliberations of the Agriculture Committee there was some expression to ban all such activities. They did not. They decided to permit the continuation of options in physical commodities, and they grandfathered in one company to be allowed to continue until such time as the Commission determines otherwise.

That is the part at which my amendment is aimed. If they decided to ban them all, fine, but I cannot see the public policy served in allowing one company to continue to engage in the sale of these commodity options.

Mr. BEDELL. Does the gentleman's amendment permit the Commission to ban these for all?

Mr. MIKVA. That does not change the general thrust of section 2, which allows the Commission, by hearing, to take away from any existing dealer the opportunity to continue in that business. It does not change that at all.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of what my colleague has just said, but I do not see how his amendment does it. In other words, suppose there is only one person doing this particular business of granting options on May 1, 1978. If there is only one, there will only continue to be one.

Mr. MIKVA. The fact is there are five or six, but there is only one engaged in the sale of more than one physical commodity and that is the only one who will be allowed to continue.

Mrs. FENWICK. But the gentleman changes the word "option" to "options."

Mr. MIKVA. But until the Commission decides otherwise, it broadens opportunities for those now in the business. This way only one company would be allowed to continue.

Mrs. FENWICK. But only one company is dealing with a lot of commodities.

Mr. MIKVA. There is only one company dealing with a lot of commodities and that is the only company that will be allowed to continue to sell a lot of commodities.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MADIGAN).

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois deals with one of the things that bothers me, because, as he points out, the bill as written and reported from the committee may grant an exclusive franchise to one firm to continue to do business in one commodity as it relates to the options business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) has expired.

(On request of Mr. MADIGAN, and by unanimous consent, Mr. MIKVA was allowed to proceed for 30 additional seconds.)

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois does address that and does provide these five or six firms which were all in business on May 1 would be allowed to continue to be in business if the Commission determines them to be of the proper character and fitness. The amendment does not mandate that decision. The Commission has the broad discretion to number of firms in this business, as of May 1, that may be allowed to trade not in only one commodity but more than one commodity.

It is a good amendment. I congratulate the gentleman on offering it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MIKVA was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL).

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois: Does this grandfather in those firms or does this simply mean they will be treated equally and the Commission can indeed prohibit dealer options as it sees fit?

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me, I would say it is my understanding the Commission will be empowered to make a decision whether or not anybody would be in this business; moreover, the Commission would be able to consider applications from any of the firms. As the bill is written, to extend the number of commodity options they could trade. The Commission would be able to consider an application from a firm only if that firm was doing business in that particular underlying commodity as of May 1 this year. There were firms doing business in some but not all of the commodities. Those firms would be limited. Those firms dealing in several commodities would continue to have Government franchise to so deal if the Commission granted their petition.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MIKVA. I yield to the distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY).

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would just interrupt to say I do not think that is a correct interpretation of the bill, as the Chair understands it.

As I understand the amendment, it would allow anyone who is trading in options of one physical commodity on May 1 to be permitted to deal with any physical commodity. The bill provides that if they are dealing with a commodity on May 1 they are entitled to deal only with that commodity and no others.

The statement has been made many times, on the floor that this grants one company a monopoly to engage in options trading. To my knowledge that is not correct. At least one if not two other companies would be able to deal with a specific commodity under the terms of this act. That is my understanding.

Mr. MIKVA. But may I say to the chairman, as I read section 4, this has to do with having the authority to request permission. The Commission can still ban such activity. It says:

> Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this subsection, the Commission, in its sole discretion and subject to such rules and regulations as it may prescribe . . . may permit any person domiciled in the United States who on May 1, 1978, was in the business of granting an option on a physical commodity—

May continue in that business.

What I object to is a statute which says only one company can apply. That is what my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, was saying. If one company was in the gold business it can continue in the gold business. If some company was in the silver business, it cannot even apply to deal in the gold business as the other company did. It grants an exclusive franchise, and that is I think wrong.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the discretion as to whether or not to allow the person to do business does rest with the Commission under the terms of the amendment being offered by the gentleman from Illinois. The Commission could limit participation as provided in the bill as it now reads, but what is important is that if circumstances change the Commission could broaden the participation it grants to certain dealers.

Mr. BEDELL. I would like to address a further question to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA). Is it true that the Commission could ban all dealer options if they wanted to, or could ban any individual firm from dealer options if they want to, regardless of whether or not this is passed?

Mr. MIKVA. Yes. The section reads:

> Such rules and regulations, among other things, may restrict the distribution of such options to, and the offer and sale of such options by, such futures commission merchants as may be specified by the Commission.

Mr. BEDELL. Is that the understanding of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. FOLEY. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, I ask for support of the amendment.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by my friend, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA), touches a very sensitive and controversial aspect of futures trading. It is one that has troubled the Commission since it was established. I am sure it has troubled everyone who has had anything to do with the legislation dealing with futures trading, and it certainly troubles me.

It is difficult to read the mind of the Commission as of this moment. I do not know whether they would elect to permit any options trading if they were to sit down and decide the question today. A few months ago it was quite true that a majority of the Commission did not favor options trading.

During the consideration of this bill a number of suggestions were made to mandate, in the language of the bill, the right to establish by statute the right of certain traders to continue their business indefinitely, or for a shorter period of time. This compromise was made to recognize that at least one firm had been in the options trading business, had apparently abided by standards of prudence and good conduct, and during the interim period in which the Commission would make a further study of this question of options trading, that particular firm and other firms who would meet the criteria set forth in law should not be denied the right to continue in business. Naturally an interruption of their business would seem unfair if at a later moment the Commission would decide to authorize options trading.

I thought the compromise was a reasonable one provided some competition did actually exist in the realm of trade conducted by the firm in question. I am not sure of the situation today. I heard the chairman of the committee say there was competition in this field. I hope so.

It may well be next spring the Commission will decide this type of trading should not be authorized and will outlaw it totally. In the meantime what is our responsibility?

I have an amendment at the desk. I am not sure I will offer it. It depends on the way in which the committee deals with the Mikva amendment.

I drafted the amendment with one purpose in mind and one only, and that was to permit, not to require, but to permit the Commission to create a field of competition in options trading. I wanted it to be clearly restricted. I did not want it to open the door wide.

I certainly do not support the language that is now in the Senate version of this bill. At some place the House conferees are going to deal with the language that is in the Senate version and that language would require—require—that the Commission authorize this type of trading.

I would like to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY), who I assume will be the manager of the conferees from the House, as to his attitude on the Senate language which mandates that the Commission permit this type of options trading.

According to a letter that I received from the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, dated July 24, directed to the chairman, they interpret the Senate bill as creating a mandatory exemption on the options prohibition if the persons satisfy a certain criteria.

In my opinion, that would be a most unfortunate step to take. I wonder if the chairman has settled in his own mind how he will react to the Senate language when the time comes.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I do not like to prejudge a conference committee. I think the gentleman has served on a number of conferences with great distinction and knows it is impossible to anticipate all the circumstances that might occur; but I will tell the gentleman that my general philosophy is that this matter should lie in the discretion of the Commission. I would be uncomfortable with a situation where the House was directly legislating in an area which would normally be a matter for Commission judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FINDLEY was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. FINDLEY. I am reassured by what the gentleman says. I do not know the extent of pressure brought to bear on the Senate side in behalf of mandatory language. I know that some very substantial interests are involved in this. That is natural: it is big business. What the Congress does on this matter can affect the fortunes of quite a number of people. I think it is absolutely essential that we leave discretion in the hands of the Commission and that we not go any further than necessary in authorizing more interim options trading. That is the concern I have, and it is a concern that causes me at this stage to voice opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA).

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MIKVA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the gentleman is very lucid in his explanation of the concerns that have been expressed by various and sundry people on different sides of this argument. What I do not understand, though, is that my amendment does exactly what the gentleman said he thought ought to be done, and that is broaden the discretion of the Commission. Under the language without my amendment, only one firm can apply. The Commission has no discretion. That is the only firm that can continue doing business in all of the commodities.

Mr. FINDLEY. If we can clarify that point, I think it would help this committee to make a decision. I believe I am correct in understanding that the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture contends that there is not just this one but that there are two or three firms who would qualify and are functioning in this field.

I wonder if the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture could elaborate on that. I think it would be very helpful.

Mr. FOLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois would yield again, it is my understanding that under the language of the bill as reported, one or two firms which have been dealing in dealer options on single commodities, would be able to deal in those particular commodities. If, for example, a firm on May 1, 1978, had been dealing in dealer options on gold and otherwise met the terms of this act, they would be able to continue to deal in gold options at the discretion of the Commission.

What the two gentlemen from Illinois are asking is, whether a firm which qualifies under the terms of the bill to deal in one commodity, should have its rights extended to any physical commodity that they may wish to deal in; such as cocoa, sugar, and silver.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FINDLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FINDLEY. But I certainly cannot support an amendment that has that effect, and I hope the Mikva amendment does not have that effect.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MIKVA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I am dealing with words that other people wrote as far as the basic language of the bill, but I wrote the amendment, and I can assure my distinguished colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, that that is not what it does. What it does is allow such firm to apply, and it would not be allowed to apply without my amendment.

Mr. FOLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois would yield further, I may have mispoken myself in the discussion. I did not intend to say that there was an automatic permission to deal in any commodity, but rather they would be allowed to apply to the Commission for such right. Let me go back and state it again. If on May 1 company X was dealing in options on gold, they would be allowed to apply under the bill to continue to deal in options on gold. They would not be allowed to apply for an exemption on cocoa or silver.

Mr. MIKVA. All right.

Mr. FINDLEY. Is that a correct interpretation of the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. FOLEY. If they are dealing both in gold and silver, they can deal in both.

Mr. MIKVA. We are not getting to what the amendment is about.

Mr. FINDLEY. Is the chairman's interpretation of the gentleman's amendment correct?

Mr. MIKVA. Yes; if a company is engaged in the sale of one commodity on May 1, they would be allowed to apply for other commodities, because, without this amendment, one company—we might as well put their name in the bill—has been given a grant to deal in all those commodities while the Commission makes up its mind; so you will have no competition in most of those commodities.

Mr. FINDLEY. I can say to the gentleman, if the gentleman could redraft the amendment to narrow it down so it would open up only options trading dealing with the commodities served by the uniquely situated trading company, then I could enthusiastically support the amendment.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I will try again to go back and explain this matter to the members of the committee who were not involved in the markup of this bill. I know this is a confusing and technical area; but, in effect, what we said was that dealing in certain types of options will be barred, except to the extent provided for by the Commission in appropriate rules and regulations. The discretion will lie with the Commission, which will ultimately decide what they want to do in this area. If the Commission decides to promptly issue rules and regulations after notice and hearings, then whatever the Commission's limitations are in this field will be, in effect, the law.

Now, in the meantime, in order to prevent some hardships to domestic companies that were already dealing in these commodities on the date this amendment was considered in the committee, we authorized the Commission to allow the continuation of dealer options trading for those companies. It was intended to be a relatively narrow exemption at the discretion of the Commission in order to prevent those companies from being automatically forced out of business during the time that the Commission was holding public hearings.

It is true that a relatively small number of companies were dealing in dealer options, in selling physical commodities of that kind on May 1; but I do not think it is correct to say that there is only one company that was involved in any dealer options. There was one company that was involved in several commodities and there were one or two others that were involved in one. What the committee preserved was the status quo for those particular companies that were actually dealing in a particular commodity as of May 1, again at the option of the Commission.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the situation, this amendment was adopted as an interim measure until such time as the Commission made its final rulemaking decision whether to permit the dealer options or not.

Mr. FOLEY. That is correct.

Mr. GLICKMAN. And this was a concern of protecting people against boiler jobs and that kind of thing; but during the interim, this was promised to us in the committee, legitimate operators would be permitted to operate, but not on a permanent franchise basis. The final rules and regulations would open the whole ball of wax for whatever options the Commission permitted.

Mr. FOLEY. That is correct.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman feel that the firms that were dealing in these commodity options on May 1 had a competitive situation as of that date which could and probably would be renewed under this authority?

Mr. FOLEY. I understand that the Commodity Futures Trading Commission has published proposed interim standards which would include at least two companies that would be covered under these interim standards.

Then if the gentleman will, he can take his guidance from this committee bill.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, in light of that assurance and after reading the letter from the Commission of July 24, in which they set forth very clearly their opposition to having this widened range of authority, I will support the committee chairman's opposition to this amendment, and I will not offer the amendment I had intended to offer.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. McHUGH). The time of the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) has mentioned a letter from the Commission which was directed to me as chairman of the committee. I would like to read a portion of it to the Members:

For generally similar reasons, the Commission opposes this amendment. As we understand it, the Mikva amendment would allow persons to petition the Commission for an exemption from the options prohibition in order to be able to grant options on any physical commodity, despite the fact that as of May 1, 1978, the business of these persons had been limited to options on a single commodity. In other words, this amendment would allow persons who on May 1, 1978, were in the business of granting only gold options to petition the Commission for permission to grant cocoa options, silver options or coffee options. We understand that your Committee had adopted the narrow exemption in Section 2(4) of H.R. 10285 only to permit certain businesses to continue their ongoing commercial enterprises. We agree with your Committee's attempt to make the potential exemption as narrow as possible. By permitting firms to expand their activities, it would appear that this amendment is contrary to your Committee's intent to control options trading. We believe that this amendment could have serious implications on the Commission's ability to regulate options trading in the future. Accordingly, we urge the House to reject this amendment.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The point is that this amendment would result in doing exactly the opposite of what the committee intended. Our intent was to draw a very narrow exemption here, because in subcommittee we considered the possibility of stopping all options trading in certain commodities because of the fact that rules and regulations had to be developed to cover this area. Because of that, what we tried to do, recognizing the problems presented by these dealer options, was to create a very narrow exception for those who were in the business of dealer options as of May 1.

However, if we adopt this amendment, it opens it up completely and does the very opposite of what we intended to do in subcommittee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. MIKVA, and by unanimous consent, Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois, but I will say ahead of time, in case the gentleman wants to make this point that his amendment does not automatically result in any expansion of the dealer options trading. That would occur only if the Commission, after being petitioned, would grant such an exemption.

Mr. MIKVA. And the class of applicants is brought not to everybody in the world but only to those people who are dealing in one or more commodities as of May 1.

Mr. FOLEY. Yes, as of May 1. And it permits them to apply for other exemptions in addition to the commodity in which they were trading, but it does qualify the Commission's authority to accept or reject any such application.

Mr. MIKVA. That is right. So it broadens the class to one or perhaps five or six who could apply, and from long practices, not just in the agriculture field, we have found it is always a mistake to, by law, give only one company the right to do anything. It is that to which I object in the present language of the bill, and that is why I offered the amendment.

I do not seek to undo the limitations of the committee. As I have told the chairman, if someone offered a motion to strike the exception altogether, I would vote for it. But if you are going to except it for one company, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that that is too narrow a class to legislate into existence.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, in whatever time I have remaining, I will point out that the committee's judgment was to leave this matter to the discretion of the Commission, to give them the opportunity to protect the ongoing business of firms which were dealing in particular options as of May 1, and put upon the Commission the ultimate judgment of what rules and regulations should apply in this field. The real question is whether we want to keep just the protection of those ongoing businesses that were dealing in commodities as of May 1, or do we want to expand it to allow the greater opportunity to petition, which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois would permit.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I will not use the 5 minutes that is allotted to me. I will say what I have to say very briefly.

What the Chairman has said is absolutely correct. It was the sense of the committee. We thought it best to leave this ultimate decisionmaking with the Commission. The Mikva amendment does not in any way change that. What the Mikva amendment says is that the decision that the Commission will make shall be broad enough so as to not create the possibility that there will be one firm in the United States which will be able to do business which no other firm would be able to engage in. That is all the Mikva amendment does. It merely broadens the authority that the Commission has. It is merely consistent with what the full Committee on Agriculture did in that sense, and it leaves all of this to be resolved by the Commission; but it saves the Commission of being in the business of granting an exclusive franchise to one firm to do business in the United States. I think it makes sense to avoid putting them in that position, and I support the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA) has brought up a very legitimate concern, and having served on the committee I see why this problem has developed. In our deliberations on the committee, this part of the bill was considered to be interim legislation. It was the desire of the committee to not increase the dealer options trading, but simply not to eliminate the people who are now doing it until such time as the Commission came up with a ruling as to whether or not all dealer options would be banned, or what sort of a rule would apply.

So I think the problem is that in our bill there is no indication of how long that interim period will last. And I think the gentleman brought up a good point, that if the Commission does not do anything, then indeed exactly what we are doing is grandfathering in some people, at the exclusion of others, over such a period of time until the Commission acts. And at least it appears to me that if we are going to stay with what is in the bill, there is some need to put some limitation on the period during which we require the Commission to act. Otherwise I think the gentleman from Illinois has a legitimate concern.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that nobody is grandfathering under this language. Nobody.

Mr. BEDELL. We do understand that. That right to apply is grandfathered.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Originally, this was H.R. 685, which was my bill, and it simply outlawed all options trading until such time as they could get things under control and stop the court cases which are going to go on for 2 or 3 years if we had not done this. But then the complaint was, "Well, you should not put people out of business which they are already in—and which was legal when they went into it—if they are not doing something wrong."

And that was the reason for giving the Commission the discretion to permit those who were not embarrassing the industry to continue selling only those contracts they were selling at the time, and permit them to take away from them that right any time they did not perform adequately.

It just seems to me that when we talk about grandfathering, nobody is grandfathered. The Commission, in its sole discretion, can permit somebody to continue to sell what he has been selling, and nothing more. Then they can take that right away from them, too, without a hearing of record. It is just a hearing, but not of record.

Mr. BEDELL. However, the bill as it is worded says that nobody else can apply to enter that field until such time as the Commission does issue its regular rules and regulations; does it not?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is right. We did not want to expand and get people into a new business. Otherwise we are going to have to get 100 of them in.

Mr. BEDELL. I think we all agree to that.

I think the legitimate problem which the gentleman has raised is that if the Commission does not act for 5 years, then there is no possibility for anybody else; if they continue to let those who are in it operate, there is no opportunity for anybody else to get in and compete with them.

That would seem to me to be wrong.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The Commission could act before that. Anyway, the legislation expires before that.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDELL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I think on that point alone, that is a legitimate concern, whether the Commission is going to come up with rules and regulations. However, when we allow this kind of discretion on an interim basis for those companies and then make a decision, there will be a legitimate excuse not to come up with rules and regulations because they already have the power to exercise that discretion.

We want rules and regulations. This amendment would simply give them the room to maneuver without acting.

Mr. BEDELL. It would seem to me, at the very least, that if the Mikva amendment is defeated, we should have some wording in the report indicating that we expect the Commission to come up with rules and regulations in a reasonably short period of time.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, the report is already prepared. I believe we should decide whether or not it is wise to force the Commission to a decision. If it is, then we have to arrive at a period of time in which to demand that they act.

I know there are probably arguments for or against that. I personally oppose the Mikva amendment procedure, but I do believe that we should seriously consider whether or not there should be a limitation of time in which these interim companies can operate and then cut it off and say, "You cannot operate."

If the Commission cannot come up with reasonable rules and regulations to regulate this industry, then we should not have it.

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do want to point out that the subcommittee worked long and hard on the option sections of H.R. 10285.

For that reason, I do oppose the Mikva amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that the purpose of the committee bill is to limit the trading in options. The gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY) has well explained the intent of the bill and the reasons we should not have this amendment.

The gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA) did a very splendid job in pointing out that we have not grandfathered anyone in this bill, and we have left it to the Commission to do so, to make their own decisions.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment represents an effort to broaden the exceptions to the ban on trading in commodity options. The committee did intend that dealers in certain types of options be allowed to continue in their present business, but not to expand into new option endeavors.

The Commission has contacted the chairman of the committee in opposition to this amendment, for they believe that, as has already been pointed out, it would have serious implications with respect to the Commission's ability to regulate the options trading.

Mr. Chairman, I would hope that the Members of the House would agree with the committee that trading options have presented innumerable problems, and I urge my colleagues to defeat this amendment.

I would point out again that the committee has not grandfathered anything in, but has left it to the wisdom of the Commission to make whatever decision might be made.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, there has been concern stated here during the debate on this amendment as to whether or not the Commission has a time frame in which it can operate to adopt rules and regulations as to whether or not to permit options trading.

Does the gentleman from Tennessee have any positions on that?

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. In answer to the gentleman's question, Mr. Chairman, the committee did not decide on any time frame. It was not discussed. There is actually no reason why there could not be a time frame.

Mr. VOLKMER. If we could work something out, the gentleman would have no objection to a time frame so as to give the Commission sufficient time in which to operate; is that correct?

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. I have no objection, as the chairman of the subcommittee, to any practical time frame.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MIKVA).

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. MIKVA) there were—ayes 8; noes 21.

So the amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FINDLEY

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FINDLEY: On page 8, line 16, after the word "permit" add the following: "for a period not to exceed nine months".

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think many of us dealing with this legislation were under the impression that the language of the bill actually established a time certain by which the Commission must settle the question of options trading. In authorizing this interim period of limited character I, for example, expected that this interim period could not extend beyond March 31 of next year. In examining the bill, that deadline, that expectation, is not clear.

For that reason, I have offered this amendment, which would create this interim period authority for the Commission only for a 9-month period following enactment of the bill.

This amendment will limit to a period ending sometime in the spring of 1979 the time during which the Commission may authorize options trading under the interim conditions specified in section 2(4). The 9-month period would begin with the enactment of this legislation and, of course, would not be renewable.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, speaking only for myself, I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment. I would personally accept it.

Mr. FINDLEY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I think it is an excellent amendment.

Mr. FINDLEY. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY).

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any other amendments to section 2?

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the bottom of page 2, which would be at the end of title I, the preceding title.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FITHIAN

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to title I.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FITHIAN: Page 2, after line 20, insert the following new paragraph.

(4) adding a new sentence at the end of subparagraph (A) of paragraph (2), as follows: "Each person nominated for appointment to the Commission by the President (and the spouse and dependent children of such person) shall not have received, during the three-year period preceding such nomination, gifts of any significant value (excluding gifts of less than $25 in value and including gifts of transportation, lodging, food and entertainment) from any person who is subject to regulation by the Commission or who has interests subject to regulation by the Commission."

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York (Mr. RICHMOND), the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL), and myself had originally intended to offer a much more comprehensive amendment to this section dealing with the qualifications of members of the Commission. Upon lengthy consultation today with the distinguished subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. JONES) and the full committee chairman, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY) and others, it was decided that it would probably be a waste of our time to attempt such a comprehensive writing into the legislation of what the qualifications should be.

Therefore, I offer what I believe to be a very simple amendment, and for which I apologize to the House for its not being more comprehensive, for those of us on the subcommittee worked long and hard, and I am sure those preceding this particular subcommittee have worked long and hard to try to establish the Commodity Futures Trading Commission as a viable body, an important regulatory body.

I would remind the House that this Commission regulates $1 trillion worth of business and it is going to be an exploding amount in the next 5 years. We have had a particularly unfortunate situation develop in which a Commissioner has recently been appointed, the most recent appointment, and so far as we can determine he is not only not qualified for the position but also he brings to the Commission a cloud of suspicion because of the acceptance of $72,000 in gifts for his children, from a major commodities trader.

It is not the kind of thing in my judgment that will enhance the Commission's work. It is not the kind of thing that will cause the Commission to be widely respected throughout the United States.

We on the subcommittee have very serious questions about the confirmation of this gentleman. More recently the President and Vice President have reversed their support and have called for his resignation, joining those of us who called for his resignation earlier. We have however the constitutional principle established that this is an independent regulatory Commission, and therefore, we can only remove a member by the process of impeachment. Quite frankly no one believes Mr. Gartner committed an impeachable offense, for he concealed nothing from the administration and he concealed nothing from the Senate which would have prevented his confirmation or prevented them from judging his confirmation differently.

But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, we can at least as one-half of the legislative body stand up and say at this time that in all future confirmations and appointments we do not need to appoint to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission a person who has accepted gifts from organizations or firms or individuals who will be subject to the regulations of this Commission.

Therefore, the amendment I now offer is a relatively simple amendment prohibiting a person from being confirmed who has accepted a gift of significant amount in the 3 years preceding his nomination to the Commission.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITHIAN. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman clarify for my edification this point. Did he say all this information came out before the gentleman he has referred to was confirmed?

Mr. FITHIAN. Yes. It is my information that the White House was informed in advance, a conflict of interest search was made by the attorney for the White House and for the Vice President, and this was then discussed with the prospective Commissioner, and they decided to send the nomination forward and to allow the Senate to render its best judgment.

It was, however, for a series of reasons rushed along in the Senate in their confirmation proceedings and only one question I believe was raised about the gift, and the prospective Commissioner agreed to ask the trustee to sell the stock in Archer-Daniel-Midland, which was the subject of the gift to the four Gartner children.

The Senate did have the information at the time they had confirmation hearings. Subsequent to that members on our subcommittee raised some questions about this, and the Senate, acting in its own wisdom, decided to recall Mr. Gartner for a subsequent postconfirmation session, which they did. There was then an attempt by our own distinguished colleague, a former member of this committee, Mr. MELCHER of Montana, to offer an amendment on the floor of the Senate which would essentially remove the Commissioner. This failed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FITHIAN was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, now comes the question: Can this House say anything about the qualifications of persons who are nominated to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission? I believe this House can and I believe this House should. I do not intend that the House intrude itself into the jurisdiction or domain of the Senate for the confirmation hearings. But I do believe that those of us who want to see a viable and strong Commodity Futures Trading Commission which can deal with the giants of our economic world should raise a voice in terms of qualifications, and this is a very minimal step.

I would also point out that this position of the Commissioner is in my judgment one of the most important, most sensitive economic appointments in the U.S. Government.

Barring possibly the Chairman of the SEC, the Federal Reserve Board and the Secretary of the Treasury, no one makes economic decisions that are equal to these Commissioners. I would plead with the House, therefore, to accept this very humble and very small amendment to this bill which would simply say that no one having received gifts during a 3-year period, gifts of significant value should be nominated or confirmed to that position.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITHIAN. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the concern the gentleman has and I appreciate his being concerned. I think we should all be concerned about these kinds of situations. But, if I read the amendment correctly, it seems to me that anyone who has ever been taken to lunch by anyone who trades on the Chicago Board of Trade or the Mercantile Exchange, or anywhere else, where the bill for that lunch might run more than $25, that that person would be, for a period of 3 years, ineligible for appointment to the Commission. Therefore, if the best lawyer in this kind of work in the whole country was up for consideration, if he had ever been a guest at a luncheon within the previous 3 years, he could not be considered. Is that correct?

Mr. FITHIAN. I would hope the phrase "significant value" would be interpreted by the Senate, and by any future administration differently. Is the gentleman objecting to the $25 section?

Mr. MADIGAN. If the gentleman will yield further, the language is all contained within the parentheses, it says gifts of $25, including lodging, transportation, food, it would seem to me that that is all inclusive and would cause a person not to be eligible for a period of up to 3 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FITHIAN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. FITHIAN. I would be amenable to any other suggestions by the gentleman from Illinois, but perhaps in the days of the three martini lunch question we should have a tight definition of "gift."

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITHIAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have read the amendment. It would disqualify from consideration for appointment anyone who had ever accepted an airline ticket to attend a convention and make a speech at a convention.

Mr. FITHIAN. No, if I may interrupt, I do not believe that construction could be placed on that. If you were to go to make a speech somewhere, the cost of getting there and back are certainly not gifts, costs, and honorariums are supposedly for work performed so that would not be covered.

Mr. FINDLEY. The amendment, I must say, is not too clear on that point. That is why I raised the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time for the purpose of asking my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. FITHIAN), a couple of questions.

The thought occurred to me, and I know the gentleman has had quite a lot of experience in the study of the separation of powers. I do not argue with the gentleman whatsoever that it casts some light that would have been better not cast on the Commission by having this presented, but the fact is, does the gentleman really question or wish to take away the decisionmaking ability from the executive branch? Whether they used good or bad judgment, maybe they did use good judgment. I am not trying to pass judgment on that, but does the gentleman want to take that authority away from them where they could have to exclude people who might be qualified for consideration to appointment?

Mr. FITHIAN. If the gentleman will yield, I thank the gentleman for the question. It just seems to me that we ought to, as a legislative body, do those things which we can to strengthen the credibility of one of the most powerful agencies in the U.S. Government, and so, in answer to your question, yes. I think it is perfectly legitimate for the House to specify that. Perhaps one would argue with the amount, but the principle is whether we want to specify that we will not appoint people to the Commission who have accepted gifts?

Mr. SYMMS. Could I ask the gentleman a further question. The gentleman told me all the things that he considered distasteful about the appointment of a certain commissioner, but were there some positive factors to this commissioner? Was there some reason why the administration did want to appoint him? Did he have some experience that they thought might be helpful on the Commission?

Mr. FITHIAN. I must say I have this appointment on only two grounds. One is, was this person qualified in the sense of experience to deal with the enormously complex and taxing and responsible position? I had to say no. The second was, was there anything else about this nomination which would cause us to be concerned about the credibility of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission? I said yes. Anyone who has accepted $72,000 from Archer-Daniels-Midland, the third largest commodity traders in the United States, whether there is anything wrong with it or not, I am not really making that judgment. I am simply saying that in this day and age, looking at that kind of gift, I raise this question as to whether that is the best we can do. My answer is no, it is not. So I found not only a potential conflict of interest which brought a cloud to the Commission but no compensating offsetting qualities which would lead anyone to say, but he is so eminently qualified to be commissioner that he ought to be commissioner in spite of having accepted $72,000 in gifts. I am sure that gentleman, from my investigation, is absent the qualifications for this position.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SYMMS. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I sense the outrage that the author of this amendment has expressed with relation to the latest appointment to the Commission. I can see why he is embarrassed about his President making this appointment, but I think the amendment goes too far. If we start to analyze the effects of the amendment, it would probably prohibit any Member of Congress or the Senate who had received campaign contributions in the previous 3 years from being appointed to the Commission. That is obviously not one of the intended effects. I think any person who has been involved with farmers, a practicing attorney who had received a gift from a farmer, could not receive a nomination as a result of this. I think that the Securities and Exchange Commission has operated very well over the last 40 years, and it does not have this kind of rule, regulation, or law governing it. I think we have to accept the fact that perhaps a bad appointment has been made. The Senate perhaps made a bad decision, but this amendment will not probably cure the situation that the gentleman is trying to.

Mr. SYMMS. I thank the gentleman very much. I am sorry he compared the Commodity Futures Commission with the Securities and Exchange Commission. If we are going to use that as a touchstone, we are in trouble.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SYMMS. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I cannot understand the objections to this amendment. It seems to me so obviously clear that we must do something to say in the House of Representatives that a mistake was made and that we hope very much it will not happen again. That is what this amendment is doing.

Mr. SYMMS. I thank the gentlewoman. I have not meant to raise an objection to the amendment. I have just been enjoying hearing my friend, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. FITHIAN) be critical of his own administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. FITHIAN).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITHIAN) there were—ayes 5, noes 16.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time to engage the distinguished gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY), the chairman of the committee, in colloquy with reference to the language on page 4, section (10)(B):

> No Commissioner or employee of the Commission classified as a GS–16 or higher shall, for a period of one year beginning on the last day of service as such Commissioner or employee (i) make any appearance before, . . .

The reason I am engaging the gentleman from Washington in this colloquy is for some guidance with reference to a similar problem which we have had in the Committee on Banking, Finance, and Urban Affairs. I am referring now to the Bank Regulatory Act which we recently reported out of that committee. We have provided that any member of the FDIC, Federal Reserve Board, Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and so forth, cannot appear before any of those boards or commissions within 3 months after the termination of service on the Board on the theory that there might be some conflict of interest.

I would ask the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY), what is the rationale for this language? Have there been abuses?

It seems to me that some of these persons might be denied the opportunity for employment in their area of expertise and unless they are independently wealthy it might limit the people who might be appointed to these commissions or be appointed as employees of the Commodity Exchange Commission.

I know we are trying to get at the problem of the so-called revolving-door employee; but I would just, if I might, like some guidance as to why that language is included in this bill and if we should include it in other bills which come before this House?

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WYLIE. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I might in a moment ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to the author of this amendment, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. FITHIAN), who can perhaps offer a more persuasive exegesis of the rationale for the amendment than I can.

I personally have some reservations, some rather strong reservations, about how far this amendment goes. I think it goes too far. I opposed it when it was offered in the committee, because I think it has the effect that the gentleman described of perhaps denying to the Commission some very talented, able people, who might otherwise accept employment with the Commission, but who may determine that the restrictions upon their future appearance before the Commission as lawyers, for example, are so great that they prefer not to perform public service. At least, I think this is a concern we ought to attend to in writing these so-called revolving-door restrictions.

It is very important, in my judgement, that these Commissions have the best available people. I do not think it serves that purpose if we put too heavy a mortgage on the future activities of members of the Commission in their subsequent private employment. However, I am constrained to point out that I was not on the prevailing side when this amendment was adopted.

The gentleman from Ohio may want to yield time to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. FITHIAN) in order that he might express concerns he expressed in the committee.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I would submit that this might extend to representation by many consumer groups before the Commodity Exchange Commission. I will say, this is a problem which has caused me considerable anxiety. Of course, I do not want to put the stamp of approval on conflicts of interest. I do not want to put the stamp of approval on a situation where a member of the Commodity Exchange Commission, or an employee, might be spending his last 3 to 6 months looking for somebody to work with after he leaves his employment with that Commission who will be appearing before the Commission; but on the other hand, I do not want to make employment so restrictive that otherwise qualified people might not want to serve.

I might say, I received a letter from Mr. Ralph Lazarus, who is the chairman of the so-called Business Roundtable, and he suggested what we might do in the case of bank regulatory agencies is to provide compensation for 3 months after the end of a Commission's term, so they would not have to be looking for work or employment or trying to line up something during the last few days before their termination to avoid a conflict of interest.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. WYLIE was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, in this additional time, I would like to yield to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. FITHIAN), who I understand is the author of this amendment.

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The amendment which was offered in our subcommittee, as drafted by the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL) and carried over into the full committee, is an attempt on the part of the gentleman from Iowa and myself to attempt in some small way to close the revolving door which seems to spin freely here in Washington.

The amendment does not say that this GS–16 or above could not go to work for a commodities firm. It simply says that he could not, after leaving the Commission, go to work for a commodities firm and represent that firm before the Commission. In other words, he could not return and present to his former colleagues on the Commission advice, recommendations, or whatever on behalf of the firm

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I take it, then, that the gentleman found there were some abuses in this area?

Mr. FITHIAN. This is certainly the case, Mr. Chairman. On agency after agency, I might say, I have sponsored a revolving door bill, and that is pending in the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

For example, not long ago, about 2½ or 3 years ago, someone who was in the process of prosecuting for one of the commissions was hired away by that firm in the midst of the period when her division was actually prosecuting the firm. Now, that is the most egregious violation that I know anything about, but it goes on to some extent throughout the Government.

The problem that I think the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE) and the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY) referred to—and it is a problem which is very real—is this: How do we close the door enough that we do not get this running back and forth and create advantages to those who hire people away from the agencies, whether it is the EPA or the CFTC or whatever and still not discourage them entirely?

I think this compromise does that. It says:

> You can go to work for them, but you yourself cannot come down and represent the firm before your former colleagues.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure I am entirely satisfied, but I thank the gentleman for his explanation.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE) has expired.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. BRADEMAS) having assumed the chair, Mr. MCHUGH, Chairman pro tempore of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 10285) to extend the Commodity Exchange Act, as amended, for 4 years, had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill, H.R. 10285, which has been under consideration today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 2777, NATIONAL CONSUMER COOPERATIVE BANK ACT

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 2777) to provide for consumers a further means of minimizing the impact of inflation and economic depression by narrowing the price spread between costs to the producer and the consumer of needed goods, services, facilities, and commodities through the development and funding of specialized credit sources for, and technical assistance to, self-help, not-for-profit cooperatives, and for other purposes with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and request a conference with the Senate thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island? The Chair hears none and, without objection, appoints the following conferees: Messrs. REUSS, ST GERMAIN, ANNUNZIO, and DERRICK, Ms. OAKAR, and Messrs. PATTERSON of California, STANTON, ROUSSELOT, and WYLIE.

There was no objection.

THE GROWING PROBLEM OF OBSOLETE NUCLEAR REACTORS

(Mr. RYAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, in April, the Government Operations Committee filed a report with the House entitled "Nuclear Power Costs," which was prepared by the Environment, Energy and Natural Resources Subcommittee which I chair. The report has been highly controversial. In fact, it has been the subject of unusually harsh comments in Congress and by the nuclear industry.

In relation to that controversy, I noticed in the San Francisco Chronicle of July 5, an article on Andre Cregut, who happens to have built most of the important nuclear powerplants in France. I highly recommend Cregut's comments to my colleagues, since they validate the conclusions drawn by my subcommittee report on the problems of nuclear powerplants. Andre Cregut notes that nobody has been able to dismantle a commercial atomic reactor—and with dozens of nuclear plants reaching obsolescence soon, scientists and governments are now beginning to face up to the immensely serious problems involved. Monsieur Cregut has decided to spend the rest of his life finding a way to dismantle these plants he has erected.

When so many sides are presented on such a controversial issue as nuclear power, the average person in America is left with the difficult decision of whom to believe. And on an issue as terribly serious as nuclear power, accurate information is vital. The contents of this article, which is printed below for my colleagues' benefit, present the best evidence available that this one area of the nuclear power issue has not been resolved yet—and that it must be. Outdated reactors cannot be dismantled—yet. We simply must face up to this fact before we continue to spend billions of the taxpayers' dollars on this type of energy.

The article follows:

THE GROWING PROBLEM OF OBSOLETE NUCLEAR REACTORS

MARCOULE, FRANCE.—For the last 20 years. Andre Cregut has built most of the important nuclear power plants in France, including the controversial Phoenix breeder reactor that rises amid the vineyards and medieval villages here on the bank of the Rhone river.

But Cregut, a robust 50-year-old engineer, has now decided to spend the rest of his active years figuring out how to dismantle the nuclear plants he has erected. This is not a case of a conscience-stricken scientist converted to environmentalism. Quite the contrary, Cregut is as convinced as ever that nuclear power plants will continue to grow as an essential source of energy for the foreseeable future.

But nobody has yet been able to dismantle a commercial atomic reactor. With dozens of nuclear plants reaching obsolescence throughout the world, scientists and governments have begun facing up to the troubling problems of ridding the landscape of these dangerously radioactive structures, and estimates for the clean-up operations are running into the billions of dollars.

Reactors usually have a life-time of 20 to 40 years. Like any other machine, they may wear out from use, suffer irreparable damage from accidents, undergo repeated breakdowns that become too expensive to repair, or simply be rendered obsolete by new technological breakthroughs.

Already 20 nuclear power plants have been closed in the Western industrialized world—15 in the United States and five in Western Europe, including two in France. By the year 2000, there will be more than 100 inactive atomic plants.

In addition, there are hundreds of smaller nuclear installations—research accelerators, fuel enrichment and reprocessing plants, navy ship reactors, nuclear medicine facilities—that have ceased to operate.

All of them will remain radioactive, for hundreds or even thousands of years. In many cases, these closed nuclear installations pose a greater threat than when they were in use. Their security systems—the anti-radiation shields, alarms, ventilation and detection devices—have been largely removed. Even if they are guarded perpetually by security personnel, they are bound to deteriorate and eventually leak radioactivity.

"Even if we entombed these plants, there is no way to be certain that after 500 or 600 years the protective casing will be physically maintained or guarded," said Cregut, who heads the French government's program to deal with obsolete nuclear installations. "Do we have the moral right to leave these plants in place knowing that it will take hundreds, perhaps thousands of years before they cease to be dangerously radioactive?"

This question is being asked by other governments as well. Last year, in a report to Congress, the Comptroller General of the United States criticized nuclear agencies and private industry for ignoring the "problem of protecting the public from the hazards of radiation lingering at nuclear facilities which are no longer operating."

In May, the European Economic Community proposed a five-year research program on the problems involved in dismantling nuclear reactors. And the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna has been calling attention to the hazard at least since 1975.

In France, it was Cregut who first proposed to the government in 1974 that it start a program to deal with obsolete atomic plants. He had just completed directing the construction of the Phoenix breeder, a type of reactor that is the focus of a controversy between West European governments and President Carter, who opposes it because it uses and produces plutonium, which can be used for weapons.

"My boss congratulated me for handling the construction of Phoenix so well," said Cregut. "I told him that I hoped he would congratulate me again when I figured out how to take it apart safely."

Cregut then set about amassing studies of the Phoenix plant during the next four years. The fruit of his labors is in a room next to his office that has aisles of shelves from floor to ceiling and that he hopes includes the data necessary to dismantle the breeder reactor.

Cregut's plan follows roughly the lines proposed by other experts—mothballing, entombment and complete dismantlement. In the United States, nuclear plant owners are given an option of any one of these methods to deal with their obsolete installations. Cregut does not believe that the hazard ends until complete dismantlement takes place.

In mothballing, the reactor is welded shut with steel and the facility is placed under permanent guard. This has been done at the Marcoule G1 plant, a military reactor that produced plutonium for French nuclear weapons until it was shut down ten years ago. But Marcoule G1 has developed cracks, leaks, radiation and, according to Cregut, will have to be dismantled eventually.

Entombment involves encasing the reactor in concrete. But it also requires permanent monitoring and security for centuries.

Dismantling involves the complete removal of the reactor and the rest of the plant, and the restoration of the site for other activity. No one has yet attempted it with a commercial-size nuclear reactor, and even in the few cases involving smaller installations, it has proved a difficult and expensive task.

"I think in this respect France has an advantage over the United States or West Germany," said Cregut. "Here the government owns the nuclear plants and has clear responsibility to deal with them when they become obsolete. In the United States and West Germany, a private company can always go bankrupt, and then what happens with its obsolete reactors?

"How can they be monitored for future generations?"

Nuclear experts in the United States and Western Europe have suggested that new atomic plants be designed with their eventual dismantling in mind. But no one knows yet what this would mean in terms of building material and added costs.

Meanwhile, it will still take years of research on dealing with existing plants before it will be known at what point radiation levels are low enough to permit dismantling. Then the equipment needed to take the plant apart can be designed. It will take additional years to carry out pilot experiments with smaller installations to build a reservoir of experience for use on larger commercial plants.

"I feel we're at the same stage now in our knowledge of dismantlement that we were with Phoenix, say, back in 1958, when it was first conceived," said Cregut. "Phoenix appeared impossibly difficult to carry out 16 years ago, and now it seems easy. At this point, dismantlement also seems just as difficult. I'll have more confidence when the budget exists to let us do what we want to do.

"By the time I retire, I want to have a clear conscience that everything I built can be taken apart properly," Cregut said. "I don't want people to think of me like that genius who invented the plastic bottle and never figured out how to get rid of the damned thing."

HEARINGS ON DOD'S MORALE, WELFARE, AND RECREATION PROGRAM

(Mr. DAN DANIEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Speaker, for over a year now I have chaired the nonappropriated fund panel of the Subcommittee on Investigations, House Armed Services Committee, which has been conducting hearings on the morale, welfare, and recreation program within the Department of Defense. Our hearings are not yet completed, but I feel that I should bring to your attention and the attention of the distinguished Members that there has been a great deal of misunderstanding about the DOD MWR program and the nonappropriated funds which help support it. I hope to clear up some of this confusion.

An MWR program can be a gymnasium where our military people can keep physically fit—a library where they can find materials for self-education purposes or purely for pleasure—a hobby shop where they can repair their own TV or car—a child care center where military parents can be assured of adequate care for their children while working to make ends meet—a youth center where dependent youth (ages 6–16) can spend their leisure time in professionally planned social, civic, sports, and outdoor activities—a recreation center where alternatives can be found to undesirable elements often found near military installations. And these are just a few of the programs. In a nutshell, the DOD MWR program is designed to maintain and improve the mental and physical well-being of our Armed Forces personnel; to give them a feeling of belonging and esprit; to maintain high morale, which in turn, increases productivity; and to meet the competition of private and public businesses for recruitment and retention of personnel.

I am firmly convinced that the MWR program plays a vital role in the defense of our Nation. We need only look at our Military Establishment to realize why. Our uniformed people are scattered throughout the world. Many are in places that once were considered as good assignments and were attractively advertised in recruitment brochures. Today, in most of these locations, there are rampaging increases in the cost of living due to the devaluation of the dollar—in fact, some of our military members are receiving food baskets from their hosts and are going deeper in debt as the days roll by. Inflation is also taking its toll in our own country. At home and abroad, we see more and more cases where both parents of the military family have to work, not because they want to, but because they must. A well-rounded MWR program within the DOD is an absolute necessity, not something just nice to have. To begin with, military families are often separated for extended periods of time. The military member is on call 24 hours a day, 365 days a year, and we have a much younger grouping than in the civilian sector. For example, the Air Force reports that over half of its enlisted force is below 26 years of age, and over 40 percent are on their first enlistment. MWR programs provide alternatives to drugs, alcohol, and other undesirable pursuits for these men and women. Over 60 percent of the enlisted members are married. Also, the number of women in uniform and the number of military couples are expected to double between now and 1983.

We have to meet the MWR needs of these people to recruit and retain a professional military force, for recently published information indicates a growing recognition on the part of industrial leaders for recreational and social programs for their employees. For example, consider the recent comments of the chairman of the board for Goodyear Tire and Rubber Co.

All of this costs money, but we consider it money well spent because it lets our employees know we care about them over and beyond what they produce on the job. Recreation becomes a key factor in productivity by giving the individual status and recognition as well as improivng his or her morale.

In other words, industry is saying that recreational and social programs are a cost of doing business.

All in all, the amount of money being spent by American industry on recreational and social programs is growing yearly. Understandably, most programs in the civilian sector are not completely free to the employee—but they are supported by dollars consciously spent out of corporate income. I also hasten to add that military personnel, likewise, do not expect these programs to be provided them free. They do, however, expect the Government to pay its fair share. Well, what is a fair share? Historically, the philosophy for funding this program in our military has been based on the concept that it is the Government's obligation to provide for the welfare of the troops with appropriated funds, supplemented with nonappropriated funds if and when necessary. But, according to information provided by DOD, the facts do not track with this philosophy. Instead, only about 25 percent of the total support cost for the DOD-wide MWR program is provided by appropriated funds.

For a better idea of how the funding of this program actually breaks out, let us return to the Air Force for just a moment to see who pays for what. Of the approximate $176 million of appropriated fund support of MWR received by the Air Force in fiscal year 1977, over $100 million was expended for programs such as sports/physical fitness, hobby shops, libraries, child care and youth activities, and outdoor sports and recreation. Another $18½ million was expended for officer and consolidated open messes which provide required dining facilities as a substitute for messhalls or field ration messes. Also, $16 million supported enlisted open messes. The balance, $41½ million, supported essential command and supervisory staff, maintenance and supply functions, and so forth. I believe that all of these are legitimate Government expenses. On the nonappropriated fund side, Air Force members, through purchase at exchanges and the payment of fees and charges in MWR activities, provided over $345 million to support the program.

While on the subject of funding, I would be remiss if I did not address an area of the program which overrides all other funding considerations. I refer to the people cost of operating and managing MWR activities. Again, I would like to look at the Air Force which had an MWR work force of a little over 45,000 in March 1978. Of these 45,000 employees, about 89 percent were nonappropriated fund types—in other words, their salaries were paid from self-generated income. Only 11 percent of the individuals involved in MWR management and operations were paid for with funds appropriated by the Congress. Over 70 percent of these appropriated fund people are utilized in those activities previously mentioned such as physical fitness facilities, libraries, hobby shops, dependent youth programs, and open messes, and are used primarily for executive control and essential command supervision.

As you know, we in Congress arbitrarily placed a ceiling on the number of military personnel that could be used in this program in the fiscal year 1978 DOD Appropriations Act. I submit that we all must be mindful that such arbitrary limitations may significantly diminish the ability of the services to provide an adequate MWR program for their personnel at locations where it is needed most; that is, at remote sites and overseas locations. While our motives were sound, our methodology was not. This action on our part was announced at the last minute in the budget review process. It did not permit adequate leadtime for orderly adjustments and resulted in personnel turbulence and in significant increases in nonappropriated fund costs. In the Air Force alone, the signed to it MWR program could very well reach $5.1 million, which was not budgeted for because of inadequate leadtime. And, with inflation eating up both appropriated and nonappropriated fund dollars at a rapid rate, increased fees and charges and program adjustments are becoming necessary.

We are all familiar with the financial problems our younger military members are having overseas. Increased MWR costs to them and a reduced program cannot help but make them wonder if we care. A recent study by the Air Force, in response to a request by the Congress, revealed that between 1975 and 1977, fees and charges in MWR increased by 14 percent, the Consumer Price Index increased by 12.5 percent, yet base pay increased by only 10 percent. I don't think we should continue to ask the military member to bear the brunt for actions over which he has no control.

The last minimum wage increase will cost the Air Force alone over $5½ million in NAE's. The annual "white collar" pay raise for NAF employees, which is coupled with the Civil Service annual raises, costs the Air Force over $1 million per year. Additionally, the Randolph-Sheppard Act Amendments of 1974 have a great potential for reducing the NAF income in DOD. Estimates indicate this impact could be as high as $50 million per year, depending upon how actual implementation takes place.

What are the alternatives for the future? I see, basically, three. We can continue our present level of support, we can increase the level of support, or we can require additional reductions. This is a decision we must make. When we make this decision, we must consider all the factors and impacts.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that further reductions in MWR support are not in order. This program is very important to our military people, to our national defense posture, and to our Nation. The men and women serving our country deserve our conscious and careful consideration of this issue. As for me, I feel that the MWR program and the benefits we, the Nation, derive from it deserve our full continued support.

A BAD SETTLEMENT

(Mr. RUDD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked by the President's statement at his news conference last week that, in his opinion, public employees have the right to strike.

He made his statement in response to a question by the Arizona Republic's Washington bureau chief, Ben Cole.

The Presidents' position is intolerable. The danger of public employee unionization and collective bargaining was highlighted by the threatened postal strike, which was averted only by the Postal Service decision to continue its bad policy against laying off unneeded workers.

The ban against layoffs is being continued by the taxpayer-funded Postal Service at the point of a gun being held by a public employee union, which is not acting in the public interest.

I would like to include Ben Cole's question to the President on public employee strikes, and the President's response, at this point in the RECORD.

I would also like to include an editorial about the bad postal settlement from Mr. Cole's newspaper, the Arizona Republic.

This situation of public employee union blackmail tactics needs congressional attention and a legislative remedy.

The material referred to is as follows:

[From President Carter's nationally broadcast news conference on Thursday, July 20, 1978]

BEN COLE (of The Arizona Republic and The Indianapolis Star). Mr. President, the City of Washington is vexed right now by a subway strike. We're facing a possible mail strike. Philadelphia has had a sanitation strike, Louisville a police strike. There've been fires accompanying a fireman's strike in Memphis. How long do you think the people are going to stand for this, and what are your thoughts about strikes by public employees?

PRESIDENT CARTER. Well, I deplore the circumstances that finally result in a strike. We obviously prefer through regular legal bargaining procedures that disputes can be settled without disruptive strikes. This evening, for instance, we are waiting with great interest the outcome of the postal workers' negotiations, and we hope that they will be resolved successfully before midnight, which is the deadline. If they're not, then the legal procedures provide a mechanism by which some extension can be granted.

But I deplore strikes, but recognize the right of workers to conduct labor negotiations. If they aren't successful, sometimes strikes are advisable. But I prefer, of course, to see their disputes settled without strikes.

[From the Arizona Republic, July 22, 1978]

A BAD SETTLEMENT

The settlement the U.S. Postal Service reached with the postal workers' unions averted a strike that would have snarled the economy, but only at the cost of making another boost in postal rates or the postal subsidy, or both, inevitable.

The wage increases provided for in the new contract are not the reason. They will amount to 2 percent the first year, 3 percent the third, plus annual cost-of-living raises.

This is more than the 600,000 postal workers deserve, for they already are by far the best-paid semiskilled workers in the country, earning an average of nearly $16,000 a year, which is about 50 percent more than the average for all non-farm workers.

Moreover, taking into account the cost-of-living raises, the increases exceed the 5.5 percent ceiling set by President Carter for civil service workers.

The really bad feature of the settlement is that it continues the ban on layoffs. The Postal Service could absorb the wage increases by cutting the number of people it employs. And it could easily do that if the ban were abolished.

The amount of mail the Postal Service handles is declining. And automation also has made it possible to operate with fewer workers.

Wages consume 85 percent of the cost of delivering the mail. That cost is bound to increase each year unless the Postal Service is able to pare its force.

The unions were more concerned about maintaining the ban on layoffs than about wages, because they know the Postal Service is overstaffed. They threatened to strike unless the ban were kept, and the Postal Service yielded.

It should have stood fast. A strike would have disrupted the economy and caused incalculable inconvenience, but it could have been broken.

There's no hope for the Postal Service unless it can keep its costs from rising.

INTRODUCTION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION ON FEDERAL JUDGES

(Mr. DEVINE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DEVINE. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to announce that I am today introducing a House joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment dealing with the tenure of the hierarchy of Federal judges.

There is something drastically and basically wrong with the posture of the Federal judiciary within the framework of our Federal Government under our Constitution as it has developed up to this point. The general principle of the separation of powers still purports to hold true, but the practice has become something different. The Federal judiciary is more and more invading the province of both legislative and executive branches with impunity. The examples of judicial arrogance and complete disregard for the proper role of the courts are too numerous to bear repeating in detail. A casual reading of the daily newspapers would bring such cases to light with dreadful regularity.

There are the instances in which Federal courts make decisions which require the administrative execution by State, county, or municipal governments. Not content with burdening these governmental entities with chores which defy accomplishment, the courts have many times taken over as the executive-in-charge. Communities are ordered to submit the plans for compliance and then told time and again to go back to the drawing board until the court—that is, the individual judge—is satisfied with it. Courts have summarily ordered State governments to cough up funds to help subordinate echelons to do exactly what the judge decides best, regardless of other fiscal or budgetary problems of the affected State government.

There are examples of judicial pressures of the most uncalled for kind. For example, local officials have been told flatly that to exercise their legal right to appeal would bring contempt action down upon them. This sort of judicial bullyism cannot be tolerated.

How can such things occur? Clearly because of one factor alone. Some judges appointed for life tenure develop an attitude of power which brooks no interference and no dissent. The realities of life as lived by you and me seem to fade from sight. Untouchability, or the feeling of it, leads to the loss of respect for others. There is no need to consider the opinions or even, at times, the rights of those who have no legal way to restrain such quirks and excesses. Ask the attorney who must appear and practice before these imperious lords who seem to enjoy embarrassing witnesses and subjecting counsel to the pillory. They are no longer people, and judges should, of all the many so-called servants of the people, be the most understanding, the most humane.

There is nothing sacred about life tenure for judges. State governments did not succumb to the Federal precedent and many have outstanding trial and appeal courts. And, while there does not seem to be an argument for the advantages of life tenure, there certainly are numerous examples to illustrate its disadvantages. No branch of government should ever be placed completely out of the reach of those for whom it was created.

The bill I am introducing is not either a first-of-a-kind or one-of-a-kind. Other bills have been introduced from time to time on this same subject, and some of them are quite similar to mine. I do think, however, that it behooves the members of the legislative branch to recognize this problem and start the machinery in motion which will result in the necessary change in the U.S. Constitution. The process takes a long time at best, and the State legislatures should be given the opportunity to express themselves on this subject without more delay.

The bill I have introduced would require a renomination by the President and a reconfirmation by the U.S. Senate of each and every Federal judge after he has served 10 years and each 10 years thereafter. Although this system does not subject Federal judges to the vagaries of the polling place, it still should constantly remind them that they are not completely immune to the realities of the political system.

I urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring this legislation, and I urge the appropriate committees to act promptly to bring it to the floor of the House for its consideration and passage.

BAN THE "BLACKOUT" OF TV SPORTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CORCORAN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, everyone is aware of the effect that "big money" has had on professional sports over the past several years. The free agent phenomenon, exorbitant salaries and lucrative television contracts have thrown the professional sports world into a cost-increase spiral the likes of which has never been seen before in this country.

One disturbing result has been the promulgation of the so-called blackout of televised professional games to audiences within 75 miles, if the game is not sold out at least 72 hours before game time. This situation has resulted from franchise owners' concern about selling every available seat in the arena to meet the costs of operation. The legislation which I am introducing today would eliminate the blackout rule entirely, except where a college game is being played within 75 miles of the location of the professional game, a situation which rarely occurs, since the respective schedules seldom conflict.

The need for this measure can be illustrated by the following example: A family of four wants to see a postseason playoff game between the Chicago Bears and the Green Bay Packers. The game is being played in Chicago, and because all seats have not been sold by the deadline, it is announced that the game cannot be carried by media centers within the prescribed 75-mile radius. Since the relevant media center for this family is Chicago, they will not be able to see it unless they attend in person. This family lives just within the blackout area, so when they climb into their car Sunday morning, they are looking forward to a 75-mile, 2-hour trip to the stadium in Chicago.

But this family's problems have just begun. With no way to reserve four of the remaining tickets beforehand, they are taking a chance that, by the time they reach the ticket window, the seats will all be sold. So, with luck, Dad is able to purchase four of the remaining seats, the view from which is comparable to watching the game from the Capitol dome.

By the time the family finally takes its seats, Dad has already spent well over $60 for playoff tickets and parking, not including the cost of transportation, or cokes and hot dogs.

Mr. Speaker, agreements between the National Football League and the major television networks will place $5 million in the coffers of each NFL team this season, whether or not the team appears on a regional or national broadcast during the course of the season. When a game is blacked out, it usually means that a few hundred seats out of 70,000 or so were not sold—about 2 percent. Surely, with today's high ticket prices and lucrative television contracts, it is not necessary to deprive large television audiences the pleasure of seeing their team, just to attempt to guarantee the receipt of revenue from a relatively small number of tickets. The American sports spectator is a dedicated and loyal person, and deserves credit in large part for the huge success (financial and otherwise), enjoyed by professional sports. Certainly, the cost of a few hundred tickets is a small price for franchises to pay in order to "ban the blackout" and bring sports excitment to millions of deserving citizens.●

MORAL OUTRAGE ALONE WILL NOT HELP ANATOLY SCHARANSKY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, July 13, the Soviet Government sentenced Anatoly Scharansky to 13 years imprisonment and hard labor. The charges: Spying for the United States and anti-Soviet agitation. The actual crime: Seeking to emigrate to Israel and helping to monitor, internally, the Soviet observance of the Helsinki agreement.

Mr. Scharansky's conviction has provoked the indignation of the Western World. We are particularly outraged in the United States because our President has given his solemn word that the first charge is false. As to the second, it is difficult for us to view as a crime the desire to seek out one's roots and to aid others who share the same dream. Since Jews are not free to practice their religion in Russia, migration would appear to be the opposite of agitation.

I think, however, that it is important not to dwell on the illogic of Soviet justice (or injustice) and lose sight of the very special significance of the Scharansky case to the United States. As noted, in spite of assurances from President Carter that Anatoly Scharansky has no connection with our intelligence activities, a Moscow court found him guilty. By implication, that same court found our President guilty of making a false statement to the world.

By finding internal monitoring of their compliance with the Helsinki agreement as anti-Soviet agitation, the Russians have forced us to question their sincerity and trustworthiness on the eve of important negotiations aimed at an arms control agreement.

For the millions of Americans who care about Anatoly Scharansky and the others also unjustly sentenced recently, such as Aleksandr Ginzburg and Yuri Orlov, there is a great sense of anger and frustration. How can we help them? How can we break through the closed doors of the closed Soviet society which has allowed this to go on? Anatoly Scharansky has risked his life to call attention to the plight of the refuseniks in the hope that his courage would make things better. We can honor this man through our actions as a nation by adding forceful action to our moral outrage.

We can no longer assume that "sensitivity to public opinion" is a force that will move the Soviet Union. We have an unfortunate tendency to project upon the Russians our own values and assume that they are equally responsive to world opinion. If they can continue to sign agreements guaranteeing human rights while violating those very rights, I believe they will continue to do so.

And, if we continue to supply the Soviet Union with our technology and our agricultural products in the face of this repression, we must recognize the moral significance of our actions. In short, we should apply the type of pressure to which the Soviet Union might respond.

President Carter has now placed American exports of oil technology on an export control list which this administration can use to stop the sales of equipment the Russians want. He can and should use this authority. In addition, the administration will cancel a computer sale by Sperry Univac. There can be other similar actions taken.

I also firmly believe that the 1980 Olympics should not be held in Moscow. The recent trials and the overall campaign against human rights are in clear violation of the 1975 Helsinki accords. By 1980, when all the world would be watching Moscow at the games, human rights movement leaders may totally be muzzled. I have written to Lord Killanin, president of the International Olympic Committee urging the committee to reconsider its permission for Moscow to hold the 1980 games and move them out of the Soviet Union, as well as to Robert Kane, president of the United States Olympic Committee asking his support. I am circulating a letter to all my House colleagues urging them to join me in this effort.

Anatoly S haransky still has some time before his 30 days for appealing his unjust sentence are over. That means the Soviet Union has time to reconsider its action. But they won't act if we do nothing. Let us draw on the reservoirs of resolve and courage that exist in this country and put teeth into our indignation. Surely Anatoly Scharansky has set us a high standard in his response to the harsh sentence imposed upon him. He declared:

I am happy that I lived honestly and in peace with my conscience, * * * I am happy to have helped people.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. MEYNER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mrs. MEYNER. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent for the final votes on Friday, July 21, 1978. Had I been present, I would have voted as follows:

Rollcall No. 584, "yea"; Rollcall No. 585, "yea"; and Rollcall No. 586, "yea."●

TESTIMONY OF HON. W. MICHAEL BLUMENTHAL BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GIAMO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. GIAIMO. Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House previously, the Budget Committee has recently completed a week of stimulating and rewarding hearings on the state of the economy and the U.S. budget.

On July 19 and 20, I placed the testimony of Chairman Charles Schultze of the Council of Economic Advisers in the RECORD. Today, I include the statement of Treasury Secretary W. Michael Blumenthal in the RECORD at this point:

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE W. MICHAEL BLUMENTHAL

Mr. Chairman and Members of this distinguished Committee:

I am pleased to have the opportunity of discussing with you this afternoon the results of the Administration's mid-session Budget review, particularly as they relate to the future course of the economy and the President's program for reducing inflation and unemployment. As you requested, I will also discuss the economic implications of the proposed changes in the size and timing of the President's tax program. Information about each of these issues should be helpful in the Committee's consideration of the Second Concurrent Resolution on the Budget for Fiscal Year 1979.

Your review comes at a time when the economy is settling down to a more reasonable rate of growth, after the clearly unsustainable pace in early spring when the economy was catching up from the winter weather and the coal strike. While figures for the second quarter are still several days away, it appears that economic activity was fast enough to bring the rate of expansion in real GNP over the first half of the year to about 4 percent.

We expect a pace close to this to continue over the balance of the year and, given some success in containing inflation without further intensification of monetary restraint, and given enactment of the Administration's revised tax program, there is no reason to expect marked deviation from this pace in 1979.

Admittedly, it is unusual to anticipate growth to continue into the fifth year of an economic recovery. But we have been fortunate in avoiding some of the excesses that in past recoveries have forced the economy to pause and often to reverse direction. Production and sales have been kept in good balance; we are not suffering from inventory imbalances that often have been the cause of production cutbacks and swelling unemployment rolls. Indeed, the unemployment rate has dropped sharply this year, from 6.4 percent last December to 5.7 percent in June; 2 million new jobs have been created in the past six months.

Although our forecast is for continued economic progress at a sustainable rate somewhat in excess of the economy's long-run potential—appropriate for an economy still operating with some slack in utilization of its plant and labor resources—we cannot afford complacency. There are significant risks in the economic outlook, most of them on the downside. We will not be able to achieve or maintain a satisfactory rate of growth unless we encourage a faster rate of investment in new productive facilities, unless we restrain inflation and unless we redress the serious imbalance in our foreign trade.

To increase productivity and offset rising labor costs, and to create jobs for the future, we need to create the tools of production at a faster rate. Real business fixed investment has lagged in this recovery. At this stage in previous expansions, investment had exceeded its previous peak by a margin of almost 18 percent; at present, investment has barely reached its prerecession peak. We are devoting less than one-tenth of our real output to investment in new plant and equipment, a smaller share than in the late 60's and early 70's, and well below the share needed to insure the rate of capital formation necessary to support a full-employment economy in the 1980's.

The need for accelerating capital formation in this country is well documented. The slowing in the rate of growth in our capital stock parallels the slowing in the growth of productivity, and is a major contributor to the inflationary pressures from which we suffer. In the past four years, our manufacturing capacity has increased at an annual rate of less than 3 percent, down 1½ percentage points from the growth rate in the postwar period through 1973. Similarly since 1973, productivity growth in manufacturing has fallen by almost 50 percent as compared to its average for 1948–1973.

This need for enlarging our capital stock is addressed in the tax proposals submitted by the Administration, which would directly encourage capital formation by increasing the after-tax profitability of business investment. It is essential, for both short- and long-term needs of the economy, that we move rapidly to establish effective incentives for business outlays for new plant and equipment.

Another potential obstacle to achievement of the projected growth path of the economy is the imbalance in our foreign trade. To be sure, there are some encouraging signs of improvement in our foreign trade picture, as we shake off the effects of winter weather and as our exports increasingly respond to changed foreign exchange relationships. The rise in our exports in recent months is welcome. But much of the increase is in agricultural exports; our exports of manufactured goods are improving very modestly. At the same time, our imports of manufactured products have been rising very rapidly. And oil imports, while below last year's rate, still represent the major element in our trade deficit. Until we act decisively to reduce oil imports, and to improve the competitive efficiency of American industry by encouraging new investment, progress in correcting the trade imbalance will be painfully slow. Hence, it is essential to enact the tax measures proposed by the President, including the removal of subsidies that encourage oil imports and lower the cost of energy below its true replacement cost.

Finally, our ability to maintain growth depends heavily on our ability to contain inflation. Our progress on this objective continues disappointing—the latest consumer price data indicate a third month of increase at double-digit rates. Of course, food prices are chiefly responsible for the unpleasant developments, but there is hope for some moderation as increased supplies reach the market.

But the underlying rate of inflation—even after discounting the contribution from volatile food prices—is still running at an unacceptably high rate. And the continued rise in wages, as smaller unions and the less-organized workers try to catch up with the large increases achieved by the more powerful unions, threatens to keep up the pressure on price levels, particularly in light of the poor performance of productivity.

The persistence of inflation is the major threat to achieving the goals of adequate economic growth and increased employment opportunities. Inflation impacts adversely on real incomes and on consumer confidence and willingness to spend, and on interest rates and mortgage credit availability. It deters business investment, and foreshortens the time-horizon in making capital outlay decisions.

The Administration's Budget proposals are carefully framed to avoid exacerbating inflationary pressures. Outlays for the current fiscal year are now projected at $452 billion, some $11 billion less than was estimated in January. This reduction is the result primarily of smaller-than-planned spending by government agencies, and we have, as a matter of deliberate policy, refrained from any effort to force spending to the original higher levels. For FY 1979, we now estimate outlays at $497 billion, $4 billion less than our January estimate, and implying an increase for the '79 fiscal year which is $5 billion smaller than for the current fiscal year. Moreover we are aggressively seeking areas in which spending can be reduced further. It is our belief that improvements in efficiency are possible which would permit us to deliver the desired level of public services at less cost to the taxpayer.

Even with a tax cut (it is expected that Federal revenues will rise more than projected outlays. As a result, the estimated budget deficit for next fiscal year, at about $48½ billion, is moderately below that expected for FY 1978, and some $12 billion less than was estimated in January.

This scaling back in the size of the FY 1979 deficit reflects the delay and reduction in the proposed tax cut as well as somewhat lower outlay projections.

The revised tax program differs from the President's original program for calendar year 1979 in three respects:

1. The January budget proposal to repeal the tax on telephone services and to reduce the federal unemployment insurance tax rate would be deleted;

2. The amount of proposed individual income tax reduction would be reduced.

3. A modest amount is included to reflect the start-up costs of those elements of the President's urban initiatives that would be implemented through tax credits.

The size and composition of the proposed tax reductions reflect the very high priority that the President places on encouraging business investment, increasing productivity, and fighting inflation.

The calendar year 1979 cost of this revised tax program is estimated to be about $20 billion. Since the effective date for the program would be January 1979, rather than October 1978 as initially proposed, the fiscal year 1979 cost would be under $15 billion.

The decision to reduce the size of the tax cut, while reflecting our willingness to be flexible and responsive to economic developments, does not mean that we are ready to abandon other objectives such as tax equity. The Administration, therefore, continues to support its program for long-overdue reform of our unfair and complicated tax laws.

These new budget outlay and revenue recommendations reflect a careful balancing of the need to keep the economy on a steady growth path with a recognition of the importance of containing inflationary pressures. President Carter is determined to use the full powers of his office, including the veto, to ensure that spending increases and tax cuts stay within the limits of his budget proposals. Moreover, he is determined to move toward a balanced budget as fast as economic conditions permit.

The fiscal posture depicted by the 1978 and 1979 estimates in the mid-session review is what we believe to be sufficient and appropriate to support economic growth at the moderate rate now anticipated through 1979. At the present stage of the recovery, and because of the threat to continued economic growth that would be precipitated by a further acceleration of inflation, this degree of budgetary restraint is essential. To depend too heavily on monetary restraint risks distorting the composition of growth and eventually aborting the expansion. Even the present degree of monetary restraint is already being reflected in a tightening in mortgage markets and declines in indicators of future residential construction activity.

In view of the need for continued inflation restraint, and the need for an appropriate balance between monetary and fiscal policies, it is surprising that there is serious advocacy in Congress of massive tax reductions, reductions that would increase the Federal deficit by incredibly large amounts over the next few years. Instead of working toward budget balance, as does the President's program, large tax reductions such as those proposed in S. 1860 and H.R. 8333 (Kemp-Roth) would, on the basis of the analyses submitted by their advocates, increase the deficit by $12 billion in the first year and by $38 billion by the time the full round of tax reductions was completed.

We do not quarrel with the proposition that tax reductions can, in an underemployed economy, stimulate economic activity and thereby ultimately return some of the foregone revenues to the government. But massive tax reduction in an economy already suffering from inflationary pressures is sheer waste. We do not have the financial or physical resources to absorb such stimulus without adding to inflationary pressures, and whatever benefits might be envisioned would be quickly negated by the rise in prices and in interest rates.

Advocates of major tax reductions frequently cite the success of the Kennedy-Johnson tax reductions in support of similar action now. What is overlooked, in these presentations, is the difference in the economic environment between that of the early 1960's and that in which we live today. In the early 1960's, inflation was running at less than 2 percent per year; this year we fear that the consumer price index will rise by more than 7 percent. In the early 1960's, the Federal deficit averaged only $5 billion; even with exceptional restraint, the deficit for this fiscal year and next will average almost ten times that. Interest rates currently are already double the levels prevailing at the time of the Kennedy-Johnson tax cut. To impose on our financial markets the burden of massive increases in an already large deficit would result in either inflationary expansion of credit or—more likely—a preemption of financial resources that would curtail private spending and investment. There is no basis in the evidence of previous tax reductions that capacity and productivity would increase sufficiently rapidly to accommodate the increased demands flowing from such large, abrupt reductions in taxes.

The Administration tax and budget program is designed to lower the burden of taxation and unleash the forces of the private sector. But it is of a magnitude appropriate to the needs and capacity of the economy. As in most things in life, moderation is a virtue; too much of a good thing will produce economic indigestion, not improved economic health.●

PERSONAL STATEMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEISS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, the following is how I would have voted on seven rollcall votes had I been present:

Rollcall No. 581, a motion to resolve into a Committee of the Whole. This motion was passed by a vote of 268 to 6. I would have voted in favor of the motion.

Rollcall No. 582, an amendment to H.R. 12433, the Housing and Community Development Amendments of 1978, prohibiting use of funds for the reorganization of any office dealing with community planning and development. This amendment was defeated by a vote of 160 to 133. I would have voted against this amendment.

Rollcall No. 583, an amendment to H.R. 12433, striking provisions requiring FAIR insurance rates to be no higher than those set by the principal State-licensed rating organization. This amendment was defeated by a vote of 185 to 119. I would have voted against the amendment.

Rollcall No. 584, an amendment to H.R. 12433, prohibiting social security benefit cost-of-living increases from being treated as income to determine eligibility for public housing assistance. This amendment was passed by a vote of 256 to 38. I would have voted in favor of the amendment.

Rollcall No. 585, a vote on the final passage of H.R. 12433. The bill passed by a vote of 268 to 6. I was paired on this vote and would have voted in favor of the bill.

Rollcall No. 586, a vote on H.R. 13468, making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia. This bill passed by a vote of 215 to 32. I was paired on this vote and would have voted in favor of the bill.

Rollcall No. 588, a vote on House Joint Resolution 946, to designate October 7, 1978, as "National Guard Day." This joint resolution passed by a vote of 264 to 10. I was paired on this vote and would have voted in favor of the resolution.●

ONE OF JIMMY CARTER'S CAMPAIGN PLEDGES ON CYPRUS: SUPPORT FOR U.N. RESOLUTION 3212

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, during his successful campaign for the Presidency, Jimmy Carter publicly stated that efforts toward achieving a peaceful settlement on Cyprus must be based upon the United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3212 of November 1, 1974, calling for, among other things the removal of all foreign military forces from Cyprus.

Mr. Carter went on to say that:

The widely reported increase in colonization of Cyprus by Turkish military should cease. Greek-Cypriot refugees should be allowed to return to their homes. Both Greek and Turkish-Cypriots should be assured of their rights, both during and after the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Cyprus.

Mr. Speaker, in light of the Carter administration's efforts to end the Turkish arms embargo—without the achievement of any of these objectives—it is imperative that we keep carefully in mind the text of the General Assembly resolution to which Mr. Carter pledged his support. It should be obvious that Turkey has not taken the substantive actions necessary to comply with the provisions of this resolution. There is, therefore, no justification for an end to the arms embargo at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I insert in the RECORD, and commend it to attention of my colleagues, the full text of U.N. General Assembly Resolution 3212:

RESOLUTION 3212 (XXIX)

The General Assembly adopted on the evening of 1st November, 1974, Resolution 3212 (XXIX) by 117 votes in favour, none against, no abstentions.

The Resolution reads as follows:

"The General Assembly,

Having considered the question of Cyprus,

Gravely concerned about the continuation of the Cyprus crisis, which constitutes a threat to international peace and security,

Mindful of the need to solve this crisis without delay by peaceful means, in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations,

Having heard the statements in the debate and taking note of the Report of the Special Political Committee on the question of Cyprus,

1. Calls upon all states to respect the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and non-alignment of the Republic of Cyprus and to refrain from all acts and interventions directed against it;

2. Urges the speedy withdrawal of all foreign armed forces and foreign military presence and personnel from the Republic of Cyprus, and the cessation of all foreign interference in its affairs;

3. Considers that the constitutional system of the Republic of Cyprus concerns the Greek-Cypriot and Turkish-Cypriot communities;

4. Commends the contacts and negotiations taking place on an equal footing, with the good offices of the Secretary-General between the representatives of the two communities, and calls for their continuation with a view to reaching freely a mutually acceptable political settlement, based on their fundamental and legitimate rights;

5. Considers that all the refugees should return to their homes in safety and calls upon the parties concerned to undertake urgent measures to that end;

6. Expresses the hope that, if necessary, further efforts including negotiations can take place, within the framework of the United Nations, for the purpose of implementing the provisions of the present resolution, thus ensuring to the Republic of Cyprus its fundamental right to independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to provide United Nations humanitarian assistance to all parts of the population of Cyprus and calls upon all states to contribute to that effort;

8. Calls upon all parties to continue to cooperate fully with the United Nations Peace-Keeping Force in Cyprus, which may be strengthened if necessary;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to lend his good offices to the parties concerned;

10. Further requests the Secretary-General to bring the present resolution to the attention of the Security Council".●

CRACKDOWN ON HELSINKI MONITORS CONTINUES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, last week in the U.S.S.R., the Soviets put the finishing touches on their masterpiece of repression. The fourth Helsinki watcher to be tried in 2 weeks, Levko Lukyanenko, was convicted of "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda and sentenced to 10 years of hard labor and 5 years, internal exile.

The Lukyanenko trial, which took place in the Ukrainian town of Gorodnya, received little attention in the Western press mostly because it was timed to coincide with the more publicized Moscow trials of Helsinki watchers, Anatoly Scharansky and Aleksandr Ginzburg. The Soviet authorities attempted to level the Helsinki monitoring groups in one fell swoop by bringing to trial Ginzburg, Scharansky, Lukyaneko, and the Lithuanian group member, Viktoras Petkus, at the same time. These four trails, however, were not the only acts of suppression aimed at the members of the public groups to promote observance of the Helsinki agreement in the U.S.S.R. Instead, they mark the final stages of a well-orchestrated, systematic campaign designed to destroy the groups which began shortly after the first group was formed in Moscow in 1976. To date, 13 other Helsinki watchers have been convicted and sentenced for their participation in the groups, two have been stripped of their Soviet citizenship and thus banished from their homeland, and three others are presently imprisoned awaiting trial.

The sentencing of Lukyanenko is particularly harsh in light of the fact that he has already served a 15-year term, after having a death sentence commuted in 1961. As a result of his lengthy imprisonment, Lukyanenko suffers from chronic stomach ailments. Another 10 years will certainly be difficult for the Ukrainian human rights advocate who is 51 years old. I heartily protest this latest injustice and urge my colleagues to do the same. The Soviet Union must be made to understand that the United States expects no less than complete compliance with the pledges made at Helsinki. The treatment of the Helsinki monitors is, and will continue to be, a barometer for the Congress to determine the future climate of all aspects of United States-Soviet relations.●

TURKEY AND HUMAN RIGHTS

(Mr. FINDLEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, some characterize Turkey as a violator of human rights and contend that Congress should not, therefore, lift the U.S. arms embargo against Turkey.

A series of documents which I have compiled, however, shows that Turkey does not pursue a policy of human rights violations either in Turkey or on Cyprus. Indeed, these documents further reinforce the many compelling reasons for lifting the arms embargo.

Violations, tragic violations, did occur during the fighting of 1974. At that time, Turkish soldiers committed human rights violations against the civilian Greek Cypriot population. Violations were also committed by Turkish Cypriot against Greek Cypriot, by Greek Cypriot against Turkish Cypriot, and by Greek Cypriot against Greek Cypriot. These latter took place during the internecine struggles between proenosis and antienosis factions following the coup against Archbishop Makarios. The human rights violations of 1974, however, were the acts of individual men, moved by fear and hate. They were not the result of the policies of any government.

And the events of 1974 did not occur in a vacuum. Rather, they were part of a complex web of historical circumstances involving great intercommunal conflict on Cyprus. Memories of the Greek Cypriot massacres of the Turkish Cypriot minority population in the 1960's were still fresh in 1974. Enosis was a continuing threat which the Greek-led coup of July 15 made real by placing in power a man dedicated to the union of Cyprus with Greece. Given the troubled history of Cyprus, it is thus not easy to move quickly to condemnations of one group or another.

The important goal now is to achieve a settlement on Cyprus. The embargo, tested during these past 3½ years, has failed to promote a settlement. It is time to try another approach—one which will benefit Cyprus and soothe rather than inflame ethnic hostilities.

For the information of my colleagues, I submit the following documents which, I believe, give an accurate picture of the Turkish observance of human rights.

TURKEY AND HUMAN RIGHTS ON CYPRUS

The first document is a letter of June 20, 1978 addressed to me from Assistant Secretary of State Doug Bennett. This letter excerpts from United Nations Secretary-General Waldheim's report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus from December 1, 1977 to May 31, 1978 in its discussion of the Turkish treatment of Greek Cypriots in northern Cyprus.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., June 20, 1978.

HON. PAUL FINDLEY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. FINDLEY: In light of the interest you have previously expressed in the status of Greek Cypriots living in the Turkish Cypriot-administered area of Cyprus, I thought you might want to read the following excerpts from Secretary General Waldheim's report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus covering the period December 1, 1977 to May 31, 1978:

G. Humanitarian and normalization functions in the North.—

27. UNFICYP continues to discharge humanitarian functions and to promote normalization of the living conditions of the Greek Cypriots remaining in the north. Since my last report, UNFICYP has ascertained that the living conditions of these people have improved, particularly as far as their freedom of movement is concerned. Transfers to the south have remained at the same low level which has been in evidence since February 1977. All transfers continue to be monitored by UNFICYP to ensure that they have been undertaken voluntarily. The Greek Cypriot population in the north is now 1,731.

28. Medical care available to Greek Cypriots in the north is as good as that provided to Turkish Cypriots in the same area. Greek Cypriots may obtain permission for temporary visits to the south in order to obtain medical treatment, provided that a Turkish Cypriot medical board certifies that such treatment is not available in the north.

29. Two Greek Cypriot primary schools are operating in the north. Both are in the Karpas area: one in Ayia Trias and the other in Rizokarpaso. The school in Ayia Trias operates with one teacher for 62 pupils. In Rizokarpaso there are five teachers and 155 pupils. Since there are still no Greek Cypriot secondary schools in the north, some children were transferred during the current year in order to attend such schools in the south. Through UNFICYP's good offices, permission was granted to by the Turkish Cypriot authorities for 122 Greek Cypriot schoolchildren who are attending schools in the south to spend the Christmas holidays in their homes in the Karpas; however, boys over 16 and girls over 20 were excluded. At Easter, permission was granted to 154 children, but on this occasion girls over 18 were also excluded. During the Easter holiday period, the visiting Greek Cypriot children were allowed access to beaches in the Karpas area and to Cape Andreas, a previously restricted area at the north-western point of the peninsula.

30. The same opportunity was granted over the Christmas and Easter periods to Maronite children attending school in the south whose families live in the north. Furthermore, Maronite adults residing in the south visited their relatives in the north in significant numbers over the Easter holidays. Maronites in the north may travel to markets in the larger cities, such as Kyrenia and Nicosia, for business and domestic purposes. Contacts between members of the Maronite group residing on opposite sides of the ceasefire lines are frequent.

31. In regard to agricultural activities, the recent relaxation of restrictions on freedom of movement in the Karpas area makes it possible for Greek Cypriots to have access also to some fields which lie at a distance from their villages.

32. As indicated in my last report, there appears to be no restriction on freedom of worship in the north wherever the services of a priest are available.

Sincerely,

DOUGLAS J. BENNET, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations.

The second document is the 1978 human rights report on Cyprus prepared by the Department of State in accordance with sections 116(d) and 502B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act, as amended.

CYPRUS

Perhaps more so than elsewhere, human rights questions in Cyprus cannot be treated in isolation from political considerations. As a consequence of past intercommunal troubles and the events of 1974, they constitute an integral element of the Cyprus problem and will no doubt figure largely in any settlement ultimately reached between the two Cypriot communities.

1. Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Torture.—There are no indications that torture is currently permitted or practiced by the Government of Cyprus, the Turkish-Cypriot administration, or Turkish forces in northern Cyprus.

b. Cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.—

There have been no recent instances of large-scale or politically-inspired cruel or inhuman treatment of persons on Cyprus. It is generally accepted, however, that violations of human rights in the form of cruel and inhuman treatment of civilians and prisoners were committed in the course of the Greek-led coup against President Makarios in July 1974 and during the subsequent Turkish military intervention. These were less a reflection of deliberate governmental policy than a consequence of the scale and intensity of the fighting and of the longstanding antagonisms within and between the two communities on the island. Turkish-Cypriot enclaves not occupied by Turkish troops were reportedly attacked by Greek-Cypriot forces; subsequently mass graves of executed Turkish-Cypriot villages were discovered.

For their part the Greek-Cypriots have charged that the Turkish troops who intervened in 1974 engaged in massive and systematic murder, rape, and inhuman treatment of prisoners. As a consequence of the world-wide attention that these charges attracted, and in response to a Greek-Cypriot petition, the Council of Europe instructed its Commission on Human Rights to undertake an investigation of Turkish actions in 1974. The Commission's report, completed early in 1977, found Turkey responsible for six violations of the European Convention on Human Rights.

The Turks subsequently submitted a lengthy rebuttal that claimed that Greek-Cypriots violated Turkish-Cypriot rights on a massive scale during the 1963–64 period. The Council of Europe has declined to endorse the Commission's findings against Turkey, simply noting in a recent statement that violations of human rights did occur in Cyprus in 1974.

c. Arbitrary arrest or imprisonment.—Arbitrary arrest or detention is not currently being practiced in Cyprus. Charges that these practices occurred were frequently leveled by both Greek and Turkish-Cypriots during the 1974 crisis and its immediate aftermath.

d. Denial of fair public trial—.The authorities in Cyprus respect the right to a fair public trial.

e. Invasion of the home.—Many thousands of Cypriots—both Greek and Turkish—were displaced from their homes during the 1974 fighting. Over the next two years practically all Turkish-Cypriots remaining in the south moved, whether voluntarily or involuntarily, to the north. Similarly, in the course of 1975 and 1976 all but a few thousand of the Greek-Cypriots remaining in Turkish-controlled northern Cyprus moved to the Greek-administered south. According to the Greek-Cypriots, many of these persons were evicted from their homes as a deliberate act of policy; according to the Turkish-Cypriots, they moved southward voluntarily and subsequently claimed they were forced out in order to qualify for refugee benefits. The report of the European Commission on Human Rights supports the former view. If there was in fact a deliberate eviction policy, it appears now to have been dropped. U.N. representatives have verified that those Greek-Cypriots who moved from the north to the Greek-controlled sector in the course of 1977 clearly did so of their own accord.

2. Governmental policies relating to the fulfillment of such vital needs as food, shelter, health care and education:

The Government of Cyprus has responded promptly and effectively to the plight of the many thousands displaced as a consequence of the 1974 crisis. Housing, employment, education and health programs have been designed and implemented—funded in large part by outside (principally U.S.) sources. The Turkish-Cypriots were confronted with substantially less pressing refugee problems after 1974, but they have likewise been attentive to resettlement needs (benefiting also from U.S. assistance).

3. Respect for civil and political liberties, including:

a. Freedom of thought, speech, press, religion and assembly.—Freedom of the press and of assembly exists in both sectors of Cyprus. Minority groups, e.g. Greek-Cypriots in the north and Maronites in the south, practice their religions without hindrance.

b. Freedom of movement within the country, foreign travel and emigration.—Turkish and Greek-Cypriots enjoy normal freedom of movement within their respective sectors. The Turkish—Cypriot authorities continue to impose certain restrictions on the movement of Greek-Cypriots residing in the north. Movement between the two sectors is permitted only under exceptional circumstances.

c. Freedom to participate in the political process.—The Government of Cyprus is organized under the 1960 constitution in accordance with Western representative models. Suffrage is universal. Labor unions are free of governmental control. The Turkish-Cypriot regime in the north is democratically elected and controlled.

4. Government attitude and record regarding international and non-governmental investigation of alleged violations of human rights.—The Turkish-Cypriot administration has consistently refused to permit international bodies—including the ICRC and the European Commission on Human Rights—to conduct on-the-spot investigations into cases of persons reported missing and unaccounted for since the events of 1974. Other investigatory bodies, however, have been allowed to work in northern Cyprus without hindrance, and U.N. officials are at present free to pursue humanitarian activities there on behalf of the remaining Greek-Cypriot residents.

There are approximately 120,000 Greek-Cypriot refugees in the south and about 65,000 Turkish-Cypriot refugees who fled from the south to the north in 1974. This totals close to 200,000 refugees, the figure frequently quoted.

Both Greek- and Turkish-Cypriot refugees have been unable to return to their homes evacuated in 1974. A solution to this situation, however, will only be possible within the context of a final agreement on Cyprus. Our greatest concern, therefore, should be to stimulate a settlement. It should be obvious to all of us now, however, that the embargo has impeded a settlement. It is thus in the interests of no one—least of all the Cypriot people—for the U.S. Congress to perpetuate a stalemate on Cyprus.

During the past 4 years the United States has not been indifferent to the plight of refugees on Cyprus. We have considerably helped the human rights situation by providing $87.5 million in aid to Cyprus in the years between fiscal year 1975 and fiscal year 1978. This makes Cyprus the recipient of more U.S. aid per capita during that period than any other nation.

Inserted for the record is the testimony of Joseph C. Wheeler, Assistant Administrator, Bureau for Near East, Agency for International Development, before the Committee on International Relations on April 6, 1978.

STATEMENT OF JOSEPH C. WHEELER

I am pleased to be with this committee today to talk to you about a success story. The economic recovery of Cyprus has been outstanding. As a result of the July 1974 coup and the subsequent Turkish military intervention about 200,000 Cypriots—almost one third of the total population—were displaced and the economy was in disarray. In these few intervening years Cyprus has made significant progress in overcoming the terrible human and economic costs of the earlier events. The United States can be justly proud of our contribution toward this dramatic and gratifying recovery.

The United States contributed $87.5 million to Cyprus in the years between FY 1975 and FY 1978. Initially funds went to the International Red Cross for emergency relief of displaced people. When the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) became the coordinator for relief efforts at the behest of the Secretary General, we programmed our funds through the UNHCR and worked with that organization and the local Red Cross to design and implement effective projects. As basic emergency needs were met the program emphasis gradually changed from relief assistance to longer range recovery and rehabilitation projects in such fields as housing, health, reforestation and agricultural and technical education.

In the south, the U.S. contributed $33.7 million to the government's housing program, which according to a statement in January by the Minister of Interior will provide 27,246 units of new or refurbished houses by the end of 1978. Additional units will be built during 1979. Using the Department of Town Planning's standard factor of 4.5 people per unit, the 27,246 units will provide housing for more than 122,000 people. Additional housing units were also built in the private sector.

Working through the UNHCR, the U.S. also provided funding for (a) special housing for orphans and the aged; (b) special facilities for retarded children; (c) new and improved medical facilities, including village health clinics and medical supplies and equipment; (d) schools and educational materials; (e) agricultural supplies and reforestation equipment; (f) a handicraft promotion program and other types of vocational training and (g) community and day care centers.

In the north we supplied training equipment, educational supplies, medicines, medical equipment, and we financed construction of a mental health wing. In the agricultural sector we provided technical skills training, insecticides, baby chicks, and support for reforestation efforts.

In the north, despite limitations in trained manpower, living standards since 1974 have greatly improved. Although per capita income in the north is probably between one-third and one-half of that in the south, agricultural production is increasing and basic infrastructure is in place and operating.

In the south, real GNP grew at a rate of nearly 15 percent in 1976 and another 10 percent in 1977 bringing per capita income to the Government's target of $1,725 in 1977 and $1,853 in 1978. This compares with the 1973 level of $1,659 for the whole island. Unemployment dropped from a 1974 high of over 28 percent to less than 4 percent, and labor shortages now exist in several skill areas. Tourism revenue in 1977 exceeded the 1973 level for the whole island, the number of tourist arrivals have reached the levels of the early 70s. Foreign exchange reserves rose to $323.6 million by November 1977 compared to $306.8 million for the whole island at the end of 1973.

The Cyprus Government reports that as of the end of December no displaced persons were still living in tents while about 10,000 displaced persons were still in temporary wooden shelters. With over 2,000 additional housing units due to be completed by the end of May, the emergency need for public housing is now nearing an end. However, the Cyprus Government affirms that there are still displaced persons in unsatisfactory accommodations.

The Administration is requesting $5 million for FY 1979 to demonstrate our continued concern for the humanitarian needs of the people of Cyprus and an active interest in promoting a just and lasting settlement on the island. Specific projects will be identified in consultation with the UNHCR working with the local Red Cross organizations and governmental representatives and are expected to be in housing, health and vocational education.

HUMAN RIGHTS IN TURKEY

The human rights situation in Turkey is described in the several documents that follow. As we read these documents, we should keep in mind these facts: Turkey is a democracy. The Turkish people enjoy free elections, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press. We cannot say that of many countries whose per capita gross national product is only $750.

The first two documents concern the alleged Turkish mistreatment of minority groups and of the Greek Orthodox Church and community, in particular. One is a State Department briefing paper which dates from March of this year. The second is an excerpt from a May 22, 1978 press conference given by Prime Minister Ecevit of Turkey during his visit to Washington. At that time, he was asked what difficulties were encountered by religious and other institutions in Turkey and his government's policies. The question and Prime Minister Ecevit's answer are both submitted for the record.

DOCUMENT

The American Consulate General in Istanbul has been monitoring the situation of the Greek Orthodox minority in Istanbul and has recently reported that current issues in the Greek Orthodox Church's relations with the Turkish Government primarily center on: (a) taxation of property of Greek Orthodox private schools and (b) denial of passports to Church officials.

With regard to taxation of property of Greek Orthodox private schools, the Consulate General reports that all private schools in Istanbul, including those giving instruction in French and English as well as in Greek, are concerned over the property tax question. Because of the large size of Greek Orthodox property holdings, many of which are highly desirable commercial sites in high tax areas, such taxation poses a particularly difficult problem. The reduced population of the Greek community in Istanbul—now numbering around 10,000 persons—has also impaired its financial ability to maintain its extensive but underutilized institutional properties. We understand, for example, that there are 35 private Greek schools in Istanbul, but the Greek community's student population is only about 1,000. As of February 8, the Consulate General was not aware that any of these institutions has recently closed. Some of the smaller schools are apparently kept open in order to maintain their status as private non-profit organizations entitled to preferential tax treatment. Although all private schools in Turkey are required to pay property tax, we understand that some Greek schools nevertheless have been exempted from such tax.

Concerning the issue of restrictions on foreign travel by members of the Greek community, the Consulate General reports that with the exception of a few members of the church hierarchy, freedom of travel for the Greek minority in Turkey is in general unrestricted. Turkish citizens of Greek origin appear to travel in and out of Turkey and to emigrate with no apparent distinction drawn between them and other Turks. There are reports, however, that in recent months the Government of Turkey did not issue travel documents to certain Greek Orthodox Church prelates. While Metropolitan Meliton, a ranking prelate who was one of several Patriarchate officials who had been unable to obtain permission to travel, received a passport late last fall, it has been reported that three other Greek Orthodox Metropolitans have not been given passports. It appears, however, that this matter may now be on the way to resolution.

On February 9, while enroute back to Istanbul, Metropolitan Meliton made the following statement to the Athens press:

"The Ecumenical Patriarchate is not in danger. As far as I know, the Turkish state has no intention of endangering the position of the Patriarchate because that would not serve Turkey's interests. Of course, there are serious problems between the Patriarchate and the Turkish Government. Problems also exist between the Greek minority and the Turkish Government. However, we wish to solve such problems by means of a dialogue with the Turkish Government without foreign interference. Our wish as a Patriarchate, and a mother church, is to see Greek-Turkish contact bear fruit in order to serve the more substantive interests of both peoples."

Prime Minister Ecevit has indicated that he seeks to resolve outstanding issues between Greece and Turkey and has shown concern for the problems of the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate in Istanbul. On March 8 he met with three Greek Orthodox representatives, including Metropolitan Meliton, for a discussion of the current problems of the Greek community. In his welcoming statement, the Prime Minister was quoted in the Istanbul press as saying: "All citizens enjoy freedom of religion and thought in the secular republic of Turkey, and it is our constitutional duty to be concerned with their problems." Metropolitan Meliton responded, "We are here to establish a direct dialogue with our government. We do not want third parties to come between us." The following day, before departing for the March 10–11 summit meeting with Greek Prime Minister Caramanlis in Montreux, Switzerland, Prime Minister Ecevit announced an end to government delays in issuing travel documents to Greek Orthodox clergymen in Turkey and said the Turkish Government would cooperate with Greek community leaders in solving the financial problems of Greek schools in Turkey. Prime Minister Ecevit also announced that he had set up a ministerial committee to deal with the problems of the ethnic Greeks in Turkey.

The American Consulate will continue to follow this matter closely.

March 10, 1978.

INTERVIEW

Question. We almost always get questions with assertations and editorial comments. The questioner says that he or she has heard of difficulties encountered by Armenian, Greek and other religious, educational, social and cultural institutions in Turkey, and then the questioner asks a question about discrimination and harassment and if you are taking steps to correct them? In other words, did you stop beating your wife?

Prime Minister ECEVIT. Thank you for that question. Soon after we took over governmental responsibility, or, rather, to be more precise, from March on, in March, April, or May—in March and in April, delegations from the Greek Orthodox and Armenian community visited me. They told me about their problems and we promised them to solve all their problems and we started doing so. I followed them up personally with some members of the Cabinet, because we know that the bureaucracy has the habit of sometimes carrying on in its own way in spite of political decisions. In fact, after I left Turkey, this time I had to make a stop for a few days in Brussels and I heard that some of my promises were being a little waived by the bureaucracy, and I established telephone contact and I had them corrected.

I am convinced I can tell you that all these problems will be solved within a few weeks. They are parts of the Turkish nation; our concept of nationality does not depend on or is it based on racial differences anyway. And, it is our national duty to try and solve the problems of all minorities.

The last document is the 1978 human rights report on Turkey prepared by the Department of State in accordance with sections 116(d) and 502B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act, as amended.

TURKEY

Turkey's Constitution, penal code and administrative regulations provide safeguards which approximate due process as understood in Western European countries and afford protection from arbitrary arrest and detention. Torture or degrading treatment of prisoners is illegal under Turkish law. Turkey's free press and competitive political system have served as additional safeguards. The new Turkish government which took office in January 1978 has enunciated protection of human rights as one of its primary concerns.

1. Respect for the integrity of the person, including Freedom from:

a. Torture.—An amnesty in 1974 released all political prisoners, and other legislation restored political rights to all those previously deprived them. In 1976 and 1977 scattered allegations of torture were reported in a few newspapers and in individual witness statements made to Amnesty International; conclusive proof is lacking. While incidents of torture may occur, there clearly is no systematic policy of torture directed by the government.

b. Cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment.—There is no verified evidence of cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment being practiced in Turkey.

c. Arbitrary arrest or imprisonment.—Occasional allegations that the prescribed detention period has been exceeded are not supported by significant evidence.

d. Denial of fair public trial.—Trials in Turkey are open, and defense lawyers are available under all circumstances.

e. Invasion of the home.—Privacy of the home is protected by law, the requirements of which are met.

2. Governmental policies relating to the fulfillment of such vital needs as food, shelter, health care and education:

Governmental policies relating to the fulfillment of basic needs for food, shelter, health care and education are good and limited only by the economic resources of the country.

3. Respect for civil and political liberties, including:

a. Freedom of thought, speech, press, religion, and assembly.—Freedom of thought, religion and assembly are respected in Turkey. Government notification and approval are necessary for large public meetings, but such meetings, including those of a political nature, are freely held.

Freedom of worship is protected under both the Turkish Constitution and the 1923 Treaty of Lausanne. The Armenian Patriarch of Istanbul stated in 1977 that "we enjoy complete freedom of worship."

The small Greek, Christian, and Jewish populations also enjoy freedom of worship.

Charges have been made that various minorities, for example, the Armenians, Greeks and Kurds, suffer from cultural and economic, although not religious, discrimination. As for the Kurds, the Turkish Government has prohibited publication in, or teaching of Kurdish since 1925 when a series of Kurdish revolts threatened the stability and unity of Eastern Turkey. However, there does not appear to be any official discrimination against individuals belonging to minority groups, some of whom are prosperous and are leaders in the professions. Minority institutions have encountered problems in such areas as permits to maintain or expand existing churches and other facilities. Such actions appear to be haphazard in nature and do not appear to be the result of deliberate government policy.

b. Freedom of movement within the country, foreign travel and emigration.—There is freedom of movement, foreign travel and emigration.

c. Freedom to participate in the political process.—The ability to participate in the political process is extensively protected in Turkey. Turkey enjoys a vibrant political process, with parties reflecting all parts of the political spectrum. Elections are well contested and honest.

4. Government attitude and record regarding international and non-governmental investigation of alleged violations of human rights:

We are not aware of any obstacles to outside investigation and members of Amnesty International, for example, operate freely in Turkey.

In light of the Turkish military intervention in 1974 and the continued presence of Turkish armed forces in northern Cyprus, Turkey to some extent shared with the Greek community responsibility for the human rights situation on the island. The report relating to Cyprus takes up charges and counter-charges relating to human rights violations on the island.

BRZEZINSKI AND THE NATION'S SECURITY: A PORTRAIT BY ELIZABETH DREW

(Mr. CONYERS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, of the institutions of the Federal Government that are not subject to regular congressional oversight or the scrutiny of citizens, the National Security Council surely stands in the front rank. During the Nixon era its decisions were concealed from public view by the doctrine of executive privilege, a notion that spread from the area of national security to engulf other key areas including economic, trade, and budgetary policy. It has been a leading factor in virtually every major foreign and military disaster, chief among them the bombing of Cambodia and the Vietnam war. Its head, the Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, is the only major appointed official not subject to Senate confirmation. In a profound sense the National Security Council has functioned during the past quarter-century as an extralegal, para-constitutional body that has permitted all types of excessive, adventurist, and arbitrary action.

The council has proved dangerous precisely because of its lack of accountability as well as its role as guardian and diviner of the mysteries of "national security," itself one of the least examined and most costly concepts in the history of this country. Today it is hard to imagine, but necessary to contemplate, the dismantling of the National Security Council, just as in 1945 President Truman abolished the Office of Strategic Services, the forerunner of the NSC and the CIA, on the ground that it was not necessary in peacetime.

The case against the National Security Council becomes even stronger when we consider that at the present time an extra-constitutional agency is joined with an unsteady director whose past views and behavior have been marked by an intemperateness and ideological zeal that raises serious questions of conduct.

The New Yorker magazine of May 1, 1978, published an extraordinary portrait by Elizabeth Drew of the workings of the National Security Council and its present head, Zbigniew Brzezinski. This account goes to the heart of the dangers of the national security system and ought to be required reading for all citizens. The article by Elizabeth Drew entitled, "Brzezinski," follows:

BRZEZINSKI

When a President makes foreign policy, only a handful of people are directly involved: the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, and the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs. Under Jimmy Carter, this group also includes the Vice-President, certain trusted domestic advisers, and, occasionally, another Cabinet officer, such as the Secretary of the Treasury. At the center of the system for making foreign and defense policy is the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, Zbigniew Brzezinski. Brzezinski is the person who spends the most time with the President on the broad range of questions this group must deal with, and is the one who most often presents the policy alternatives to the President and interprets the President's directives to the others.

The job of formulating foreign policy these days is complicated by the historical setting. The Vietnam war shattered old assumptions about American influence and power and the uses to which that power could be put, and left no generally accepted guide for our future behavior. Within our government, even among this small group of men, there are differences over what, exactly, the lessons of Vietnam are. At the same time, the issue of how to conduct our relations with the Soviet Union remains very much in question and under debate among these men. Also at the same time, there are other forces to contend with, in the form of new, assertive movements and nations, and of new kinds of world influence—in particular, the power of those who hold commodities that are in demand. The old "bipolar" struggle and the new "multipolar" world combine in complex and sometimes confounding ways. The people now struggling with these problems are dealing with a world that is no less dangerous and far more complicated than any that their predecessors had to deal with.

Zbigniew Brzezinski's personality and style embrace a number of contradictions. He can be a man of charm, graciousness, cheerfulness, and vivacity, and he has a deep streak of fun in him. He has, for his sophistication, a certain childlike quality that can be appealing. He can also be cold, arrogant, insensitive, peremptory with others; he has a combative nature, and, according to the testimony of a number of people who have observed him, he is often inclined toward debate rather than discussion, and enjoys putting people down and making jokes—sometimes unkind ones—at others' expense. People have observed him to be patient, controlled, and decent, and also impatient, mercurial, and a bit mean. He is described as a person who can show equanimity and can be temperamental, as one who can be both stubborn and flexible. His taut, compact body and angular features give him a look of energy and alertness. Brzezinski has high cheekbones, a sharp nose, narrow blue eyes, arched eyebrows, and sandy hair that sweeps in a large wave in front and is short on the sides, and shoots straight up in back, making it reminiscent of the fifties. He was born in Poland of an aristocratic family, and in 1938, when he was ten, they moved to Canada, to which his father was posted as a diplomat. They stayed in Canada after Poland was taken over by the Communists at the end of the Second World War. His wife, Emilie, or Muska, is a grandniece of Eduard Benes, who was the President of the last free government of Czechoslovakia. Muska Brzezinski is an attractive woman and, like her husband, a strong and spirited personality. The Brzezinskis are practicing Catholics, and have three children. Though Brzezinski is protective and private about his family life, and despite all the pressures of his job, he manages to be present at parties of the powerful in Washington.

Brzezinski is often described by his associates as an "aristocrat," by which they mean not just his breeding but his manner in dealing with his colleagues. At the office, one of his associates said to me recently, he is "the fonctionnaire," the official; he doesn't form deep relationships through his work. It seems that, in fact, he has always been a bit on his own: he went from McGill University, in Canada, to Harvard, where he did graduate work and taught for a while; when he did not receive tenure, he went on to Columbia, where he set up his own institute, the Research Institute on Communist Affairs. He operated within the academic community but always as a sort of seperate state, maintaining contacts with people who could help his career along. Similarly, according to several of his associates and many people throughout the government, he is essentially a loner in this Administration. He is described as without allies in the bureauracy and also as without much sense of how to develop allies. Even those who defend him say that he simply isn't very good at dealing with people. They say that he often gives offense without realizing it; that, for all his emphasis on "collegiality"— a word he often uses to refer to his relations with his staff and with Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and Secretary of Defense Harold Brown—he demonstrates little sense of the need to cultivate relationships that would help him in his present job. Collegiality, of course, is, as some people from the academic world point out, a fiction: the pretense of camaraderie among highly rivalrous people. One of Brzezinski's friends has suggested to me that his childlikeness has its charm but is a questionable quality for the job he is in. He said that Brzezinski has a freshness—in the good sense—about him and a taste for simple things, such as taking a walk; that he likes fresh ideas; that he is a person of enthusiasms. It is the enthusiasms that can cause difficulty. This person went on to say, explaining why Brzezinski is not very popular in this Administration, "Zbig rubs people wrong because he's a smart-assed intellectual. So are others around this town, but he's more so." To many, he seems to have the cocksureness of someone who was always the brightest kid in the class. (Interestingly, the characteristic of having been the brightest kid in the class is one that the President shares.) He is generally described as bright and quick, but by several as a bit too bright, too quick. Of the many people I have discussed the subject of Brzezinski with, hardly any have used the word "thoughtful."

Brzezinski's childlike quality, his friend said, produces an awkwardness in his dealings with people. I pointed out that Brzezinski often seemed to try hard at friendliness, and this person laughed and said yes, but that was the problem—he seemed so often to be making an effort. Brzezinski retains an accent, which gives a certain staccato quality to his speech. When one enters his office, he will say, "Hi! How's life?" or even, "Howdy!" He doesn't just take pains to point out how collegial things are with Vance and Brown; he talks of his relationships with—landing on the words like a cymbal clash—"Cy!" and "Harold!" Once when I was interviewing him—shortly after I had seen a brief display of his temper—he paced about the office playfully tossing a pillow in the air. I had the impression that he was the sort of fellow who enjoyed tossing a pillow in the air and also that he wanted me to know that he was the sort of fellow who enjoyed tossing a pillow in the air. He gets a kick out of the machinery in his home and in his office which indicates how close he is to the most sensitive secrets, the most fateful decisions. Early one evening, I was talking with him as the President was arriving back in Washington from a brief vacation in Georgia. Brzezinski has in his office a machine, rather like a small television set that tells him where the President is at any moment. When the President moves from one place to another, the machine lets out a small beep. As we talked, the beeps indicated that the President had landed at Andrews Air Force Base, the President had boarded his helicopter, and so on, until the President's helicopter landed on the White House lawn. Each time the machine beeped, even though it was fairly clear what the beeps indicated, Brzezinski raced over to see what the machine was saying. Perhaps this was because Brzezinski was rather keyed up: as soon as the President landed, there was to be a meeting of Carter, Brown, Vance, Brzezinski, and Vice-President Walter Mondale on, I later learned, the neutron weapon.

No one questions that Brzezsinki has a talent as a synthesizer or that he is creative. Brzezinski is a conceptualizer, who has made his way by means of the use of words. His career has been marked by an outpouring of books, articles, columns. He is a skilled entrepreneur of ideas, and, as one of his former colleagues at Columbia says, "sometimes it comes off and sometimes it doesn't." He is often described as articulate, and he can sound brilliant, dazzling. It is sometimes not clear to people afterward how much he has actually said. Articulateness takes various forms. Some people are articulate in that they can express a thought clearly and succinctly. Brzezinski tends to be wordy. Moreover, many see his style as one that employs inflated words and thus inflates the thought. He likes big words, and he likes to coin terms and striking phrases. One of his books is titled "Between Two Ages: America's Role in the Technetronic Era." A "technetronic society," according to Brzezinski, is "a society that is shaped culturally, psychologically, socially and economically by the impact of technology and electronics." In a speech in 1977 before the Trilateral Commission, of which he was director before he joined the government, he said:

In some regards, the crisis of the spirit in recent years has been specifically American; in a larger sense, it has been part of the broader malaise of the West; in some respects, it is related to the political awakening of mankind, which has had the effect of transforming heretofore seemingly universal Western values into an apparently parochial perspective. As a crisis of historical confidence, and of international relevance to a world that seemingly rejects Western values, its essence has been well expressed by Hermann Hesse writing "Steppenwolf" . . .

One of his aides says that Brzezinski's mind is so quick that it sometimes gets out ahead of him. Sometimes the words do, too. During an appearance on "Face the Nation" early this year, Brzezinski suggested that the border clash between Vietnam and Cambodia was the first case of a "proxy war" between China and the Soviet Union. Asked if there were any intelligence reports that Chinese or Soviet advisers were involved, he replied that there were not. In fact the intelligence reports indicated that China, being weaker than the Soviet Union and allied with the weaker of the two warring nations (Cambodia), did not want a war between those nations to take place. When I asked him recently about the statement, he offered this explanation: "I probably should not have used the word 'war.' I should have said 'proxy conflict.' The war between the two countries has deep-seated historical roots. But the conflict between the two major countries is a proxy conflict." I asked him if he thought that the two major countries were promoting the war, and he replied, "The two major countries are not necessarily promoting it, but both are interested in the outcome, because it can determine how Indo-China is organized. If Hanoi emerges, that enhances the Soviet role."

Brzezinski was one of the first of the contenders for a foreign-policy position in a Democratic Administration who paid attention to Carter. They met through the Trilateral Commission, an organization started by David Rockefeller in 1973. The idea behind the commission, which was developed when John Connally, then Secretary of the Treasury, was applying economic shock treatment to our allies, was that economic and foreign policy should be made in cooperation with our European and Japanese allies. A number of lawyers, businessmen, academics, and others who move in and out of the foreign-policy field were invited to become members. Several politicians were also invited to join, and the story goes that those forming the commission thought it should include a Southern governor, and that the choice came down to Carter, then governor of Georgia, or Reubin Askew, governor of Florida. Brzezinski was one of those who were instrumental in selecting Carter for the commission (an idea that has several claimants). Through the commission, Carter got exposure to foreign-policy questions, and came to know Brzezinski. They spent a good bit of time together at a meeting that the commission held in Japan in May of 1975, where Carter made a foreign-policy speech of which he was said to be quite proud. Brzezinski reviewed and discussed the speech with him before it was given, and following the speech Brzezinski praised Carter from the rostrum as a candidate who was not afraid to speak out on the issues. Brzezinski, not unlike other ambitious people in the foreign-policy field—or, for that matter, the domestic field—was known to be on the lookout for a Presidential candidate whose success could bring him a high government position. The main difference between Brzezinski and most of the others was in the degree of effort he put into the enterprise; he had gained something of a reputation for sending his writings around, with notes attached, and making himself available to various potential candidates. He had served from 1966 to 1968 on the policy-planning staff of the State Department and had been one of the most public of the defenders of the Vietnam war, participating—using his debating skills—in the "tech-ins" that took place during those years. Gradually, he modified his views.

(On a "Face the Nation" appearance late last year, he described the Vietnam war this way: "What started off as an act of counter-intervention against a foreign intervention became a national-liberation struggle, and we got bogged down in it.") He directed Hubert Humphrey's foreign-policy task forces during Humphrey's 1968 Presidential campaign, and in subsequent years made himself available to Humphrey, Henry Jackson, Walter Mondale, Edward Kennedy, and Birch Bayh. Politicians, busy people, are attracted to the good briefing officer—the person who can sum up a problem in a way that seems intelligent, clear and useful. People who are hesitant, who suggest too many dilemmas and shadings, do not do so well. Brzezinski often impresses people as a good briefing officer. To Carter, as other Carter aides see it, Brzezinski came on as a man with a world view, a global thinker. Kissinger and Brzezinski are said to have been rivals for years—during a luncheon at the State Department for outside academics and others in 1973, at the time Kissinger was national-security adviser and Secretary of State, Kissinger turned to Brzezinski and said, "Zbig, you want this job"—and the irony is that Kissinger, for all the unpopularity of his policies, helped pave the way for Brzezinski. Some think even the accent was a factor.

One word that is frequently used in descriptions of Brzezinski by people in the government is "impulsive." Members of his own staff say that they have learned not to act at once on some of his instructions but to wait awhile and then try to get him to change his mind. He is an activist, and he works for an activist President, whom he briefs at the beginning of each day. Some staff members say that Brzezinski, who tends to combativeness in any event, often seems particularly feisty after these morning meetings, and comes back with ideas or instructions that are best allowed to cool. An official of the State Department who is in a position to know about these things says that the Department also feels it necessary to deflect some ideas that come from the President by way of Brzezinski: "It's part of Brzezinski's makeup to react quickly," says one official. Brzezinski is often described as a less settled personality, as a person with less ballast, than his principal counterparts, Brown and Vance, as more eager to assert himself and demonstrate his—and this country's "toughness." For all the rhetoric in Carter's speeches, and Brzezinski's own writing and speeches about there now being a new kind of world, Brzezinski's essential reaction to events, according to many witnesses, is to see them in terms of the rivalry of the Soviet Union and the United States. They add that Brzezinski, for his part, is frequently eager to take actions that challenge—test—the Soviet Union. One official has told me, "His first, flash-point reaction usually has an anti-Soviet tone, but after discussion, when there is time to get other opinions, it turns out that that may be his first reaction but not necessarily his final reaction. That's a good quality. But it puts a high premium on there being time for subsequent reactions." When I asked the official what context this comes up in, he replied, "It would be too much to say it comes up everyplace—but only a little."

Staff members say that Brzezinski is not inflexible, and tell of times when they were able to persuade him to change his mind. "His mind can be changed when you can pin him down," one aide says. They say that he invites discussion and disagreement, does not mind dissent from his opinions, and is also willing to turn around and go in and try to change the President's mind—and has succeeded in doing so. "Of all of the people in this Administration," says one foreign-policy official, "Zbig is the one most able to do something strikingly good and the most likely to do something strikingly bad." He explains that Brzezinski is capable of an original insight, of making a connection between things that no one else could see, and that he is also capable of the greatest mistake in judgment. A number of people stress the point that, in addition to the numerous times Brzezinski, Vance, and Brown meet, they spend a great deal of time on the phone with each other. Also, Brown and Vance do have their own access to the President. But they must decide how often they want to use it. Moreover, Vance spends a great deal of time out of the country. There is no question that, of them all, Brzezinski spends by far the most time with the President. George Ball once said, "Nothing propinques like propinquity." It is Brzezinski's role to present the views of the others to the President, but he and his associates make it clear that he does not hestitate to press his own views as well. This gets to the question of how the national-security system is supposed to and does work.

The way the national-security system of any Administration works is inevitably a reflection of the President as well as of the major officials involved. Every President has to have some kind of apparatus for coordinating the making of foreign policy, because so many parts of the government have a claim on that policy. The State and Defense Departments are the most obvious ones, but other departments, even the Agriculture Department, take actions that affect our relations with other nations. The State Department and the Defense Department are bound to view several important questions from different perspectives, and over the years there have been towering arguments between them. Someone has to help the President sort all this out, and has to coordinate the execution of his policy decisions. That was the original idea of having a National Security Council. The whole thing gets a bit more complicated when, as has happened in recent years, the N.S.C. weighs in with a voice of its own. When people speak of the National Security Council and of the N.S.C., they are actually talking about two somewhat different things: the formal group of top-level officials which helps the President make and carry out foreign and military policy, and the substantial staff that works under the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs. Increasingly, the term "N.S.C." is applied to the latter.

The National Security Council was created in 1947 as a reform of the way national-security policy was made, and it was charged by statute with advising the President "with respect to the integration of domesic, foreign, and miliary policies relating to the national security." The statutory members of the National Security Council are the President, the Vice-President, and the Secretaries of State and Defense. Listed as official advisers are the director of the C.I.A. and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Others who might be called in are the Secretary of the Treasury, the chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, the director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Attorney General and the director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. President Eisenhower, who believed in tidy organization, relied heavily on the National Security Council, but the dominant foreign-policy figure of his Administration was Secretary of State John Foster Dulles. During the Nixon Administration, by contrast, Henry Kissinger dominated foreign policy while he was serving as national-security adviser (in 1973, he became both Secretary of State and national-security adviser, and then, in 1975, just Secretary of State, with his former deputy in the national-security job). The National Security Council structure began to reach its modern form under John F. Kennedy, who ordered a revision after the Bay of Pigs.

The national-security adviser can play a number of roles: the presenter to the President of the options developed in consultations with the relevant agencies; personal adviser to the President; coordinator of the management of foreign and military policy. Some men who have held the job have seen it more in terms of presenting the options, some more in terms of presenting their own advice. Brzezinski represents himself as doing both, and this dual capacity causes some mistrust and some confusion elsewhere in the government. It is also said by a number of people that Brzezinski lacks understanding of the coordinating function, of how to make the machinery of government work. The national-security adviser and his staff may also have to spur action, head off action, guide diplomatic negotiations. "I'm a synthesizer, analyzer, coordinator," Brzezinski said to me recently. "I might also be alerter, energizer, implementer, mediator, even lightning rod. All of these roles I play at different times, depending on the issues."

Just as President Carter has preferred not to have a chief of staff on domestic affairs, he has preferred to have no dominant figure on questions of foreign policy. And just as he would be criticized for having one person through whom everything concerning domestic policy had to be filtered, he would be criticized for having such an arrangement for foreign policy. But it is one thing, especially when it comes to foreign policy, to have a number of ideas flowing in to a President and another to have a cacophony of voices flowing out, speaking to the world about what our policy is.

Vance, Mondale, and Brzezinski—along with, in recent months, Hamilton Jordan, the President's chief domestic adviser—meet with the President for breakfast each Friday morning; and Brown, Vance, and Brzezinski meet for lunch almost every week. "The National Security Council is a handful of people whom the President gathers when he choses," says one foreign-policy official. The official National Security Council itself is divided into two committees: the Policy Review Committee, to deal with special issues, in which one department has the principal role, such as arms for the Middle East (which Brown chaired), Southern Africa, or the Far East (which Vance chaired); and the Special Coordination Committee, which deals with questions, such as the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) or the Horn of Africa, that cut across agency jurisdictions and which Brzezinski always chairs. Officials these days make much of the fact that the chairing of some of these meetings is shared, in contrast to Kissinger's time, when he chaired almost all committee meetings. Since so many people made a point of telling me recently that the chairing of the committees was shared, I asked what difference it made. One of the more straightforward officials said that since the draft paper is drawn up by the agency whose representative chairs the meeting, that agency has some advantage. These things are taken very seriously. One member of the N.S.C. staff said to me recently that the questions usually asked by outsiders—"Who's ahead?" or "Who is more powerful?"—aren't the right questions. "The real question," he said, "is 'Who's got the running on this issue?' That's what we look at."

The N.S.C. staff is composed of thirty professionals, whose responsibilities are divided among the regions of the world—reflecting the regional divisions in the State Department—and among intelligence and defense matters. As a symbol of new emphases, Brzezinski also created staff positions to handle what have come to be called "North-South" questions—economic issues between the developing and the developed nations—and "global" issues, which include arms transfers, human rights, and nuclear proliferation. N.S.C. jobs are valued by people on the rise in the fields of foreign policy and national security, and the present staff members are, by and large, highly intelligent and capable people. Relations between the members or the N.S.C. staff and their counterparts at the State Department vary. The people at the N.S.C. and the State Departmen who handle the Middle East, for example, are said to work together smoothly, whereas there has been considerable friction between the man who handles Latin America policy for the N.S.C. and the people at the State Department who deal with the region, the State Department's Latin America bureau being relatively traditional and resistant to change.

Great mounds of paper move from the agencies to the N.S.C. staff, which communicates by phone or memo, or at meetings, with counterparts throughout the government. A State Department official estimates that less than five percent of the information that goes from the Department to the N.S.C. actually goes from Vance to Brzezinski. The N.S.C. staff sees the intelligence reports that are received by the State Department. Even the N.S.C. staff has difficulty keeping up. One staff member told me recently, "I spend all my time on one area, and I realize that I skim off only a tiny percentage of what I should know. There are at least two or three hundred items a day in my 'in' box. I have to sort out what it's essential for Zbig and the President to know. When I think of how hard it is for me to stay on top of things, I have to believe that it's impossible for the President, Vance, and Brzezinski." An aide to Brzezinski estimates that some three hundred and fifty pages reach Brzezinski's desk each day, and that about a fourth of what reaches Brzezinski will reach the President. Memos to the President from the agencies that are concerned with national-security affairs go through Brzezinski, who will put his own covering memo on them—which the other agencies do not see. This too is the kind of thing that is taken seriously in the government. One State Department official says, "As a practical matter, if I worked in the White House, I wouldn't want to have to clear that covering memo with the department. It would take too much time. But that memo is tremendous power, as is anything the N.S.C. staff wants to put on top of what comes from State and Defense." In addition, every evening Vance sends a report directly to the President which Brzezinski later sees. However, if it suggests any action, Brzezinski has a chance to comment on it before it reaches the President. And, in addition, staff members send Brzezinski nightly reports on what they did that day, intelligence matters they think he should be aware of, and even which journalists they spoke with and what sorts of questions the journalists were asking.

Brzezinski is said to be quick with paperwork, but some staff members say he is so quick that they sometimes wonder how much he has absorbed. Others complain that from time to time the paperwork can get quite backed up. But people who worked for Kissinger say that often they didn't know what happened to the papers they sent in. Kissinger was secretive with his staff; Brzezinski vowed to be open with his, and he has been fairly so. He has kept his promise to hold weekly staff meetings—some of which are routine, some of which are spirited debates about, say, what to do in the Horn of Africa, or about the dollar. He has tried to remain accessible to the staff, but, as the pressures and the papers mount up, this has become more difficult. And some issues, particularly the most sensitive ones, are closely held among the principal participants. An argument could be made that these are just the ones that should receive the most airing within the government, but the theory is that this runs the risk of disclosure.

After some leaks last year, particularly on matters relating to SALT—leaks that might well have come from any number of places—the N.S.C. staff was questioned severely by its senior members, and its access to information about what was going on within the N.S.C. was cut down. Once a week, the staff members prepare reports on items that might be of interest to the President; Brzezinski selects from them, adds his own views, and sends a memo to the President. Within the White House, much is made of the fact that memorandums by the staff of Stuart Eizenstat, the President's Assistant for Domestic Affairs and Policy, go to the President, via Eizenstat, with their own signatures on them, while memorandums by Brzezinski's staff go in with Brzezinski's signature. It is also widely noted that Eizenstat's staff has more direct dealings with the President than Brzezinski's does. In places occupied by people of ambition, these things count for a lot.

What with all the paper flow and all the meetings, one wonders how these people get much time to think, and, according to their own testimony, they don't. One N.S.C. staff member says, "In these jobs, we work off of our intellectual capital. We don't have the time to think new thoughts." The pressures on Brzezinski are even greater. He has to be responsive to the President, to his own counterparts, to the press, to the public, and to a highly articulate staff. Each day begins early—sometimes at seven—with preparations for his morning briefing of the President. For that, he goes over the intelligence reports that have come in overnight and been forwarded to him by the people in the Situation Room, in the White House basement. He makes notes to himself on a small white pad, in small, neat handwriting, of points he wants to bring up with the President. Then, on any given day he may have to make decisions on a range of subjects which includes the Middle East, the neutron weapon, the Horn of Africa, Rhodesia, SALT, economic questions. He will deal with the press (he gives a fair number of interviews these days), with the President's domestic advisers. He may have to help with the preparations for a Presidential trip abroad, a Presidential speech, or the visit of a foreign leader. He may also deal with questions concerning our intelligence capabilities (a matter in which he has a great interest), with a dispute over the size of the Navy. Meanwhile, a State Department official in Mogadishu, Somalia, may be asking for reaction to discussions with Siad Barre, the leader of Somalia; our ambassador to Saudi Arabia or an ambassador from a foreign country may come in to see him. He sees the President, on the average, four times a day—and once, Brzezinski told me, as many as eleven. He lunches with journalists, with Soviet Ambassador Anatoly Dobrynin; he tries to keep up old contacts in the academic world. He also makes it clear that he spends a lot of time talking with Vance and Brown. One staff member says, "He moves so quickly he's damn hard to get to concentrate on issues sometimes. The point is, he's very, very quick, and all his life he's been quick. He thinks he knows the end of your sentence when he's heard the first three words. He does have a thing about having pretty much an open-door policy. That means that people are hanging around the door ready to dive-bomb him with a question, and usually they catch him on the way to something else. You have to recognize when you're not going to be able to get him to focus."

I asked Brzezinski once how he can handle all that he must do. "There is too much paperworks," he replied. "The President thinks so, too. It's terrible. It's a continuous rush against time. You have to make quick decisions. People want you on the phone all the time. It's a continuous race, really. You come in in the morning and until you leave it's go, go, go, go, go, go, go, go, go, go. It doesn't give you much time for reflection or banter or amusement—although I occasionally send memos to the President with jokes and get such memos from him. What you have to be able to do is concentrate on whatever comes up and also at times detach yourself and ask what else you should be doing. That's the most troubling part. I have to cope. Either I cope or it becomes a bottleneck in here or things get dumped on the President. You don't have enough time to reflect on long-term issues. You're continually responding to things that come to you. It's a continuous race. It really is. Just one endless race."

Every new Administration attempts to set itself apart from its predecessor in certain ways. When the Carter Administration began, great emphasis was placed on the President's intention that decision-making in the national-security area would be a "team effort." Not only was no one to be dominant—as Henry Kissinger had been during the preceding eight years of Republican Administrations—but everyone was to get along. But behind the facade of "collegiality" between Brzezinski and his counterparts in the departments, and despite initial efforts by Brzezinski, Brown, and Vance to keep strains to a minimum, serious strains did develop—based in part on personal styles, in part on policy—especially between the N.S.C. and the State Department. Moreover, the amount of infighting has been growing steadily. Vance is a far more strong-willed, determined man than his modest public self would make it appear, and people at the State Department insist that it is mainly Vance's enormous self-discipline, together with his determination to make the relationship with the N.S.C. work, which has kept that relationship from deteriorating further. The N.S.C. staff, for its part, has had some critical things to say about Vance—for instance, that he is too cautious. And, increasingly, news stories that have obviously emanated from the N.S.C. have suggested that the N.S.C. feels that Vance and some of his associates are not capable of dealing with the Soviets in a sufficiently firm manner. One difference in approach between Brzezinski and Vance, says a State Department man, is that "Brzezinski reacts 'Don't just sit there, do something, while Vance reacts 'don't just do something, sit there—until you understand the consequences of what you want to do.'"

A White House aide who is close to the President says, "Vance is a tougher man than he seems to be. And he's less inclined to be concerned with day-to-day events than Zbig is." Vance is described by associates as feeling that an eye must be kept on Brzezinski, and as having had to check some of his moves—or try to. For example, Brzezinski has been wanting for some time to take a trip to China. (Kissinger made a famous trip to China in 1971.) Brzezinski is described as wishing to use relations with the People's Republic of China the way Kissinger did, as a means of tweaking the Soviet Union; that is, of wishing to do what policymakers call "playing the China card." The question of a trip arose out of a luncheon that Vice-President Mondale gave at the White House in November of 1977 for Huang Chen, the chief of Peking's liaison office in Washington, who was ending a four-year tour in the United States. At the luncheon, Huang told Brzezinski that he hoped he would visit China sometime, and Brzezinski smiled, pulled out his calendar, and asked when would be a good date. The Chinese representatives at the luncheon suggested sometime this spring. Later, Vance and others, including some at the White House, opposed the idea of the trip and worked to put it through the policy system, but Brzezinski did not give up. For another example, at the conclusion of the visit of Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin to Washington in March of this year, Vance went to the White House and persuaded the President—contrary to the advice of Brzezinski and other members of the President's staff—not to issue a statement outlining in tough terms the differences between Carter and Begin which emerged from their meetings. The view at the White House was that Begin should not be permitted to gloss over the differences; Vance's argument was that the differences should not be exacerbated, and that some Israelis had argued that such a statement would undercut those in Israel who wanted to take issue with Begin's bargaining position. In the end, Vance prevailed and no statement was issued (but, through briefings of members of Congress and the press, the President and his aides took pains to emphasize the depth of the differences). By March, during a bitter controversy over policy in the Horn of Africa, the sniping in the press at the State Department by members of the N.S.C. staff—indicating that the State Department wasn't being sufficiently "tough"—so exasperated Vance that he phoned Brzezinski and told him to tell his staff to cut it out. One N.S.C. staff member said to me during the debate over the Horn, "There is more realpolitik in our shop." But Brzezinski is regarded as far more sensitive than Vance to criticism that comes his way via the press.

As for Harold Brown, he is described as conducting himself within the National Security Council as a very self-assured man, convinced of his brilliance and unpersuaded of his need to convince others of it. It is said by those who have witnessed meetings of the principals that Brown is a very forceful presence—sometimes the most forceful. Brzezinski is described as the one most eager to say bright, clever things; Vance as fairly quiet, Buddha-like, stating his position directly and with little adornment; and Brown as a man who states his position and when he is disagreed with is inclined to rely sardonically—and to good effect—to the opponent's argument. There have been occasions when Brown, too, has checked an impulse of Brzezinski's—an example being the issue of the Horn of Africa. One man who is close to the President says that at these meetings the President's immersion in paperwork—about which, this man said, some of the criticism is valid—comes in handy. "When we have a meeting," this man told me, "Carter's ready. So the question becomes not who's toughest or cleverest but who's got the best argument."

One of Brzezinski's liabilities, according to a number of people, including some of his defenders, is a lack of political feel. One State Department official says, "People who sit in that job and don't have a sense of the political process are at a great disadvantage."

One of Brzezinski's staff members says, "He's a political blank." As numerous people describe his lack of political sense, it involves dealing with people—his own staff, others in the White House, officials in other parts of the government, foreign diplomats, members of Congress—understanding how to get policy executed, and judging the implications of policies. It was in an effort to insure more consideration of domestic political implications that Hamilton Jordan got into the process of decision-making on foreign policy—at first on an informal basis, then on a more systematic basis. So now he attends the Friday-morning breakfasts of Brzezinski, Vance, Mondale, and the President, and Brzezinski attends meetings of the White House senior staff, which are now held three times a week. However, Brzezinski may have felt about Jordan's intrusion on his jurisdiction, he has, according to several people, made an effort (which would, of course, be the only wise thing to do) to behave at the breakfasts as one of the team. Still, there are tensions with the domestic staff. Some, again, are inevitable; the chemistry between the quick-talking, conceptualizing, sophisticated, aristocratic Brzezinski and the earthy Georgians around the President is not likely to be good. And on the domestic side of the White House, others besides the Georgians share something of the suspicion that many feel about those who dwell in the world of foreign policy—a suspicion that such people regard themselves as something apart, experts, people who deal in matters that others cannot possibly understand.

Not only within the White House but in much of Washington, a good deal has been made of the fact that Hamilton Jordan is known to refer to Brzezinski—in a description apparently based on looks as well as style—as Woody Woodpecker. (Jordan enjoys making irreverent comments, but no other such appellation for a member of the Administration has come to light.) Some of those on the White House staff complain, as do some people at the State Department, that matters they thought were settled between them and Brzezinski have a way of resurfacing. Within the White House, this complaint has applied to such matters as the number of foreign visitors the President would receive this year—the domestic aides were trying to keep the number down—and the return of the Crown of St. Stephen to Hungary, which caused an uproar in the Hungarian-American community in this country, and which the domestic aides thought they had prevented. It was after the President, in March of 1977, in a town meeting in Clinton, Massachusetts, said that the Palestinians should have a "homeland" that some domestic aides thought they had better keep an eye on foreign policy. And it was after the release of the joint statement by the United States and the Soviet Union calling for a reconvening of the Geneva Peace Conference on the Middle East, and saying that one of the conference's purposes would be to insure "the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people," that they decided to move in. The authorship of the joint statement, which caused an uproar in the Jewish community, has few claimants. The President's domestic political aides were quick to say that they had never seen it before it was issued. A couple of Brzezinski's aides told me that Brzezinski, who was in Europe just before it was issued, had not seen it. Brzezinski does say that he saw it, but points out that, while he supports it, Vance initiated it. Vance does not disclaim it. (Actually, the discussions of the joint statement were deliberately confined to a few people, for fear of leaks. It is not clear that the reaction would have been any milder if more outside people had been prepared for it.) The domestic aides held Brzezinski responsible for the original concept of the President's trip abroad last year—a trip that was to have covered eight nations in eleven days—and they say that Jordan and Powell did not learn of it until shortly before it was announced. One of the President's advisers said to me at that time, "There are only two people who think that trip is a good idea—Brzezinski and the President." After a while, the original trip was divided in two, but the first one was still almost beyond human endurance.

Despite the fact that among the principals most policy disagreements are openly and candidly discussed, the fact is that Brzezinski has not built a reservoir of trust or good will among members of the Administration. Perhaps it is inevitable that when the head of the N.S.C. is a strong personality with his own strong views, there will be suspicions about how accurately others' views are represented. One hears of instances in which Brzezinski is thought to have pressed his advantage of access. But since no one sees all the memorandums that Brzezinski sends to the President or is in on all their meetings, no one can know for sure. Brzezinski did not help himself in others' eyes when he began to cultivate increased press attention to his views. He indicated at the outset that he understood this danger. He had been a bit of a celebrity before he joined the Carter Administration, but he was careful during the first few months not to appear to be seeking publicity. In October of 1977, Brzezinski said in an interview that appeared in the National Journal, "I was sensitive to the fact that if I started running around being the object of numerous interviews and television programs [the impression that he sought to undercut the Secretaries of State or Defense] would be abetted and people would simply thrive on it." He continued, "Moreover, I do think that [in avoiding this] I can be more effective in influencing what is of central importance, namely the direction of things." Then in the course of the next few months Brzezinski gave numerous interviews, and between October 30th and January 8th appeared on "Issues and Answers" once and "Face the Nation" twice. He is the first national-security adviser to have his own press assistant. In a recent talk with me, Brzezinski said, "The fact that there is genuine trust between the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, and this place is very important. This would be an easy place to intrigue from. But that trust is something I worked very hard at in the course of the last year." He added, smiling, "Occasionally at some cost to my ego." But whatever trust there was has been dissipating. Of late, Brzezinski has increasingly developed a public persona, set himself forward as a shaper of policy, publicly placed himself apart in his views from other policymakers. He has let himself go, acted more openly on his own deepest instincts—and, by his own testimony, had more fun. One symptom of mistrust is that the domestic aides sometimes take care, when the White House issues some official explanation for a foreign-policy matter, that Brzezinski's name gets attached to the explanation so he will be held responsible for it. Brzezinski is blamed for an inability to deal well with members of Congress which can in fairness also be attributed to several people at the White House, including the President, but still there appears to be something to the charge as it applies specifically to the national-security adviser.

Here the contrast with Kissinger cannot be escaped. For better or worse, Kissinger had a talent for cultivating and charming members of Congress—even ingratiating himself at the height of the Vietnam war with some of those who opposed the war. Recently, I asked a senator who is very important to the Administration on foreign policy and is a sophisticated man what sorts of dealings he had had with Brzezinski. He replied, "Virtually none," adding, "He doesn't seem to know how to deal with senators."

Earlier this year, Brzezinski held two meetings on Middle East policy with people representing Jewish organizations. One, by all accounts, went smoothly enough; the other was marked by an eruption of temper on Brzezinski's part. At the second one, according to a couple of witnesses, Brzezinski, feeling provoked by some of the questions, let loose his scrappy side. The result, according to witnesses, was to fuel fears in the Jewish community, a process that was helped along by Brzezinski's evident satisfaction that the confrontation had taken place. He expressed this satisfaction to his staff, and also told a Times reporter that he almost welcomed the opportunity to respond on the record to the resentment and the charges that had been directed at him by some Jewish leaders. Though there is little disagreement between the State Department and Brzezinski over Middle East policy, Brzezinski is the target of more attacks—apparently because of the difference in style between him and Vance, because Brzezinski is seen as the initiator of policies that displease some Jewish leaders, and because they don't want to attack Carter directly, and consider Brzezinski the next best thing. Yet even people within the Administration who share the view that pressure had to be brought on Israel to change its policy felt that a confrontation such as took place at the second meeting was unnecessary. "When he gets angry questions, he feels justified in responding in angry tones," one says of Brzezinski. "It's a luxury to be able to lash back." Another says, "He simply doesn't understand how to massage people."

The members of Brzezinski's staff who say that he's flexible also say that views he developed in his academic career guide much of his current thinking and advice. Brzezinski himself has said, "On the whole, my views are strategically consistent, tactically very fluid." In an interview recently, I asked Brzezinski what his strategic views were. "The ones I've been outlining in my books since 1960," he replied. "I see the U.S.-Soviet competition as deep-seated. On the other hand, the world has entered a phase of political awakening and some disorder. So that the real danger is not Soviet domination but anarchy.

"The United States has to play an active world role, because if it doesn't, I think, there is a high danger the world will fragment in a way that is chaotic." Brzezinski is a collector and sprinkler of ideas, and sometimes they don't fit together. Someone who has worked with him says, "He doesn't think through issues he doesn't understand as well as he might. He reacts in areas he dosen't understand. Sometimes the reactions are good, sometimes they're not. It goes back to the academic environment, where people put a premium on coming up with sometimes controversial ideas and then seeing how others react and then formulating a theory. The trouble is, when you're sitting as the head of the N.S.C. staff and you offer an idea, people may think you've thought it through and they should act." The "trilateral" idea—the Trilateral Commission's idea that the United States should formulate policy in conjunction with our European allies and Japan—appears to have hit the floor soon after the Administration took office. Other Pacific nations—the Philippines, Australia, and so on—let it be known that Japan could not speak for them on international questions. As for Europe, relations with Germany gradually deteriorated, over a number of questions—including economic ones—to such a degree that some in the Administration believe they are at the lowest point in decades. "The trilateral idea is dead," says one foreign-policy official. "It was just rhetoric." (People within the Administration say that there is a lack of coordination between economic and foreign policy.) Some policy ideas—inevitably, perhaps—run into other policy ideas. The push for human rights has collided at times with the Administration's interest in maintaining or securing good relations with certain nations. So has the desire to stop the spread of nuclear power and the sale of conventional arms.

There is no question that Brzezinski has helped to steer our foreign policy in some new directions. He clearly feels that the United States must seek to ally itself with the nations that he refers to as "the new influentials." He oulined this approach in a talk to the White House senior staff and the Cabinet—with the President in attendance—in the early days of the Administration, and has pursued various policies, including the President's travels, to put it into effect.

In the briefing, Brzezinski explained major shifts that have taken place in the world since the Second World War—in population, economic power, and technology. He said, picking up on a theme of the Carter Presidential campaign, that the United States had traditionally supported the status quo in nations undergoing social conflict, and that now we should make a greater effort to identify the social forces of the future and align ourselves with them. "The new influentials" include Saudi Arabia, Nigeria, Brazil, Venezuela, Iran, India, and Indonesia. Five of them (Saudi Arabia, Nigeria, Venezuela, Iran, and Indonesia) are major oil exporters, and three (India, Brazil, and Indonesia) are among the most populous nations in the world. All of them but Indonesia were visted by the President. (And the Vice-President is scheduled to go there.) The previous Administration was often criticized for paying some of these countries little attention (not including Iran and Saudi Arabia). Moreover, Brzezinski has shown a greater sensitivity than his predecessor did to North-South questions, though efforts to deal with some of those questions have been hampered by economic realities in the United States. Those who believe that we must address the concerns of the developing nations say that Brzezinski's instincts on these questions are enlightened and progressive. The strategies on cultivating "the new influentials" and aligning ourselves with the correct social forces posit, of course, that officials can predict with accuracy which will be the intiuential countries and the correct social forces. They also posit a high degree of activism on our part.

What has happened in our foreign policy is that this new, "multipolar" awareness has been combined with the old "bipolar" struggle between the United States and the Soviet Union. In fact, Brzezinski has believed for some time that this would happen, and that it would lead to a clash of the two superpowers. During one of my conversations with him, he urged me to read an article that he had written for Encounter in 1968. In the article, entitled "Peace and Power," he argued that the end of the Vietnam war and the recent rise in Soviet military capability would lead to a situation in which there would be "two overlapping global military powers pursuing conflicting global policies in a dynamic setting of Third World instability." This new, "overlapping fluid (or mobile) imperial power," as Brzezinski termed it, was bound to lead to a collision somewhere. "Indeed," he wrote, "apprehension over this possibility could increase the inclination of each of the major powers to move in first, in the hope that by 'staking out' a claim it will discourage the other from moving. But the implicit premium on preëmption would mean a spiral of intervention." He said that the likely prospect was for some anarchy and social fragmentation in the Third World, and added, "Sporadic violence, in the context of a premium on preëmption, may have a suction effect on U.S. and Soviet intervention forces, resulting by the '70's in some unprecedented confrontations." He referred to the "Fashoda" incident, in 1898, in which English and French colonial expeditionary forces contended over control of the Upper Nile region. The French got there first, but backed down, without a fight, under pressure from the British. Brzezinski wrote, "At the minimum, at least one 'Fashoda' is to be expected." He continued, "The question is, of course, whether in the context of the new nuclear equation an American-Soviet 'Fashoda' will work out as peacefully as the Angola-French one did in the late 19th century."

In our conversation, Brzezinski said that his thesis that the two powers would come into conflict in a third place was being borne out. "This is going to put a premium on preemption, because who gets there first has command of the situation," he said. (In the Fashoda incident it was the nation that got there first that backed down.) "This Fashoda business no one has picked up," he went on. "Fashoda is very germane to our current concerns."

I asked him if this meant that he contemplated situations in which we might have to get there first.

He replied, "Yes, if it's vital enough. Yes, we ought to contemplate getting there first—or we will have to get there second and become first." He smiled.

I asked if there was an intersection between the new, multipolar reality and the bipolar reality.

"Yes," Brzezinski replied. "There are many different axes of conflict in the world: the traditional conflict between Soviet and American powers; the new conflicts with emerging countries; racial conflicts; North-South conflicts. They intersect, and the more they intersect, the more dangerous they become. What makes the South African conflict so dangerous is that it is racial, North-South, nationalistic, and ideological—all four rolled into one."

I asked him what he believed the Soviets' ultimate goal to be.

He said, "I don't think they have sat down and made a blueprint, a master plan for world conquest. I don't think they even have a plan for world revolution. As in the case of a lot of human behavior, they are driven by psychology, bureaucratic impulse, history, ideology, and nationalism. But this does not mean they will not act to exploit revolutions. In the end, it gets down to a simple proposition: they would like to become number one, like we did. It's better to become number one from the number-two position than to be toppled from number one. That's why there is such a serious problem. It's much more destabilizing for our self-esteem, for our role in the world; there's no way of knowing where you will stop once you start going downhill. Besides, there is the moral, religious context. If the West stands for anything in terms of values, it's for spiritual values and the spiritual identity of the individual. It would be a pity if that became less central in human affairs."

Brzezinski's emphasis on the rivalry between the United States and the Soviet Union sets him apart from many of the people he works with, both on his own staff and in other parts of the government. One who works in the national-security apparatus says, "Zbig has thought about the Soviets during much of his academic life. He thinks of them as more central and key than Vance does. Brzezinski's own instinct is to stand up, be tough, outproduce them economically and militarily. His view is that we are coming out of a bad time and they have to be shown some things. There is an almost systematic toughness in Zbig's writing and thinking. Vance believes that the Soviets are vital, but he is more likely to take other questions into consideration." A State Department official says that the difference in outlook between Brzezinski and State is one not so much over policy as over emphasis. Vance is described as not wanting to cause unnecessary abrasions in relations between the United States and the Soviet Union.

Officials offer a number of examples of Brzezinski's preoccupation. One is that he has brought up the idea from time to time that perhaps the United States should cause trouble for Agostinho Neto, the leader of Angola, who has Cuban backing—perhaps by giving some support to Jonas Savimbi, who had South African backing during the struggle over who would control Angola when it gained independence from Portugal. In 1975, Neto was backed by the Soviets and the Cubans, while the United States at first supported Holden Roberto and then, after he dropped out, joined South Africa in supporting Savimbi. At the end of 1975, the Ford Administration tried to increase our aid to Neto's opponents, which was mainly channelled through the C.I.A., and Congress not only balked but also tightened the restrictions on C.I.A. activity so that they would apply specifically to Angola. During the 1976 campaign, Jimmy Carter was critical of the Ford Administration's action. Also in 1976, Neto's forces prevailed. In recent months, Brzezinski has raised the question of whether the congressional restrictions are still applicable; the C.I.A. has told him that they are. I remarked to an Administration official who told me about this that I thought the matter of Angola had been settled before this Administration took office. He replied, "So did I. That's why I'm confused."

Brzezinski's concern about the Soviet Union came up in the context of the elections in France and Italy—what to do if the Communists gained power, what to do to prevent them from doing so. In the case of Italy, our ambassador was called back, and the State Department issued a statement toughening our earlier positions. The theory was that our statement of non-involvement but concern had been taken by some in Italy to mean that we were not concerned. Some Administration officials said privately that they did not want to be the ones to "lose" Italy. There are some within our government who feel not that it is unimportant who comes to power in these countries but that our issuing such statements does not affect the electorate at which they are aimed, except, perhaps, in precisely the opposite direction from what was intended.

Brzezinski's concern about the Soviet Union also comes up in the context of questions about our policies toward Eastern European nations—about how much emphasis should be given to encouraging some of those nations, such as Poland, Hungary, and Rumania, to distance themselves from the Soviet Union. Thus the President's visit to Poland, the first stop on his trip late last year. In Warsaw, at a press conference, he praised the "great religious freedom and otherwise" of the Polish people, and Brzezinski and Mrs. Carter made a publicized call on Stefan Cardinal Wyszynski, the Primate of Poland's Roman Catholic Church. It comes up in the context of whether to play to China in order to twit the Soviet Union. It comes up in regard to questions of intelligence-gathering methods. Brzezinski has been pressing for a revision of our intelligence-gathering methods, to move them from dependence on technological "hardware"—a dependence that developed during the nineteen-fifties, when the Soviet Union and other parts of the world were more difficult to penetrate than now—and back to more traditional espionage methods. He has also expressed concern about the restrictions that have been placed on C.I.A. activities as a result of the disclosures and investigations of recent years. He is troubled by the number of reviews to which some activities have to be subjected before they can be undertaken. He apparently believes that the United States should be able to use a wide range of techniques to influence the course of events in other countries. The Senate and the House, in creating intelligence-oversight committees, and President Carter, in issuing an executive order in January, took the position that whatever actions are proposed should be worked through a system that includes informing appropriate members of Congress and also the acceptance of responsibility by the highest executive leaders. The executive order requires that the President must "sign off" on any activity of any importance. Brzezinski is known to believe that the President should have broad flexibility, including "deniability"—that is, that it should be possible to carry out operations in a way that would enable the President to deny he knew about them. The question of accountability for such operations was one of the basic issues raised in the recent examination of our intelligence activities. The argument for it was that since any major intelligence activity could cause us great damage, it ought to be decided upon by our highest officials, who ought to take responsibility for it.

The differences over how we should conduct relations with the Soviet Union, over how we should conduct policy in the post-Vietnam era, came to a head on the issue of our policy concerning the Horn of Africa. The specific question was what was to be done about the presence of Cuban and Soviet advisers in Ethiopia, which was involved in a border war with Somalia. While no one liked the idea that those foreign troops were in the region, there was strong disagreement over what was to be or could be done about it. Some dramatic actions were considered, and some strong internal debates took place. In recent years, the relationships among the United States and the Soviet Union and Ethiopia and Somalia have begun to resemble a grand right and left in a square dance. The United States had been a strong backer of the Ethiopian regime headed by Haile Selassie, who was overthrown by the military in 1974, and even in the first years thereafter we tried, by selling the new government F-5 airplanes and other military equipment, to prevent it from turning to the Soviet Union for help. But then, as the Ethiopian regime became increasingly radical, we reduced our military assistance, and Ethiopia did turn to the Soviet Union for help—which in 1976 the Soviets agreed to give. Until then, the Soviets had been closely involved with Somalia, Ethiopia's historic enemy, and had built up its military capability. The United States, toward the end of the Ford Administration, decided to end military-grant aid to Ethiopia (though it would continue military sales), but did not announce this step. The Carter Administration did announce it, early in 1977, indicating that it was part of the new human-rights policy. By summer, relations between the United States and Ethiopia were very nearly broken off. Meanwhile, the Somalis, seeing that the Soviets were arming the Ethiopians, turned to the United States for help. Carter and Brzezinski were attracted to the idea of befriending the Somalis, as a way of countering the Soviets. In April of 1977, Carter allowed Time, which was reporting "With Jimmy from Dawn to Midnight," to hear him instruct Mondale to "tell Cy and Zbig that I want them to move in every possible way to get Somalia to be our friend." But the idea of arming the Somalis collided with the President's stated goal of reducing our role as an arms supplier and also with a policy enunciated in a speech by Vance in July. In that speech, Vance said that our policies in Africa "should not be reactive to what other powers do, nor to crises as they arise"—that "daily headlines should not set our agenda for progress."

He went on, "A negative, reactive American policy that seeks only to oppose Soviet or Cuban involvement in Africa would be both dangerous and futile. Our best course is to help resolve the problems which create opportunities for external intervention." In the end, the government made an agreement in principle to provide "defensive" arms to the Somalis. As these deliberations were going on, however, Somalia was encouraging guerrilla activity in the Ogaden region of Ethiopia, which is inhabited by ethnic Somalis, and on July 23rd, eight days after the United States decided, and informed the Somalis, that it would discuss supplying them with weapons, Somalia attacked Ethiopia (and we held off providing arms). Now the issue was one of "territorial integrity"—a very sensitive one in Africa, where all sorts of boundaries were drawn in the colonial era in such a way as to divide tribes. The Ethiopians called for help. The Soviet Union agreed to supply weapons, and in November it began to airlift Cuban troops, provided them with large amounts of military supplies, and increased the number of its advisers in Ethiopia.

Brzezinski felt strongly that the United States should react. There were two issues: what could be done about the military situation, and how the Soviets and the Cubans could be got out of Ethiopia. Moreover, there was concern that the Cubans and their allies, once they reconquered the Ogaden, might move into Somalia. While much was made in the press of reasons that the Horn is strategically important—that it lies abreast the oil routes from the Persian Gulf, that it is close to the mouth of the Red Sea, that it is near the Middle East oil states—some officials say that in the course of the internal debate hardly anyone in the government, including Pentagon representatives, argued that the Horn was very important strategically. For Brzezinski, it was a matter of the Cuban and Soviet presence in the area. Also, the President is described by some within the government as being much more bothered by the Cubans than some of the other officials are; it's said that to him as well as to Brzezinski they seem to represent some sort of challenge that sets off a visceral reaction. And Brzezinski is described as reacting viscerally to various stimuli. Within the N.S.C., there was talk of how, after all, Ethiopia was where the Second World War began. There were expressions of concern that the establishment of a Soviet footing in the Horn could cause serious problems for President Carter in the 1980 election. N.S.C. staff people say that concern was also expressed because a number of countries in the Middle East—Iran, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and the Sudan—were said to be worried about whether we took with sufficient seriousness Soviet meddling in Africa.

(We tried to get some African nations to object to the Soviet and Cuban presence, but since the intervention was in behalf of "territorial integrity," there was no response.) Brzezinski is described as having felt that we should make some gesture to show that we understood the Middle East nations' concerns. And one of Brzezinski's associates said to me as the debate over the Horn was proceeding that while no one believed in a domino theory for Africa, it was a fact that if the Soviets settled down in Ethiopia, and Siad Barre, the leader of Somalia, turned around and made a deal with them, then Kenya (wealthy, pro-Western, and capitalist), bordering both Ethiopia and Somalia on the south, and Djibouti, an enclave between Ethiopia and Somalia, would be in trouble. "It's just a fact," he said. The difficult question, he said, given the circumstance that the American people are by and large very uninterested in foreign policy, is how our government can deal vigorously enough with an incipient problem to prevent it from becoming a very big problem. He continued, "We're learning that the absence of involvement is dangerous and can lead you to more serious involvement. Nobody argues that we have to fight over every square inch in the world, but we're beginning to learn that there are clouds no larger than a man's hand which cannot be ignored."

Some people in the government, even within the N.S.C. staff, argued that to call attention to the Horn would be precisely the way to make it more of a domestic political issue. And they also asked what the point was in calling attention to it, since there was so little we could do about it. Moreover, some officials pointed out, Ethiopia had invited the Cubans and the Soviets in, and the Somalis were the aggressors. Nevertheless, it was Brzezinski's inclination to call attention to it—and to act. And although some in the government argued that in the long run the Soviet Union would be no more welcome in the area of the Horn than it had been in other countries outside its immediate sphere—for example, Egypt and the Sudan and even Somalia—people who make policy often find it difficult to think in terms of the long run. One foreign-policy official says, "My experience tells me that Communist countries, left to themselves, will mess things up in these ventures. It's easy for me to say that in ten years it's not going to matter, but ten years is not the life span of Presidencies." On February 24th of this year, when Brzezinski was giving a briefing on the President's forthcoming foreign trip, he took the opportunity to announce that there were ten or eleven thousand Cubans in Ethiopia, that substantial Soviet equipment was involved, and that a Soviet general was directing some of Ethiopia's armed forces.

On the same day, State Department officials were citing lower figures, and they were surprised that the Soviet general was mentioned. (The previous November, a map had appeared in the Times indicating the number of Cuban military personnel, advisers, technicians, and military aides in various countries in Africa. It had accompanied a story saying, "The Carter White House is seriously disturbed by the steadily expanding Cuban military presence in Angola, Ethiopia, and other African countries." A packet of material on which the chart was based had been prepared for the N.S.C., unbeknownst to State Department officials. Department officials believe that it was prepared by the C.I.A.) The State Department was not pleased by the White House pronouncements. Its policy had been to issue, in response to inquiries by the press, conservative estimates, partly for policy reasons—to avoid making the situation into a great U.S.-Soviet crisis, and in the hope of winning support of a settlement by the Organization of African Unity—and partly to protect intelligence sources. "We're over here talking about the Horn in one way, and Zbig is over there giving his briefing," says a State Department official. "A lot of people were trying to tell him that what we could do about the Horn was very limited, and therefore if we made a big commotion it would only make things worse. It would also make it look like more of a Russian success story. That was the consensus here. But he went ahead and did it anyway."

Brzezinski was not convinced that what we could do was so limited. A number of discussions of what we might do took place beginning in February, when the Administration began to focus on the possibility that Ethiopia might cross the Somalia border. One of the ideas he backed was that the United States should send in a naval task force. On this Brzezinski was opposed not only by Vance but also by Harold Brown. What, Brown asked, was the task force going to do after it got there? Brown's question was never successfully answered, and that idea was headed off. Brzezinski also suggested that if the Sudanese and the Egyptians, or, conceivably, the Saudis and the Iranians, were to send troops to Somalia, they might need equipment, and we should consider ways to help out. This suggestion ran into legal restrictions on the supplying of arms, and, in addition, it raised political questions about the effect of supplying, say, Egypt with infantry arms.

He was also interested in giving assurances to the Somalis and others that if Somalia should be invaded by Ethiopia, and if in that case Arab countries should send in troops to help Somalia and the troops should be interfered with by the Cubans or the Soviets, we would somehow come to the aid of those troops by military means. Questions were raised about what, exactly, we would or could do to help, and the preponderance of opinion was against our getting militarily involved. Even the Pentagon, it is said, drawing on recent experience, was not disposed to see us get into a situation in which we would not be able to follow through. Earlier, the Administration had considered the possibility that American military supplies given or sold to other countries might be transferred by those countries to Somalia. There was a legal problem with this: the law says that we cannot permit the transfer of weapons that we would not be prepared to supply directly. During these deliberations, Brzezinski raised once again the possibility of "playing the China card."

A State Department official says, "I think Zbig feels there is an inexorable push that comes from the Soviets. Most of us agree. But he feels you have to take a strong position, so that you can dramatize your position and build strong support. Others will say, O.K., but what are you going to do about it? We haven't got the tools we used to have: the use of covert activity, or even military and economic assistance, is incredibly circumscribed by legislation now. Besides, large covert activities don't stay covert any longer. Other people are more sensitive to these things than he is." One high official who was in on these deliberations says, "Sometimes raising the question of whether we will be 'tough' or 'weak' is a reaction people have when they don't understand the complexity of an issue—it's an emotional response." Another official says of the deliberations, "To try to publicly assert national anger in the absence of a remedy may lead to precisely the opposite of what is intended—to an appearance of impotence. The more we escalated the issue of the Horn, the more the question was asked what we were going to do about it. Since there was no way of getting withdrawal of the Russian and Cuban troops, pressing the issue made that more obvious. Brown was very helpful here. He asked, How do you answer that problem? He's lived through a period where we asserted our power and didn't have an answer, and he saw what happened to our nation. He wants a strong nation and a strong defense, but he understands what's a bluff and what isn't."

As our own government's battle over the Horn was going on, Brzezinski called attention to it around Washington, telling people that it was the first major foreign-policy battle within the Administration, and that he was winning. He saw it, he told people, as an embodiment of a theory he had developed about how Vietnam had created generational differences over foreign policy: In one group there is a generation of people in their fifties and early sixties who were influential ten years ago and were involved in decisions about Vietnam (this would apply to Vance and Brown) and are deeply affected by that experience, and another generation of people in their thirties who were emotionally opposed to the war at that time (this would apply to some of the younger officials at the State Department) and who remain marked by that experience. In the other group, his theory goes, are those in their forties who are too young to have been decision-makers about Vietnam, and those in their twenties who are too young to have had any involvement at all. Therefore, people in their thirties and people in their fifties and sixties are those most affected by Vietnam, and others are less inclined to think about it when considering, say, Ethiopia or Yugoslavia. (Brzezinski just turned fifty.)

I asked him recently if he thought that, in general, America was too strictly bound by post-Vietnam attitudes.

"Yes," he replied. "There is a tendency in America to be traumatized by international difficulties. The generation of the nineteen-forties was always thinking about the failure of the League of Nations. I'm talking about leadership groups now. The leadership of the sixties was always thinking about Munich. Now there is a generation worried by Vietnam, with consequences of self-imposed paralysis, which is likely to be costlier in the long run."

The other great issue that came up in the course of the Administration's internal debate over the Horn—and it will come up in other contexts—was what to do about "linkage." "Linkage," or making a connection between one aspect of the United States-Soviet relationship and another aspect of it, was selectively employed by Kissinger over the years, depending on the circumstances and on whether it was seen to be in our interest. When the Carter Administration took over, it explicitly rejected the concept of "linkage." Vance said that negotiations with the Soviet Union would not be linked to all Soviet actions—that each issue "should be discussed on its own footing."

The Administration position on the Horn had been to say that the Soviet involvement there could affect the political atmosphere in the United States. This was, State Department officials concede, a statement of the obvious—that, especially given all the attention that was being called to the situation, the activities of the Soviets in the Horn might make it more difficult to gather the necessary political support to win Senate approval of a new SALT agreement. Then, on March 1st, Brzezinski, speaking to a group of reporters, said that events in the Horn could affect not only the atmosphere in which a SALT treaty would be considered but also the negotiation process itself. This was seen as an implied threat that if the Soviets did not behave we might not negotiate such an agreement. The State Department was caught off guard, and the State Department press spokesman, Hodding Carter at his regular noon briefing of the press, tried to pull the matter back within the boundaries of "atmosphere." Vance felt strongly that Brzezinski's language suggested that there was some definite linkage between the Horn and moving ahead on the SALT negotiations, a position with which he vigorously disagreed. The next day, he used the opportunity of a congressional hearing to say "There is no linkage between the SALT negotiations and the situation in Ethiopia." Finally, President Carter, at his press conference the same day, said that the Soviets' action "would make it more difficult to ratify a SALT agreement" and that "the two are linked because of actions by the Soviets. We don't initiate the linkage." These verbal acrobatics by no means settled the matter, for they were only a symptom of the deep differences that caused them in the first place.

Just after it all happened, I asked Brzezinski why the Horn was a major policy issue.

"The major point I would like to make at this stage is that the Horn is important because it gets to the heart of the question of what is the meaning of détente," he replied. "Behind the smoke of the Ogaden battle in the White House and State is the question of how do we structure the United States-Soviet situation so that it is less dangerous and doesn't present a threat to United States interests. In some ways, I suppose there are two different concepts of détente. There is the concept that the President has articulated, which is that détente ought to be comprehensive, reciprocal, and based on mutual restraint, and there is the concept that détente is a good thing and somehow leading to something more comprehensive; thus something to be nurtured in itself.

I belong clearly to the first school. In the nuclear age, we can't have stability unless détente is general and reciprocal. What we have to establish is that the rules of the game have to be the same for both sides. I think that the Horn is a basic test of that. I think if we don't establish some reciprocity and some mutual restraint and don't make it binding, especially in its military flavor, then we're going to get a reaction against détente that is going to make some things that are desirable impossible to achieve—such as SALT. I think there is a real danger that if we pursue détente in a manner that gives the Soviets the impression that they can do what they're doing in Ethiopia, then it's destructive to the relationship. Ethiopia is an expansion of what they did in Angola, except that this time they are present themselves; in Angola they only used Cubans. Each time, it becomes more costly, more dangerous. That's why in my judgment we should respond forcefully, make clear their action is not cost-free."

He continued, "Others feel that if we respond too strongly we will not be effective anyway, and a lot of the good things going on would become unravelled. Connected with all this is a sort of mini-debate on SALT. The President says we're not creating linkage but the Soviets are imposing one. I say there is no linkage, because SALT is in our mutual interest, but that the negotiations and ratification can get complicated by what's happening. Cy says there is no linkage. We all agree on that starting point. The question is what existential judgment we make. We're not saying, 'Get the hell out of Ethiopia or no SALT'—that's linkage. I'm not saying that. But there is some sort of connection, that's the point. So the debate about the Horn is really about the more fundamental question of what is the nature of détente. It's a much more sophisticated and much more complicated and much more muted debate. It's about one's view of the world: should there be rules, or is the relationship an end in itself?"

A few days later, I asked Vance about this debate.

"There are different views about the Soviet Union," he replied. "My view is that the relationship with the Soviet Union is of central importance in our foreign policy. It can't be so consuming that it results in our neglecting other critical matters that must be dealt with, yet at the same time it must be recognized as one of a handful of critical foreign-policy issues. It's my view that it is in our interest and in the interest of the Soviet Union to manage the relationship in a way that seeks to reduce tension and to find broader areas of common understanding.

I recognize that the relationship is very complex, that there is a mixture of matters where we do have differing views—sometimes ideological, sometimes practical. Having said all that, we have to come back to what we are trying to do. My view is that we should try to increase the common ground or manage the differences in a way that doesn't lead to the danger of conflict. It all has to be put in the perspective of what is more important and what is less important. That's why I come to SALT as the most important item in our relationship. It's life or death, and it's very much in our interest to find agreement and put ourselves on the way to the next SALT agreement. And it's also my view that this sets the tone for the rest of the relationship."

Brown's view about linkage, as it is described by one of his associates, is that the first thing our policymakers should ask themselves is, Whom does it help or hurt more? Brown is said to believe that a general policy of linkage is meaningless, or even bad; that we should "link" where there is a high degree of relevance between what we object to and what it is being linked with; and that we should look for areas where linkage would hurt the Soviets more than it would hurt us, or where the impact would be at least equal. Given the importance to us of achieving a SALT treaty, therefore, Brown does not believe that linking the Horn and SALT is the right thing to do.

One of the problems, it is widely agreed, is that Kissinger sold détente as more than it was. When the United States and the Soviet Union signed a joint statement of principles in 1972, the Soviet Union did not forswear competing with the United States or supporting governments and revolutionary movements. According to an argument that is made by some people in State, what the Soviets did in the Horn violated not détente but a view of détente that Kissinger sold. Brzezinski believes that in urging a strong reaction to such Soviet ventures he is in fact acting to preserve détente. "We have moved into a phase where old systems are crumbling and there is a new turbulence, and that turbulence must not be exploited," he said to me recently. "If it is, it is bound to re-create the Cold War. We want respect for diversity in the world; we want respect for local forces—for the countries concerned about their place in the world. I argue with people that I am far more for détente by arguing this, that to acquiesce in this kind of interference is to set the stage for a public reaction in the United States and a reaction by the United States that will be strong and destabilizing. So in the long run the other course will be far more destabilizing. When I say that I argue that, it's not just with State, it's also the Hill and within my own staff."

The "soft"-"tough" construction of the debate over how to deal with the Soviet Union has been a dominant force in our political life since the end of the Second World War. There are those who say that not only is it unfortunate—carrying implications of an unpleasant earlier era—but also it interferes with thought and, moreover, those who make it have it backwards. One government man who has thought about these things for a long time says, "The maintenance of some sort of useful relationship with the Soviet Union is in the security interests of the United States. Therefore, it is not 'soft' but actually the hardheaded thing to do to work at ways to maintain that relationship. The alternative is to engage in useless conflict with them on unimportant issues. What you have to decide is where the Soviets are apt to impinge on your vital interests and not let them impinge on them, and not pick a quarrel when they're not impinging on your vital interests. To pick a quarrel with them every time you can is softheaded. Also, to do that gives them the wrong impression—because they're not going to know when you really mean it." It is argued that we should limit the number of times our prestige is put at risk, and the number of unnecessary gambles we take. This man went on, "A 'proxy war' is precisely what we ought to avoid. We shouldn't set everything up as an opportunity to wage a gladitorial contest by proxy.

"Just because the Soviets get themselves involved with the Ethiopians, why should we have to find a government to act as our proxy—in any area of small importance?"

He continued, "What's wrong with looking at the world that way is that that's not the way the world is. What's happening now in Africa would be happening if there were no Soviet Union. As in Vietnam, where we intervened to bring 'stability' to that part of the world, we think of the continuing hostilities in Africa as a great-power struggle, which it need not be. The Soviets are mucking around in Africa because they want to have more influence. It's not that I think that Soviet influence is benign or their motivation is benevolent. But we shouldn't react in every instance, because not all of them make that much difference, and we could make a bad situation worse."

There is very little disagreement within the government that what the Soviets and the Cubans are doing in Africa is deplorable; the differences are over how deplorable, and what is to be done about it, and how it affects other policy questions concerning Africa. In the case of Rhodesia, the State Department and the White House agreed that the United States should try to find a negotiated political solution that would deny the Cubans and the Soviets another opportunity to exploit. And bit by bit the United States government has got itself into the position of assuming responsibility for this admittedly difficult achievement.

In one of our recent conversations, Brzezinski cited Rhodesia as an area of great danger.

"The risk is that the Soviets and the Cubans will try to put us in an even more awkward position than in Ethiopia," he said. "In Ethiopia, they were defending territorial integrity. In Rhodesia, they would be opposing white racism and apartheid. That gives added urgency to implementing the Anglo-American plan." That plan would supplant the "Salisbury agreement," reached by Rhodesian Prime Minister Ian Smith and some Rhodesian black leaders, which provides for a transition period and for elections administered essentially by Smith and his security forces. The Anglo-American plan calls for Smith to relinquish power to a British administrator, and for elections supervised by the United Nations.

In the view of some in the government, there is a danger of producing a premature polarization of forces in Southern Africa. What Africans see as a liberation movement, this argument goes, we might view as an East-West struggle and thus help to make it one. There is also the danger that in our eagerness to ally ourselves with the "forces of change," and to keep the Soviets and the Cubans out, we can end up in an indiscriminate bidding contest for the favor of whoever seems to be on the march. And, as a matter of fact, the square dance over the Horn continues. The decision our government made was that we could be of no help to the Somalis while they were in the Ogaden, and that diplomatic representations should be made to the Soviet Union about the risks (whatever they were) if the Ethiopians crossed over into Somalia. On March 8th, the Somalis announced that they were withdrawing from the Ogaden, mainly because they were being badly beaten. Since then, officials have tried to keep a line open to the Ethiopians—have even told them we would permit the shipment of "non-lethal" military equipment that they had already purchased—in order to prevent them from allying themselves too closely with the Soviet Union, and at the same time have tried to work out arrangements with the Somalis whereby we would supply them with arms if they would forswear their irredentist policy (which as yet they have not agreed to do). One of the reasons for wanting to arm the Somalis is to keep them from turning to the Soviets once more. This leaves the questions of why a Soviet-Somali marriage would be any more successful than it was the first time; how the Soviets could sustain a relationship with both Ethiopia and Somalia; and what grounds we have for assuming that the Somalis, given more arms, would behave, whatever they said. And then the Kenyans are fearful of an increasingly armed Somalia, because Somalia has historically claimed some Kenya territory, and the two countries are old enemies. And on it goes.

I talked with one of the President's domestic advisers as the first Horn crisis settled down and the rearranging of positions began. He said, "When the Russians start moving in there, the President feels we cannot fail to let them know that they can't do that without some risk to themselves. At the same time, we're keeping in touch with the Ethiopian government and seeing how they look at it. We can't be forced into letting the Cubans and Russians put us in a situation where we are backing people with untenable views. Then we can take a run at opposing outside interference from a higher ground. With bumps and starts, that's where the thing is sort of headed. It's also a damn good realpoltik way to look it at."

I asked this man if the President felt we needed to face the Soviets down somewhere.

"He doesn't feel that that's a foregone conclusion," he replied. "He recognizes it as a possibility, but he'll be damn sure that if we face someone down it will be on firmer ground than we were on in the Horn."

The strains within our government over the specific instance of the Horn did not end with the Somali retreat. As the President flew from Brazil to Nigeria in late March, Brzezinski, aboard Air Force One, gave a background briefing for the press—allowing himself to be identified only as "an Administration official"—in which he gave a new, highest-yet estimate of the number of Cuban troops in Ethiopia (sixteen to seventeen thousand), and on the same day the State Department released a more conservative estimate (at least fifteen thousand). And before the President left on his trip, there was a terrific battle between the State Department and the N.S.C. staff over the tone of the speech that the President was to make in Lagos, Nigeria. The President was leaving on a Tuesday, and on the preceding Saturday drafts were going back and forth between the two groups. Vance was trying to moderate the President's remarks warning against outside interference in the affairs of the continent. He had some success. At one point, I'm told, the N.S.C. draft had the President saying that we say to the "ideological scavengers" of the world, "Hands off Africa." The final draft of the speech was not agreed upon until the morning of the President's departure.

Since speeches are a device for establishing policy, the drafting of them frequently becomes the arena for struggles over a particular policy. It is a law of governing that he who makes the speech makes the policy; at least, he tries to. When the President makes a speech, policymakers compete to affect what he says. Inevitably, some maneuverings marked the preparation of the speech that the President gave on defense policy on March 17th at Wake Forest University. The speech was Brzezinski's idea, and it was drafted by an N.S.C. staff member. Brzezinski let it be known in the press that he was putting "bite" in it, that he had "toughened up" the speech, as part of his effort to, as he put it, "help stiffen the back of the Administration." The speech said, among other things, "Our strategic forces must be—and must be known to be—a match for the capabilities of the Soviets." It said, "We do not desire to intervene militarily in the internal domestic affairs of other countries, nor to aggravate regional conflicts. And we shall oppose intervention by others." It did talk about our desire for a mutual arms-limitation agreement, but it also said that "we must take other steps to protect the strategic balance."

To many minds, including some within the government, it had the tone of early Kennedy ("We shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe to assure the survival and the success of liberty".) Around the White House, some people later told me they realized that it was the sort of speech that might spur the military to seek increases in the defense budget. There was some worry within the Administration that the speech in fact provided argument for the opponents of SALT. One of the President's associates said, "The Russians are building advanced missilery, building forces in Europe, playing games in Africa. Their efforts are not to be disregarded. They should not proceed on the theory that we won't respond. It was important to Presidential leadership for Americans to see that their President is aware of these things. But we have to be careful not to exaggerate it, and then have to live with the apprehensions that build up. That speech did not do so, I think, but some people might want to run with it for that purpose."

When I asked Brzezinski about the speech, he volunteered that it was reviewed twice, by both Vance and Brown. Vance did see an early version of the speech and had a brief opportunity to go over the final draft. (The State Department did suggest a number of changes. It wanted the language about Soviet intervention in local conflicts toned down, and it was, but not to the degree that State sought. And Vance suggested that language about parity in weapons be changed to "essential equivalence." In the speech, this became "functional equivalence." Brzezinski says that "functional equivalence" is a new phrase and a new concept. He says, "I thought 'essential equivalence' didn't convey the point. The term 'functional equivalence' means that our weapons need not be identical or similar.") Brzezinski says he suggested early this year that the President give a defense speech, because he had given speeches outlining his other foreign-policy views and "what was missing was a speech about his role as Commander-in-Chief," adding, "It wasn't so tied to our recent problems with the Soviet, but in some way the timing was felicitous."

Others explained to me that the speech was also designed to counter an impression that might have been caused by various actions the President had taken: the cancellation of the B–1 bomber (there is some consternation in the N.S.C. that people failed to notice that at the same time he cancelled it he approved the deployment of the Cruise missile); the postponement of development of a mobile missile (MX); the pursuit of a strategic-arms-limitation agreement and also negotiations for a Comprehensive Test Ban and for the demilitarization of the Indian Ocean; the discussions of anti-satellite arms control.

One N.S.C. person said to me recently, "The people at the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency understood the number of initiatives to mean that this would be the heyday of arms control. The speech was to correct that impression." Brzezinski apparently persuaded the President that because of the kinds of questions the President had dealt with he was in danger of being seen at home and abroad as too easygoing about questions of national security.

I asked Brzezinski not long ago how great he felt the danger was that we might appear to be weak.

He replied, "My own view is that we probably do not appear weak to those who have to think about it seriously. But we might appear ambivalent. We haven't sent unambiguous signals that we're weak, but we may have sent signals that there is a disjunction between our will and our power. However, if we wish to continue to send Pollyanna-ish signals, then they might conclude that we're weak."

"We've sent a number of signals—the B–1, negotiating on the Indian Ocean, not embarking on a defense buildup. If that continued, it could be misunderstood. The speech helps."

In the spring of 1977, in fact, Hamilton Jordan identified a list of actions taken by the Administration, including some of those mentioned by Brzezinski and also the negotiation of the Panama Canal treaties and the proposal to withdraw troops from Korea, that could make the President appear too "dovish" and cause him domestic political problems. The defense speech is said to have been well received by Jordan and some other domestic political advisers.

I asked Brzezinski about the statement "We shall oppose intervention by others" in the Wake Forest speech.

He replied, "That's a reaffirmation of something that has been taken for granted and perhaps has been assumed as no longer relevant."

"That at some point we may have to take strong action to oppose intervention?" I asked.

"Yes," he replied. "We could take strong action ourselves, including intervene, unless we can do it indirectly, by giving the countries concerned the means to deal with this intrusion."

I asked him about a statement in the speech that the United States was "improving and will maintain quickly deployable forces—air, land, and sea—to defend our interests throughout the world."

"That is a contribution we have made from here," Brzezinski replied. "More than a year ago, we were stressing the need for greater independence from the need for foreign bases, and the need for rapid deployment, so that we should not be dependent on a Maginot Line—the need to have forces that could be rapidly deployed to the Mideast, Africa, Asia. The President accepted this concept formally—that we should develop this capacity—and Harold Brown has been developing it for a year. The troops withdrawn from Korea will be restructured and retrained to be used with other divisions." In Brzezinski's mind, this is connected with his theory about overlapping imperial power and "Fashodas" and his concern about our being preempted.

I asked Brzezinski then about something I'd read that he had said in an interview. He had said that the proposition that a nuclear war would mean the end of humanity was "baloney."

He replied, "It's inaccurate thinking to say that the use of nuclear weapons would be the end of the human race. That's an egocentric thought. Of course, it's horrendous to contemplate, but, in strictly statistical terms, if the United States used up all of its arsenal in the Soviet Union and the Soviet Union used all of its against the United States it would not be the end of humanity. That's egocentric. There are other people on the earth. I don't know if it's a good thing or a bad thing to say that this notion is wrong, but I know it is wrong factually."

A number of people within the Administration worry about the way foreign policy is made, and they are also concerned that an impression is being given to the nation and the world that the policy is not guided by steady hands. Some fluctuation is inevitable as policymakers respond to actions taken by other nations, but even within the Administration many people believe that the conduct of our foreign policy has been marked by a lack of equilibrium. Some of this is laid to early enthusiasms: plunging into policies that had not been thought through. Among the examples given of this are human rights, limitations on arms sales (of which it is now said that the early goals were "unrealistic"), and the first SALT proposals. In the case of SALT, the President, before his negotiators went to Moscow in March of 1977, announced at a press conference that we would offer a dramatic proposal for "substantial reductions" in the arsenals of both sides; he added that, as a "fallback," we would propose an agreement along the lines of that arrived at in Vladivostok in 1974, which set outer limits on both sides—limits that required neither side to make cuts. But the attention was on the more dramatic of the two proposals—the one for "substantial reductions"—which in fact, when it got to the details of which weapons were to be cut, asked that the Soviets make substantially more drastic cuts than the United States. Then, after holding fast to that proposal for a few weeks, the Administration changed course and went for something along the lines of the "fallback" position. Several people—inside the Administration and out—believe that the Administration set itself up for appearing to "back down" from a bold position, and that when it is time to seek Senate approval of a new SALT agreement the Administration is going to pay for having invested so much public capital and prestige in the proposal for substantial reductions. Carter believes in deep cuts in the weapons held by both sides; Brzezinski was apparently attracted by the political aspects of the proposal—both as a challenge to the Soviet Union and as a proposal that would win the approval of arms-control conservatives, which it did. The problem is that they did not think through the implications of announcing the proposal and then having it turned down and then retreating to the "fallback" position.

In the internal debating over both the nature and the timing of the SALT negotiations, Brzezinski was characterized by a number of people as being less inclined than Vance to try to reach an agreement by this spring or summer. The State Department view was that the negotiations should proceed to their conclusion, because of the precarious state of health of Leonid Brezhnev, the leader of the Soviet Union; because the Soviets were developing a new generation of weapons systems that a SALT agreement might keep them from deploying; and because there were any number of other reasons that postponement could result in the loss of an opportunity. Brzezinski was reported by several people to be unwilling to give the same emphasis to SALT, and Brown was said to be somewhere between Vance and Brzezinski. Brzezinski has been described by people who observed the process closely as seeing SALT not just as an end in itself but as a device for bringing pressure on the Soviets to do things we wanted them to. Brown's view was that if we could get a good SALT agreement it would be beneficial for us, because it could keep the arms race from proceeding and could free up funds that would otherwise have to be spent on strategic weapons. One of the considerations of the White House, of course, was that, given the length of time it was taking to complete Senate action on the Panama Canal treaties, and given other constraints on the agenda of Congress this year, an election year, this was no year to ask the Senate to approve a SALT treaty. But at a White House meeting on March 2nd the President gave officials firm instructions to proceed to try to reach an agreement. (As it happens, Brzezinski made his "linkage" statement on the previous day.) The timing of the Senate debate on approval would be decided later, and Vance would go to Moscow to push the agreement toward conclusion. Then the internal argument became one over the instructions he would take with him. All this time, there was consternation within the government over the reluctance at the White House to come to grips with difficult decisions—decisions with both political and strategic implications—about our final positions. Shortly before Vance's trip to Moscow, the Times reported, "In recent days, some White House officials have been privately complaining to some journalists about the ability of Mr. Vance and some of his aides to deal with the Russians." The story went on to say that the "officials'" main concern is that Vance and his aides "are overly concerned about achieving a strategic-arms accord and are not prepared to press the Russians hard enough about their military involvement in the Horn of Africa and about other new Soviet moves."

Uncertainty seemed to guide the decision-making about whether to proceed with the production of the neutron warhead, and the President seemed to come out in the worst of all possible positions. This was his own doing. First, he agreed to go ahead with its production, and then, against the advice of the Defense and State Departments and the N.S.C., he decided this spring to halt its production, and then, when that decision came under attack within the Administration and in Congress and from some of our NATO allies (whose support for the warhead the Administration had been seeking), he announced that its production would be delayed and that the weapon would be a "bargaining chip" in the negotiations with the Soviet Union. Besides giving a public picture of uncertainty, the episode worked the President into a corner: if the Soviets chose not to trade, he would have to proceed with the production of a weapon that the world now knew he had earlier decided against, or he would have to appear to "back down."

A man in one of the departments, speaking about the fairly widespread worry in the government that foreign-policy decisions are made in an ad hoc, sporadic way, said to me recently, "There is a tendency over at the White House to fly into things and take spot initiatives without thinking things through." He continued, "You should understand how you got into the situation." Some in the Administration express concern that decisions are made without much thought being given to the connections between a certain move and larger foreign-policy goals. Even those who concede that it is difficult to formulate consistent policy in a complicated world, where a number of powers can change the terms, say that there has been excessive confusion. One man who is in a high position in the government, and who has had prior government experience, says, "It's hard for people in the bureaucracy to carry out policy if they don't know what it is." High officials of both the Defense Department and the State Department say that they are often surprised by pronouncements that come either from Brzezinski or from the President. In order to govern, the President and his top associates need a certain degree of understanding and support of their policies by the bureaucracy. But the problem goes beyond even that. A number of those I have spoken with in the government talk of the need not just for the bureaucracy but also for the American people and other peoples of the world to have a clearer view of our goals.

One man who understands a great deal about government says, "You don't get a policy through a speech, or even through the first actions following that speech, but from consistent-minded people taking a series of consistent actions." The failure to establish clear policies is attributed not just to the style of Brzezinski but also to that of the President. One official said to me, after expressing his worry about the apparent "thrashing around" in foreign policy, "Carter and Brzezinski have a similarity in outlook and temperament. Instead of being able to hold conflicting thoughts in their heads about a given subject and come out with a blend, they hold all those conflicting thoughts, but what comes out is not a blend but a leaning this way and leaning that way. That explains the shifts in policy." One man who is quite close to the foreign-policy decision-making said to me, "I still can't read the President on foreign policy."

Several people, inside the Administration and out, express concern that the Administration speaks with too many voices on foreign policy, that often it seems that there are two Secretaries of State. They are quite troubled when, on the eve of the Secretary of State's trip to Moscow to negotiate an arms-control agreement, "White House officials" publicly suggest that he is not up to dealing with the Russians. They are given pause by the picture of a national-security adviser who goes about letting it be known that he is putting "bite" in and "toughening" the Administration's policy. Of course, advertising oneself as the one who is "tough" on the Communists can be a way of establishing political security. (Brzezinski also tries to deflect criticism of the way he is handling his job by suggesting that it comes from "ideological" motives.) There are other "hardline" voices within the Administration. And, in any event, the old "hardline"/"soft-line" dichotomy is misleading. The real issue, as it has been described to me over and over again, is between two kinds of "toughness": combative toughness as against measured toughness, and the latter is not to be confused with uncritical acceptance of Soviet moves. It is not a question of Brzezinski's views; it is a question of his temperament and of his judgment. One longtime observer of foreign policy says, "We need officials who are firm and wary in dealing with the Soviet Union; the last thing we need is an official who is impulsive and excitable in dealing with them." Brzezinski is not the first national security adviser to step into a public policymaking role.

There will always be divisions among a President's advisers, and some will become public, but when it comes to questions of foreign policy the implications can be quite serious. Others, who do not wish us well, are taking our measure. Several observers have reservations about the way the role of the national-security adviser has developed. The role has been shaped as much by the way Presidents have conceived it as it has by the men who have filled it. Many of those who are concerned about the nature of the job say that whoever holds it should be an "honest broker"—someone who communicates the views of the departments to the President and presents alternatives to him—and also that he should not be a separate public spokesman on foreign policy. A President does need someone to help mediate among the conflicting interests of the State and Defense Departments, each of which has its own clients (countries, military services); to see to it that the President's interests are represented in policy considerations; and to offer the President independent judgment. These people argue that the person who holds that job should not be an intellectual neuter, a clerk, but neither should he have strong views—irrespective of what they are—which he presses upon the President and which predispose him to give a certain response to most situations. A President, it is argued, does not have the time to sort out all the factors that may be feeding what his key adviser is telling him. This is one of those areas in which it is impossible to draw a line but it is possible to know when one has been crossed.

Even some of the President's advisers feel that the Administration is trying to do too much in foreign policy, that it is being drawn into the very chaos that Brzezinski describes and says it is our role to prevent. They are disturbed by what they see as impatience, an inability to let some things just happen. People who are inclined to react suddenly and strongly can lead their governments into situations that those governments need not get into. History tells us that nations can cause themselves to be drawn into confrontations that they did not seek or that were not necessary. Some people in the Administration wonder, on the basis of the record so far, how well equipped this Administration will be to handle a fast breaking foreign-policy crisis. They are aware that we haven't had to face a real crisis yet.●

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. RISENHOOVER (at the request of Mr. WRIGHT), after 3:30 p.m. today, on account of official business.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. GRASSLEY) and to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous matter:)

Mr. KEMP, for 15 minutes, today.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. GREEN, for 5 minutes, today.

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. BALDUS) to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material:)

Mr. ANNUNZIO, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. GONZALEZ, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. BINGHAM, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. PEPPER, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. STOKES, for 5 minutes, today.

Mrs. MEYNER, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. GIAIMO, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. WEISS, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. BRADEMAS, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. FASCELL, for 5 minutes, today.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to revise and extend remarks was granted to:

Mr. FINDLEY, and to include extraneous matter notwithstanding the fact that it exceeds two pages of the RECORD and is estimated by the Public Printer to cost $903.38.

Mr. CONYERS, to extend his remarks in the body of the RECORD, notwithstanding the fact that it exceeds two pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and is estimated by the Public Printer to cost $3,613.50.

Mr. GILMAN, to revise and extend his remarks during debate on H.R. 12973.

SENATE ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 785. An act to declare that all right, title, and interest of the United States in 2,700 acres, more or less, are hereby held in trust for the Paiute and Shoshone Tribes of the Fallon Indian Reservation and Colony, Fallon, Nev., to promote the economic self-sufficiency of the Paiute and Shoshone Tribes, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 1420. An act for the relief of Umberto Ruffolo;

H.R. 10569. An act to amend the Alcohol and Drug Abuse Education Act to extend the authorization and appropriations for carrying out the provisions of such act, and for other purposes; and

H.J. Res. 1024. Joint resolution making urgent supplemental appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service, and for other purposes for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978.

SENATE BILLS AND CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED

Bills and a concurrent resolution of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 1484. An act for the relief of Michael Bruce Holland; to the Committee on the Judiciary;

S. 1951. An act for the relief of Jozef Swiderski; to the Committee on the Judiciary;

S. 2248. An act for the relief of Susanna Shu-hui Jean; to the Committee on the Judiciary;

S. 2294. An act for the relief of Joselyn Buccat Lalley and Jodelyn Buccat Lalley; to the Committee on the Judiciary;

S. 2534. An act to revise and extend the provisions of title XIII of the Public Health Service Act relating to health maintenance organizations; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; and

S. 3069. An act to provide that members of the Sisseton-Wahpeton Sioux Tribe may request the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain lands, and to provide that the tribe shall have a preference right to purchase certain lands held in trust by the United States for tribal members; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

S. Con. Res. 32. Concurrent resolution relating to broadening the observance of Thanksgiving to an occasion of sharing our plenty with the hungry of other lands, to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BALDUS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p.m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, July 26, 1978, at 10 o'clock a.m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

4633. A letter from the Chairman, Council of the District of Columbia, transmitting a copy of Council Act No. 2-229, "To amend the Standards of Assistance of the District of Columbia relating to payments to persons residing in community residence facilities," pursuant to section 602(c) of Public Law 93-198; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

4634. A letter from the Chairman, Council of the District of Columbia, transmitting a copy of Council Act No. 2-230, "To establish the District of Columbia Commission for Women," pursuant to section 602(c) of Public Law 93-198; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

4635. A letter from the Chairman, Council of the District of Columbia, transmitting a copy of Council Act No. 2-231, "To amend the Condominium Act of 1976 relating to the advertisement of condominiums," pursuant to section 602(c) of Public Law 93-198; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

4636. A letter from the Secretary of Treasury, transmitting the annual report and audit of the Student Loan Marketing Association for calendar year 1977, pursuant to section 439(k) of the Higher Education Act of 1965, as amended (90 Stat. 2140); to the Committee on Education and Labor.

4637. A letter from the U.S. Commissioner of Education, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, transmitting notice of an interpretation of regulations governing the use of Emergency School Aid Act funds for court-ordered activities, pursuant to section 431(d) of the General Education Provisions Act, as amended; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

4638. A letter from the Executive Secretary to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, transmitting proposed final regulations governing awards made under title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to promote desegregation of public education, pursuant to section 431(d) of the General Education Provisions Act, as amended; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 3350

By Mr. KREBS:

(Amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute of Mr. MURPHY of New York.)

(2) DURATION OF LICENSES AND PERMITS.—(A) Duration of a license. Each license shall be issued for a period of ten years. If the licensee has substantially complied with the license and the work plan associated therewith and has requested extensions of the license, the Secretary shall extend the license on terms, conditions, and restrictions consistent with the Act and the regulations promulgated pursuant thereto for periods of five years each.

(B) Duration of a permit. Each permit shall be issued for a term of twenty years and for so long thereafter as hard mineral resources are recovered annually in commercial quantities from the area to which the work plan associated with the permit applies. The permit of any permittee who is not recovering the hard mineral resources in commercial quantities at the end of ten years shall be terminated; Provided, That the Secretary shall extend such time period for good cause shown, including force majeure, adverse economic conditions, unavoidable delays in construction, major unanticipated vessel repairs that prevent the permittee from conducting commercial recovery activities during an annual period, or other circumstances beyond the control of the permittee.

(10) CONSERVATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES.—For the purpose of conservation of natural resources, each license and permit shall contain, as needed, terms, conditions, and restrictions which have due regard for the prevention of waste and the future opportunity to commercially recover the unrecovered balance of the hard mineral resources. In establishing these terms, conditions, and restrictions, the Secretary shall consider the state of the technology, the environmental effects of the exploration or commercial recovery activities, economic and resource data, and the national need for hard mineral resources. As used in this Act, the term "conservation of natural resources" is not intended to grant, imply, or create any inference of production controls or price regulation, in particular those which would affect the volume of production, prices, profits, markets, or the decision by which minerals or metals are to be recovered, except as such effects may be incidental to actions taken pursuant to this section.

(Amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute of Mr. MURPHY of New York.)

By Mr. VENTO:

SEC. 109. PUBLIC NOTICE AND HEARINGS, CITIZEN CIVIL ACTIONS AND JUDICIAL REVIEW.

(a) PUBLIC NOTICE AND HEARINGS.—(1) The Secretary may promulgate rules and regulations; establish and modify the terms, conditions, and restrictions of licenses and permits; issue, transfer, and renew licenses and permits; and deny, suspend, and revoke licenses and permits only after public notice and public hearings in accordance with this subsection. Any interested person may present relevant material at any hearing.

(2) If the Secretary determines that there exists one or more specific and material factual issues which may be resolved by a formal evidentiary hearing, at least one adjudicatory hearing shall be held in the District of Columbia in accordance with the provisions of section 554 of title 5 of the United States Code. The record developed in any such adjudicatory hearing shall be part of the basis for the Secretary's decision to take any action referred to in paragraph (1). Hearings held pursuant to this subsection shall be consolidated insofar as practicable with hearings held by other agencies. The Secretary shall by regulations prescribe the time period for holding public hearings.

(b) CITIZEN CIVIL ACTIONS.—(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), any person may commence a civil action for equitable relief on his own behalf, whenever such action constitutes a case or controversy, against any person, including the United States, and any other governmental instrumentality or agency (to the extent permitted by the eleventh amendment to the Constitution), who is alleged to be in violation of any provision of this Act, any regulation promulgated under this Act, or any term, condition, or restriction of a license or permit issued under this Act. In suits brought under this subsection, the district courts shall have jurisdiction without regard to the amount in controversy or the citizenship of the parties, to enforce any provision of this Act or to order the Secretary to perform such act or duty, as the case may be.

(2) No civil action may be commenced under paragraph (1)—

(A) prior to 60 days after the plaintiff has given notice of the alleged violation to the Secretary and any other appropriate Federal official and to any alleged violator; and

(B) If the Secretary or his authorized representative, any other appropriate Federal official, or the Attorney General has commenced and is diligently prosecuting a civil or criminal action in a court of the United States, but in any such action any person having a legal interest which is or may be adversely affected or aggrieved may intervene as a matter of right.

Notice under this subsection shall be given in such a manner as the Secretary shall prescribe by regulation.

(3) In any action under this subsection, the Secretary or the Attorney General, if not a party, may intervene as a matter of right.

(4) Any district court, in issuing any final order in any action brought under paragraph (1), may award costs of litigation, including reasonable attorney's and expert witness fees, to any party whenever the court determines that such an award is approprtiae.

(5) Nothing in this subsection shall restrict any right which any person or persons or class may have under any statute or common law to seek enforcement of any provision of this Act, any regulation issued thereunder, or any term, condition, or restriction of any license or permit; or to seek any other relief.

(c) JUDICIAL REVIEW.—Any person suffering legal wrong, or who is or may be adversely affected, by the Secretary's decision to issue, deny, transfer, modify, renew, suspend, or revoke a license or permit may, not later than 60 days after any such decision is made, seek judicial review of such decision in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Any person shall be deemed to be aggrieved by the Secretary's decision within the meaning of this subsection if the person—

(1) participated in the administrative proceedings before the Secretary, or did not participate but can show that the failure to do so was caused by the Secretary's failure to provide the required notice; and

(2) is adversely affected by the Secretary's action.

H.R. 7308

By Mr. DRINAN:

Page 40, after line 8, insert the following new subparagraph:

(B) As part of such minimization procedures—

(i) Government shall use means, whenever practicable, to access the wire communications system at a single subscriber terminal circuit point identified in the authorization and in a place wherein the authorized agent and his circuits, interception equipment, electronic, mechanical, or other devices have and will have exposure and general access to the least number of other circuits, wire communications, or messages not specified in the authorization for interception;

(ii) the Government shall not use interception techniques wherein random or systematic scanning among wire communications circuits or channels is employed in order to discover, identify, acquire or otherwise intercept possible foreign intelligence information among other private messages or wire communications; and

(iii) the Government shall neither intercept wire communications nor maintain access to the subject wire communication circuit during periods of time when there is no reasonable expectation of the interception of the foreign intelligence information described in the authorization.

Page 50, strike out lines 1 and 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(A) that the minimization procedures be followed and that such procedures include provisions to ensure that—

(i) the Government uses means, whenever practicable, to access the wire communications system at a single subscriber terminal circuit point identified in the order and in a place wherein the authorized agent and his circuits, interception equipment, electronic, mechanical, or other devices have and will have exposure and general access to the least number of other circuits, wire communications, or messages not specified in the order for interception;

(ii) the Government does not use interception techniques wherein random or systematic scanning among wire communications circuits or channels is employed in order to discover, identify, acquire or otherwise intercept possible foreign intelligence information among other private messages or wire communications; and

(iii) the Government neither intercepts wire communications nor maintains access to the subject wire communication circuit during periods of time when there is no reasonable expectation of the interception of the foreign intelligence information described in the order;

—Page 40, strike out lines 9 through 23 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(3)(A) The Attorney General may not require any communication common carrier to provide the Government with any information, facilities, or technical assistance with respect to any electronic surveillance authorized under this subsection.

(B) Any communication common carrier voluntarily providing any such information, facilities, or technical assistance—

(i) shall maintain any records concerning the surveillance or any such assistance which such common carrier wishes to retain under security procedures approved by the Attorney General and the Director of Central Intelligence; and

(ii) shall be compensated for providing such information, facilities, or technical assistance by the Government at the prevailing rate.

Page 50, strike out lines 3 through 21 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(B) that any communication common carrier, supplier of communications facilities or devices, landlord, custodian, or other person voluntarily providing to the Government any information, facilities, technical assistance, or access to premises with respect to the electronic surveillance shall maintain any records concerning the surveillance or any such assistance which such person wishes to retain under security procedures approved by the Attorney General and the Director of Central Intelligence; and

(C) that any such communication common carrier, supplier of communications facilities or devices, landlord, custodian, or other person voluntarily providing to the Government any information, facilities, technical assistance, or access to premises with respect to the electronic surveillance shall be compensated therefore by the Government at the prevailing rate.

(h) An order under this section authorizing electronic surveillance may not require any communication common carrier, supplier of communications facilities or devices, landlord, custodian, or other person to provide the Government with any information, facilities, technical assistance, or access to premises to accomplish the authorized surveillance.

—Page 40, after line 23, insert the following new paragraph:

(4) If in the course of a surveillance authorized by this subsection any conversation of any individual not a target of such surveillancce is overheard or recorded and if such conversation is not relevant to the investigation, the Attorney General shall notify such individual that such conservation has been so overheard or recorded and shall, upon the request of such individual, furnish such individual with a transcript of such conversation.

Page 50, after line 2, insert the following new subparagraph (and redesignate succeeding subparagraphs accordingly):

(B) that if, in the course of the surveillance, any conversation of any individual not a target of such surveillance is overheard or recorded and if such conversation is not relevant to the investigation, the Attorney General shall notify such individual that such conversation has been so overheard or recorded and shall, upon the request of such individual, furnish such individual with a transcript of such conversation;

By Mr. SMITH of Iowa:

—Page 19 between lines 12 and 13, insert the following: Section 8 of the Commodity Exchange Act is amended by inserting after subsection c the following:

"SEC. 8d. The Commission shall revoke the registration of any futures commission merchant, associate of any futures commission merchant, commodity pool operator or floor broker—

"(1) who accepts or places either directly or indirectly any order of the purchase or sale of any commodity for future delivery on any contract market from any person who has been found in violation of the provisions of section 19; or

"(2) who, himself, is a person who has been found in violation of the provisions of section 19.

Any such person whose registration is revoked in accordance with this section shall not be eligible to reapply for registration until twelve months after the date of revocation.".

The Commodity Exchange Act is amended by adding the following new Section:

"SEC. 19. Any person who sells any commodity (as defined in section 2 of this Act) for export shall, within forty-eight hours after such sale, inform the Commission of (1) the date of such sale, (2) the name and full identity of the commodity sold, (3) the quantity of the commodity sold, (4) the name of the buyer and the country or countries to which the commodity is to be shipped, (5) the sale price, and (6) such other information as the Commission may by regulation require. The Commission shall by regulation prescribe the manner in which the above information shall be transmitted. On the first working day following its receipt, such information shall be made available by public announcement and shall remain available for public inspection for a reasonable time thereafter. The Commission shall prescribe regulations to assure that such information shall be disclosed simultaneously to the public and to protect against any person or firm gaining from premature disclosure.".

H.R. 11711

By Mr. CLEVELAND:

—Page 11, after line 19, insert the following:

SEC. 107. REIMBURSEMENT OF STATES FOR UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE PAYMENTS.

(a) Section 232 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2292) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g)(1) If unemployment insurance is paid under a State law to an adversely affected worker for a week for which—

"(A) he receives a trade adjustment allowance, or

"(B) he makes application for a trade readjustment allowance and would be entitled (determined without regard to subsection (c) or (e)) to receive such allowance, the State agency making such payment shall, unless it has been reimbursed for such payment under Federal law, be reimbursed from funds appropriated pursuant to section 245 (b)(1), to the extent such payment does not exceed the amount of the trade readjustment allowance which such worker would have received, or would have been entitled to receive, as the case may be, if he had not received the State payment. The amount of such reimbursement shall be determined by the Secretary on the basis of reports furnished to him by the State agency.

"(2) In any case in which a State agency is reimbursed under paragraph (1) for payments of unemployment issuance made to an adversely affected worker, such payments, and the period of unemployment of such worker for which such payments were made, may be disregarded under the State law (and for purposes of applying section 3303 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954) in determining whether or not an employer is entitled to a reduced rate of contributions permitted by the State law.".

(b) Section 241(a) of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2313(a)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Sums reimbursable to a State pursuant to section 232(g) shall be credited to the account of such State in the Unemployment Trust Fund and shall be used only for the payment of cash benefits to individuals with respect to their unemployment, exclusive of expenses of administration.".

(c) Paragraph (3) of section 3302(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits against Federal unemployment tax) is repealed.

Redesignate sections 107 through 112 as sections 108 through 113, respectively.

H.R. 12514

By Mr. STARK:

—Page 19, immediately after line 14, insert the following new section 21 and redesignate existing section 21 as section 22:

ARMS SALES TO IRAN

SEC. 21. (a) No defense articles sold or licensed for export to the Government of Iran

under the Arms Export Control Act after the date of enactment of this Act may be used in the performance of any domestic surveillance or police or other law enforcement function or in any activity carried out for internal security purposes which involves the violation of internationally recognized human rights or the suppression of political expression.

(b) Whenever a sales agreement is entered into or an export license is issued under the Arms Export Control Act involving the sale to the Government of Iran of any defense articles which could be used for internal security purposes, the President shall submit a report to the Congress which describes—

(1) the defense articles to be sold or licensed, including the quantity and value of such articles;

(2) the intended recipient and the intended users of the defense articles; and

(3) the assurances provided by the Government of Iran that the defense articles will not be used for domestic surveillance or police or other law enforcement purposes, will not be used to violate internationally recognized human rights, and will not be used to suppress political expression.

(c) The President shall promptly report to the Congress any information obtained by the executive branch which indicates that the Government of Iran may have used defense articles sold or licensed under the Arms Export Control Act contrary to the assurances described in the report submitted pursuant to subsection (b) with respect to those articles.

TERMINATION OF DELIVERIES OF DEFENSE ARTICLES TO CHILE

SEC. 22. Section 406(a)(2) of the International Security Assistance and Arms Export Control Act of 1976 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "After the date of enactment of the International Security Assistance Act of 1978, no deliveries of defense articles or services may be made to Chile pursuant to any sale made before the date of enactment of this section.".

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

TRUE FEDERAL PAYROLL EXCEEDS 6 MILLION

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, the true number of employees on the Federal payroll is staggering. An estimated 6 to 7 million people are being paid with taxpayers' dollars.

Approximately 2.8 million persons are on the official civilian payroll. Another 3 to 4 million more are paid indirectly through government contracts, research grants and matching payments.

Taken together, this means between 6 and 7 million people depend on the U.S. Government for their paychecks. Note that these figures include only those who are being paid for services to the government. They do not include those receiving social security, pensions or welfare.

One area particularly striking is that of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. HEW has 144,256 regular employees. In addition, however, the department is paying salaries of another 980,217 people who work at such things as "private think tanks," universities and State and local government agencies. This brings the overall HEW total to more than a million.

As I have said again and again on the House floor, it is time to cut big government down to size. The taxpayers of our Nation should not have to carry such a heavy load. We need less Federal spending and fewer governmental bureaucrats.

Following is an article from the July 18 Washington Post which discusses the true U.S. payroll.

U.S. PAYROLL EXCEEDS 6 MILLION

(By Spencer Rich)

The federal government, which has 2.8 million persons on its official civilian payroll, actually pays the salaries of at least 3 million to 4 million more, according to data gathered by The Washington Post.

The additional workers' salaries are paid indirectly through government contracts, research grants and matching payments for the wages of local government officials.

The federal government has only the vaguest idea of exactly how many such workers there are but, taken together, the figures mean that 6 million or 7 million workers are directly dependent on Uncle Sam for their paychecks.

These figures do not include the approximately 50 million people being supported by federal welfare, Social Security, pensions or public service job programs. They include only those performing some service for which the government is footing the bill.

The extent of these outside programs was underlined recently when Health, Education and Welfare Secretary Joseph A. Califano, Jr., reported to the Senate Appropriations Committee that in addition to the 144,256 regular HEW employees the department is paying the salaries of 980,217 people who work for private "think tanks," universities, state and local government agencies and the like.

"Paid for out of federal funds?" asked an incredulous Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton (D-Mo.)

"That is the point," answered Califano.

Committee Chairman Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), staring at Califano in astonishment, declared, "This is the best public service job program I have ever heard of."

Sen. Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.), adding the 144,256 direct HEW employees to the 980,217 figure cited by Califano, shot out, "My God, we are over 1 million."

Experts said later that these 980,217 HEW-funded "outside-the-walls" jobs average "somewhere between $10,000 to $20,000 each" in annual salary.

The Defense Department, which has 1 million civilians (and 2,049,000 military personnel) directly on its payroll, estimated that an added 2,050,000 people "outside the walls" receive salaries funded by DOD through research and service contracts and DOD procurement and construction activities.

Most other federal agencies didn't have similar precise figures worked out, but conceded that research contracts and grants help finance the salaries of hundreds of thousands of persons not directly employed by the departments.

A source at the Department of Housing and Urban Development took a "top of the head" guess that the figure for HUD would be at least 100,000. The Department of Energy said that 104,000 persons employed by outside contractors run government laboratories such as Argonne and Oak Ridge, and that "a whole bunch more" people are employed by contractors performing other services or research for DOE but that the exact number isn't known.

The Labor Department said it funds the salaries of 135,000 persons employed in administrative and related jobs by state and local government agencies—about three-quarters of them work in state employment services for which the United States pays 100 percent of costs.

These figures illustrate how the federal government, without appearing to be enlarging its labor force, is actually swelling the rolls of those dependent on it for jobs and is obtaining extra services without officially adding to its payrolls.

"They are shipping the money out through the state and local government and private research firms and having the work done there," a Senate Appropriations aide said.

A breakdown provided by Califano of the 980,217 figure illustrates how this is done.

His figures show that 87,777 persons in universities and 32,383 in nonprofit research institutions, plus 113,919 at private businesses had their entire salaries financed by HEW research grants, research contracts and service contracts.

The biggest share of these were medical researchers to whom the National Institutes of Health pumped out $1.4 billion in research contracts and grants in fiscal 1977.

But this group also included employees of "think tanks" like the Urban Institute and the Rand Corp., which received federal grants or contracts to perform social sciences research. These two organizations and dozens of others get the vast bulk of their income from HEW, HUD and other federal research contracts, and they employe thousands of persons.

This is also the case with the Medicare program, in which the federal government pays Blue Cross/Blue Shield and other nonfederal health groups to help run the program. HEW said that 26,537 persons in Blue Cross/Blue Shield and similar groups acting as Medicare "intermediaries" were paid with money from HEW.

A huge bloc of state and local government officials and private individuals under state and local contracts have their salaries funded by HEW through grants specifically designated to cover such salaries. For example, the United States helps the states pay for personnel to administer the local welfare and Medicare programs. Califano said HEW payments for this purpose cover the salaries of about 160,000 persons on state and local payrolls on a full-year basis.

Moreover, Califano reported, it gave states and local governments and other entities the money to pay the salaries of about 350,000 teachers and educational administrators and well over 100,000 social workers and other personnel in childcare, child welfare and related children's services.

In all these cases, HEW doesn't pay the salary directly. It simply gives the money to various research organizations and to state and local agencies and they in turn pay salaries for the services HEW wants financed. Technically, these people aren't HEW employees, but in reality HEW is buying their services.

The swelling tide of federal money helps explain the apparent slow growth of federal employment and the skyrocketing growth of state and local government payrolls.

Federal civilian payrolls rose from 2.1 million in 1950 to only 2.8 million persons in 1978—a jump of about a third. But state- and local-government payrolls, fueled by federal money, tripled to over 12 million persons in the same period.●

A TRIBUTE TO GENERAL PULASKI

HON. JOHN G. FARY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. FARY. Mr. Speaker, the United States is properly called "A Nation of Nations." From its beginnings, people came to our shores from all parts of the globe. During the Revolution which we were engaged in at this time 201 years ago, men from many nations came to participate in our war. Among these countless individuals are a number of outstanding names. France gave us the Marquis de Lafayette and Admiral d'Estaing. Scotland gave us John Paul Jones, Ireland gave us John Barry, Poland gave us Thadeusz Kosciuszko and Count Casimir Pulaski.

Two hundred and one years ago Count Pulaski, age 30, debarked from a ship at Marblehead, Mass., to make his contribution to our revolution.

Before coming to our shores, Count Pulaski since he was 20 had already made a name for himself as a revolutionary in his Polish homeland. In 1769, in protest against the growing foreign domination of Poland, he joined his father and brothers in an uprising against King Stanislav II. When he failed to kidnap the king, he was declared an outlaw in his homeland and eventually went to France where he was penniless and unemployed.

In Paris his fame as a revolutionary soon secured for him an introduction to the American representatives—Benjamin Franklin and Silas Deane. He offered his services to the American insurgents.

Around that time he wrote:

I would rather live free, or die for liberty. I suffer more because I cannot avenge myself against the tyranny of those who seek to oppress humanity. This is why I want to go to America.

On May 29, 1777, Franklin wrote a letter from Paris to General Washington introducing Count Casimir Pulaski. On June 5, Deane advanced him the necessary funds for his voyage to America.

A month after he arrived in Massachusetts, he met with General Washington, who accepted Pulaski's services in the American Revolution. Washington wrote to the Continental Congress suggesting that Pulaski be given the command of all the cavalry.

The Continental Congress commissioned him with the rank of brigadier general. Later they made him chief of the cavalry.

In Washington's army he served in the battles of Brandywine and Germantown. In 1778 he formed the Independent Corps of Light Cavalry and Infantry—known in history as Pulaski's Legion—at the head of which he tried to exploit his experiences in guerrilla warfare.

After complaining personally to the Congress that he blushed to find himself "languishing in a state of inactivity," he was sent to protect American vessels operating against British shipping at Egg Harbor, N.J. There, on October 15, 1778, through information given by a deserter, the British surprised and cut up Pulaski's Legion.

After this defeat, he gradually became restless and disappointed at the way the Revolution was going. He even expressed the wish of returning to his native Poland. He complained again on November 26 to the Continental Congress that there was "nothing but bears to fight."

After 3 months he was ordered to support General Lincoln in South Carolina. He suffered another defeat in Charleston, S.C.

Later, in Georgia, he joined forces with General Lincoln. Assisted by the French fleet under Admiral d'Estaing, they prepared to attack Savannah. On August 19, before the battle, he wrote a long letter in which he detailed the disappointments that he had encountered in the American military service "which ill treatment makes me begin to abhor." He expressed the hope that he might still find the opportunity of proving his devotion to the American cause.

On October 9, 1779, at the siege of Savannah, General Pulaski bravely and impatiently charged the British lines at the head of his cavalry and fell with a mortal wound.

He was removed to the American ship Wasp, where surgeons were unable to remove the bullet. He died on board that ship, probably on October 11, on its way back to Charleston. He was only 31 years old.

General Pulaski is still remembered in the history of our Nation. Monuments exist in many cities to keep his memory alive. In my hometown of Chicago a plaque commemorating the memory of Casimir Pulaski is at the new John C. Kluczynski Federal Building, where I have a district office. In Washington here in the U.S. Capitol Building General Pulaski's statue stands in recognition of his services to the American Revolution.

Casimir Pulaski's service to the cause of the American Revolution was not unlike those of our other great leaders, including George Washington. History records that the 7 years of the Revolutionary War were years of disappointment, discouragement, and despair for these leaders. Money was scarce, desertion was high, and the defeats were discouraging. Yet, history also records the victory at Yorktown.

Washington and Lafayette lived to see the final victory, but unfortunately Pulaski joined the ranks of other heroes who lost their lives in battle. Pulaski was fortunate in his last days for his gallant charge served to ennoble him in the eyes of posterity despite his mistakes.

He won for himself the title of "Father of the American Cavalry." He also saved Washington's army twice from disruption. He was willing to make the necessary sacrifices for his ideals—both in his native Poland and here in the United States. He abandoned the wealth and comfort that one associates with the nobility of Europe to help win independence for Poland and for the United States.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I join with my fellow Polish-American colleagues in the House of Representatives as well as my fellow Americans of Polish heritage, in paying tribute to Count Casimir Pulaski, who won a place in the history of both Poland and the United States.●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 18, 1978

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, last week, as the Members know, was Captive Nations Week, which was appropriately observed in the Congress as well as across the country. This commemoration also received attention throughout the free world as evidenced by the article in the July 16, China Post, published in Taipei, Taiwan, Republic of China. I insert this commentary at this point:

THE CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK OBSERVANCE

Beginning today, Captive Nations Week will be observed by the people of the Republic of China. A series of colorful events is scheduled for the week from July 16 to July 22. Anti-Communist leaders from six continents and more than 30 youth leaders will take part in these events.

The observance of Captive Nations Week is in accordance with the Captive Nations Week Resolution passed by the U.S. Congress and signed into law by the late U.S. President Dwight Eisenhower in 1959. Since then, Captive Nations Week has been commemorated by the people of the free world to remind themselves of the plight of captive peoples behind the Iron Curtain.

As the resolution clearly stated that "the enslavement of a substantial part of the world's population by Communist imperialism makes a mockery of the idea of peaceful coexistence between nations and constitutes a detriment to the natural bonds between the United States and other peoples," and "since 1918 the imperialistic and aggressive policies of Russian Communism have resulted in the creation of vast empire which poses a direct threat to security of the United States and of all the free peoples of the world," it calls for keeping alive the desire for liberty and independence on the part of the people of these conquered nations.

There is indeed a sharp contrast between those days of calling for liberation for the people behind the Iron Curtain and the present period of abject appeasement adopted by the free world's leaders. The Eisenhower-Dulles policy of containment and resistance to Communism has been replaced by the Nixon-Ford-Carter policy of negotiation and compromise if not surrender. As a result, more nations have been put behind the iron curtain and countless millions of free people were enslaved and persecuted. Thus in addition to the list of countries subjugated by Communism in 1959, three Indochinese nations and several nations on the African continent have succumbed to Communist conquest increasing the total number of captive nations to 32.

The Communist rulers also resorted to unprecedented reign of terror in the occupied territories. On the Chinese mainland, the Peiping regime has slaughtered more than 85 million innocent people during its reign of terror. The campaign to liquidate its opposition goes on unabated as the inhuman authorities are conducting an incessant purge against the "gang of four" remnants. The recent murder of three human rights fighters by the pseudonym of Li I Chi proves that its wanton violation of human rights is even more cruel and despicable than the Soviet trial of Shcharansky and Ginzburg.

In the Indochinese peninsula, the number of people indiscriminatorily slaughtered by the captors runs into millions. In Cambodia alone, it was estimated that more than 2.5 million people have been killed. The number of people killed in South Vietnam after the Communist take-over remains inestimable. But it must also run into millions. It was reported that more than 73 million people have been killed or sent to the concentration camps behind the Iron Curtain.

In view of the recent stepped up activities of the Soviet and Chinese Communists, this year's observance of Captive Nations Week will have special significance. The outcries of the enslaved people behind the Iron Curtain countries are growing louder with every new move of appeasement by the short-sighted leaders of the free world who try to seek temporary detente with the inhuman Communists which will only lead to phoney peace and fleeting security. Their hope of pitting the Chinese Communists against the Soviets will end up in their own destruction.

It is high time for free people everywhere to rededicate their efforts in relieving the plights of the captive people behind the Iron Curtain countries and fortify their resolve not to snub "the captive people's aspiration for the recovery of their freedom." They should indeed act in accordance with the theme of Captive Nations Week observance to "promote human rights and liberate enslaved peoples."●

EXPLANATION OF VOTES MISSED JULY 21, 1978

HON. ROBERT W. EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, July 21, 1978, I had business with the Select Committee on Assassinations that required my absence from Washington. Therefore, I was unable to vote during session that day. Had I been in Washington, I would have voted as follows on those votes missed:

Rollcall No. 581. For the House to resolve into the Committee of the Whole; "yes";

Rollcall No. 582. Amendment to H.R. 12433, Housing and Community Development Amendments to 1978, to prohibit use of funds for the reorganization of or transfer of any function of any area, field, or insuring office relating to multifamily housing or community planning or development; "no";

Rollcall No. 583. Amendment to H.R. 12433 to strike provisions requiring that FAIR insurance rates be no higher than those set by the principal State-licensed rating organization for essential property insurance on the private market; "no";

Rollcall No. 584. Amendment to H.R. 12433 to prohibit social security increases occurring after May 1978 from being considered as income for purposes of determining eligibility for, or amount of assistance available to, any recipient under public housing laws; "yes";

Rollcall No. 585. Final passage of H.R. 12433; "yes"; and

Rollcall No. 586. District of Columbia appropriations, fiscal year 1979, H.R. 13468; "yes."●

REPRESENTATIVE BENNETT'S REMARKS AT NCOA CONVENTION

HON. MENDEL J. DAVIS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago our colleague, the Honorable CHARLES E. BENNETT, First District of Florida, was presented the Non Commissioned Officers Association of the U.S.A. (NCOA) "L. Mendel Rivers Award for Legislative Action." The presentation was made by the association's president James O. Duncan at the 17th Annual NCOA International Convention held in the Dunes Hotel and Country Club, Las Vegas, Nev.

In accepting the handsome plaque, Mr. BENNETT offered some thought-provoking words to his audience. I feel they should be brought to the attention of all of us involved in setting the priorities for this great Nation. As he suggests:

Our "Common Cause" in America today should be to see that our priority is the security of the United States.

"Why?" is explained in the text of his speech. It reads as follows:

REMARKS OF REPRESENTATIVE CHARLES E. BENNETT

Mr. President, members, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, I am grateful that there is a fine organization like the noncommissioned officers association and its official effective leadership.

I am deeply grateful for the honor you give me on this occasion. I accept it humbly, in a Representative capacity in behalf of all in Congress who made possible the things that you are considering in this award.

Let us consider for a few minutes the reasons why your great organization is so important to our country and to freedom in the world today. The struggle to protect our Nation and to gain and preserve freedom for mankind is perhaps the most important thing that mankind pursues today. Your organization is an important force for these important objectives and I congratulate you on your objectives and your work in this direction. It is in the best traditions of America.

When French Huguenots seeking religious freedom came to Florida's St. Johns River in 1564 they not only began the permanent European settlement of what is now the United States, but they were the first to arrive here in a search for liberty. Our English roots date from the 1607 settlement at Jamestown, Virginia, and the American free enterprise system may be said to stem from that settlement, since it was a business venture and a successful one. Everyone knows of the spirit of freedom and independence which motivated the 1620 Plymouth colony up in Massachusetts.

Many of those who came to our shores were fugitives: Fugitives from a feudal system which denied them individual rights and democratic liberties.

They came to America looking for freedom—for the kind of life European tyrannies made impossible.

They were "free" spirits and they built a "free" land and a new concept of citizenship.

George Washington knew the nature and character of these frontier Americans and articulated the new design of national defense when he stated: "Every man who enjoys the blessings of a free government owes his service in defense of it."

In the days of the revolution there was a phrase "the common cause", often used, and it had a special meaning.

There were many reasons for discontent with the mother country England—many causes which were not the common cause. There were excessive taxes and taxes without representation; impressment of seamen into the naval service; and the legal inability to be tried by one's peers and neighbors.

There were many different points of view as to what was desired in the new world. There were abolitionists who opposed slavery and others who advocated it.

There were those who thought that only property owners or the wealthy should be allowed to vote. Some favored an autocratic type of government.

There were people who felt that the government should see to it that religion fluorished; others were aetheists.

There were a myriad of different points of view among our founding fathers but there was only one "common cause", and that cause, common to all, was a strong independent nation, a nation in which the people could set new goals in new times but always protecting individual liberties.

That was the common cause of 1776 and it should be our common cause in 1978.

Today there are many points of view as to what the Federal Government should do. Almost every problem that is nationwide is considered a prime target for national legislation and financial support despite restrictions of the Federal Constitution designed to keep governmental power at grassroots level.

Today there are different points of view about abortion, welfare programs, bussing, equal rights for women, revenue sharing, foreign aid, affirmative action programs and a host of other proposals already adopted or being considered for adoption.

But should not our "common cause" in America today be to see that our first priority is the security of the United States so that our freedoms and liberties can be protected and good new ideas have a chance to flourish? If, in fact, we spend so excessively of the national tax income for things other than national defense, isn't it possible that all of the other benefits which our society enjoys may be imperiled?

We should not spend one cent more than we need for national defense. We should not spend one cent less than we need for national defense.

For two centuries, Americans have died on the battlefield to keep our country strong and free. Their sacrifice challenges us to ensure the survival of this great country they died for. We can best do this by maintaining a defense powerful enough to deter potential aggressors. Therefore, it is appropriate on this occasion to examine the progress of defense legislation in Congress so far this year.

We must make certain that our men and women in uniform have the necessary resources to protect and defend the cherished freedoms and liberties that we possess. To do otherwise would surely invite disaster, destruction and defeat of all the ideals that we hold so dear.

These resources include people-programs and benefits. They may not be the most glamorous aspects of our defense budget as compared to new weapons systems and hardware, but they are essential to the well being and morale of our military forces.

As such, we must not lose sight of their importance in our discussions and consideration of our national defense posture.

Our military personnel should not be treated like second class citizens, performing as they do the foremost duty of citizenship—the protection and defense of their fellow Americans' security. America's attitude toward the military man must be improved. In spite of all of the sacrifices that are made by those in the services, there is constant nitpicking about the commissaries, medical benefits, double-dipping, and the civil service practice of giving veterans a five-point advantage on examinations. A little gratitude would be a good substitute for such carping.

I am proud that the House Armed Services Committee has stood by our enlisted personnel. We have rejected a number of efforts that would have the effect of eroding earned benefits. In addition, the committee is taking action to maintain and improve many existing benefits.

The committee has strongly endorsed appropriation of funds for travel and transportation entitlements for dependents of junior enlisted personnel. In addition, we have initiated a series of hearings on the plight of junior enlisted personnel stationed overseas. Testimony of servicemen most directly affected has been obtained by calling in junior enlisted personnel who have recently returned from overseas and who are stationed in the Washington, D.C., area. The committee's deliberations are not intended to remove all the privileges of rank, but to reflect the desire to ease, in the most equitable manner possible, the financial strain experienced by those members who are least able to bear the burden of high overseas cost.

We clearly recognize the value of incentives. Enlistment and reenlistment bonuses, for example, have proven to be valuable elements of compensation for attracting and retaining qualified enlisted members in the most critical skills.

The house, as part of its deliberations on the Department of Defense authorization bill, has passed a two-year extension of the present authority for providing these bonuses. Without this action no new enlistment or reenlistment bonuses could be offered after September 30 of this year. This action, initiated by the committee, will result in the timely extension of these helpful bonuses.

A word about the president's commission of military compensation is in order. The commission has submitted its recommendations to President Carter who has asked the Department of Defense for comments on these recommendations. There is no consensus yet within the Department of Defense on the specifics of these recommendations. I do not know at the present time what the final recommendations of the administration will be in this area. It is understood, in fact, that the proposals will not be submitted to the Congress until much later this year or not even until next year.

At this point, neither I nor any other Member of Congress can forecast with any certainty what changes, if any, may eventually be made in the military compensation and retirement system. I can assure you, however, that before any change is made, full and deliberate consideration will be given to the effect of any change on the ability of the Armed Forces to attract and retain the personnel with the qualifications required and in the numbers necessary to provide adequately for the Nation's defense.

In addition, I can assure you that particular attention will be given by the Congress to those career members of the Armed Forces who have been serving with the understanding that they are building an equity in the retirement system as it is now constituted. In the case of individuals who have devoted a substantial number of years of service to the Nation in the Armed Forces, I believe I can assure you that special provisions would be included to protect that equity in the present system.

Another issue that is of concern to the committee and one in which the members have been very active is the fight to maintain the commissary subsidy. Action has been taken in the Senate recently to phase out the subsidy but this shortsighted effort has been defeated so far.

Of interest to you also is the fact that the House has passed legislation that would substantially improve the current survivor benefit plan, particularly for enlisted members. This bill, passed by a 391–0 vote in the House last September, has been referred to the Senate Armed Services Committee. We are still hopeful of final action on this bill this Congress and the support of associations such as yours is critically important in attaining this end result.

Another matter that I have watched with some concern is the number of first term enlistees in the Department of Defense who do not complete their enlistment. At present, almost 40 percent of enlistees fall in this category.

Attrition of this magnitude is very serious, and there are many causes. One major contributing cause has been the number of personnel discharged under the trainee and expeditious discharge programs. These programs are, of course, useful management tools to permit an accelerated release of individuals not suited to military service. On the other hand, it appears they are becoming a substitute for leadership. Clearly, a percentage of the marginal performers can become productive if given the proper direction, and the services have an obligation to do this.

It is an extremely unfortunate situation when up to 40 percent of the 400,000 individuals enlisted each year are released as unsatisfactory. Further, the effect on recruiting that results when these individuals return to their neighborhoods could be a problem with long-term consequences for the all volunteer force.

I think that the key to the solution in this area lies with the NCO. You have the most contact.

You have the most influence. You can turn this situation around; and turn it around we must. A declining male youth manpower base means that every effort must be made to stabilize our personnel pool.

I realize that the Department of Defense is seeking to deal with this problem by reducing the amount of unplanned attrition, particularly during the first enlistment; increasing the use of women in the military, and attempting to substitute civilian manpower for military manpower wherever possible. Nonetheless, in my view the bottom line remains that we must make certain that our military have the wherewithal to do their job.

As one who has been involved intimately through the years with our Navy shipbuilding program, I believe firmly that our people come first. There is no question that we must continue to modernize our fleet. Yet, even with the most modern fleet in the world our Navy cannot do its job without well-trained and well-qualified personnel. People are the first line of our national defense. But I would also like to discuss some other aspects of the recently House passed $38 billion military procurement bill in the context of the challenges of these times.

Today America is more at an important crossroads in defense matters than at any time in the last three decades. This is so because, assuming we are equal to our potential enemies in defense strengths today, this will not be so several years from now if the Soviet current increasing military strengths are not met by at least a 5 percent increase over inflation in our own efforts. This is not a large figure but a failure to meet it could encourage a Soviet initiated world war or a requirement by them that we make major concessions not in our national interest.

In January, President Carter unveiled his FY 79 defense budget. Although his budget does represent a modest increase in defense spending, the public has been given the erroneous impression that this budget is generous to defense objectives.

The defense request went up this year 9.4 percent (including projected inflation) while health expenditures went up 12.2 percent, education 10.7 percent, energy 23 percent, and international affairs 14 percent. You will note that all of these went up a larger percentage than defense did. The biggest dollar increase in the fiscal 79 budget was not for defense but for income security—a whopping $12.4 billion increase.

While in the past 15 years we have been cutting the defense percentage of expenditures in half, we have doubled the direct payments to individuals item. Direct payments to individuals now greatly exceed the defense outlay in dollars.

The Brookings Institute tells us that in the last 15 years the Soviets have pushed rapidly forward in defense: That they have, for example, increased their strategic nuclear power five fold; and expanded their ground forces from 140 divisions to 170. We have today our smallest navy since 1939.

This year the Presidential defense budget is passing up the B–1 bomber, passing up a nuclear or non-nuclear carrier and is cutting all forces by 20,000 men in uniform and 13,000 in civilian jobs. Naval reserves are recommended to be cut from 94,100 to 51,400.

If carried out, the 1979 national defense budget would be a calamity, grossly inadequate for our country's security requirements.

General Brown, the chairman of the joint chiefs of staff said to our committee earlier this year:

"In looking back over my previous (four annual) reports to you, I am struck by the fact that in nearly every area of military strength there has been a relative decline over the years in relation to the Soviet Union."

I am glad to report that the house, following the lead of its armed services committee, has two weeks ago approved important and greatly needed increases in defense spending over the President's budget.

The President had requested $35.5 billion for weapons procurement, research and development, and civil defense. However, the House by a vote of 319 to 67 approved a defense authorization bill providing $37.9 billion for these activities.

The President's inadequate shipbuilding budget ignored the recommendations of top level Navy officials and naval experts for an accelerated shipbuilding program. Admiral

James Holloway, Chief of Naval Operations, recently stated that the size of today's Navy does not realistically represent a two-ocean navy.

The increased defense spending comes mainly in the Navy's shipbuilding program. The additional funding will provide for a new nuclear aircraft carrier and a nuclear strike cruiser, neither of which were requested by the President.

The Navy has dropped from a high of more than 900 ships in 1970 to a low of 459 ships this year.

Last May, President Carter offered hope that this trend would be reversed when he presented a new five-year shipbuilding program that included 30 ships and $8.5 billion for FY 79. However, the President's actual budget for FY 79 requested only 15 new ships at a cost of $4.7 billion. In less than a year, 15 ships and $3.8 billion disappeared from the President's shipbuilding request.

In 1978 it will take a real fight in Congress to obtain the national defense that this country needs to prevent war; or to win if war should come. We cannot shirk that responsibility.

George Washington in the darkest hours of the Revolution once received a long listing of troubles from one of his subordinate generals and wrote back, "When is the time for brave men to exert themselves in the cause of liberty and their country if this is not it?" Thomas Paine once said, "Those who expect to reap the blessings of freedom must, like men, undergo the fatigue of supporting it."

I believe the American people are not fatigued with the defense of our country. They support the "common cause" to see that our defenses are adequate to protect the security of our country.

They and you give this "common cause" top priority. And in you lies our best hope for the achievement of our "common cause"—the protection of our country; and the securing for ourselves and generations yet to come, the blessings of democracy and individual liberty.●

THE SOVIET UNION IS REPROCESSING SPENT FUEL AND CONTROLLING NUCLEAR PROLIFERATION AT THE SAME TIME

HON. JOHN B. ANDERSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago I wrote a letter to President Carter expressing my deep concern over the implications of his indefinite deferral of commercial reprocessing and the fact that other nations are moving ahead to develop this needed technology irrespective of U.S. policy. Other nations need not only the energy values in reactor spent fuel, but also view reprocessing as a better means to manage radioactive waste.

Our distinguished colleague from New York, JACK WYDLER, visited the Soviet Union in March to review that nation's nuclear energy programs. Mr. WYDLER's report on that trip has just been released by the Committee on Science and Technology, of which he is the ranking minority member. In that report, he clearly states the Soviet position on reprocessing and why they view a positive forward program as a greater deterrent to proliferation than withdrawal from the field, as President Carter has done. I am inserting that part of Mr. WYDLER's report dealing with reprocessing policy in Russia:

The Soviets are strong proponents of nonproliferation. However, their approach to this issue differs somewhat from ours. In some respects they are more restrictive than we are in others they are more liberal. For example, they require that all spent fuel of Soviet origin in foreign reactors be returned to the U.S.S.R. for storage and/or reprocessing. At present, we have no such requirement with respect to fuel elements of U.S. origin. On the other hand, the Soviets look favorably toward reprocessing as a means of increasing their nuclear fuel supplies and have no intention to halt work on plutonium cycle breeder reactors. Their approach to nonproliferation is to improve safeguards rather than to seriously consider alternative fuel cycles. The Soviets indicated that they are doing R&D on a fuel cycle similar to the diversion-proof CIVEX process. In spite of these views, they participate in the International Fuel Cycle Evaluation (INFCE).●

MEAT IMPORTS—PRESIDENTIAL DECISION SHOWS NEED FOR A SANE IMPORT POLICY

HON. MAX BAUCUS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. Speaker and fellow colleagues, early in June the President announced his intention to increase meat imports by 200 million pounds, or roughly 15 percent, in 1978.

The ill-advised, short-sighted decision has had a terrible impact on cattle markets. As soon as the increase was announced, my office received reports that cattle buyers were cancelling major livestock orders in Montana.

Cattle prices fell $10 per hundredweight after the announcement was made. In Montana, the demand for feeder calves virtually disappeared.

But consumer beef prices increased 2½ percent during June. The President's decision was a blow to cattlemen that has yielded no relief to consumers.

The only thing cattlemen want from their Government is a fair deal. They have never asked for supports or subsidies.

They are not getting that fair deal. When prices climbed to a level this spring that would give cattlemen their first profit in 4 years, an administration spokesman announced that prices "have gone up too far, too fast."

The increase in imports that soon followed effectively destroyed cattlemen's confidence. At a time when this Nation needs expanded herds to satisfy its demand for beef, many cattlemen tell me that they are selling out. They fear that the administration will take additional steps to keep beef prices below costs of production.

They have good reason to be wary. Beef import quotas were suspended by the administration every year from 1970 through 1974. Only after the beef market crashed in 1974—largely because of President Nixon's decision to freeze prices—did administration interference stop.

The Senate has passed a bill to eliminate weaknesses in our current beef import policy. The Senate legislation, H.R. 5052, is similar to a bill I introduced—H.R. 12612.

The legislation establishes a countercyclical formula to stabilize beef prices. It extends import quotas to cover cooked, canned, and processed meats and sharply curtails the President's authority to arbitrarily expand imports.

My bill also includes language—not in the Senate version—to limit live cattle imports. Such imports can severely disrupt local markets in border States like Montana.

The countercyclical formula would adjust beef imports depending on the supply of domestic beef available. Thus, when domestic supplies were high and prices low, imports would be reduced. In periods when domestic supply was small, imports would increase.

The countercyclical formula provides for about the same average imports as current law. But the imports would be timed to provide minimal disruption of domestic markets and contribute to price stability.

If the proposed countercyclical formula had been in effect this year, import quotas would have increased somewhat. But cattlemen could have planned for the increase, and they would have been assured that in future years if prices had decreased, imports would have been curbed.

A countercyclical formula for beef imports provides benefits for both consumers and producers. The opposition comes from foreign countries that export beef.

In fact, a USDA official recently told one of my staff members that "foreign cattlemen have more influence in the administration than our own producers."

That situation is deplorable. I would urge this House to act now to cut back administration authority to meddle with the livelihoods of thousands of domestic cattlemen.

It is high time we establish a meat import policy that assures consumers a steady supply of beef at reasonable prices while providing cattlemen adequate incomes.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. EDWIN B. FORSYTHE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, on June 28, 1978, I was unavoidably absent from the House for three votes. On these measures I would have voted as follows:

Rollcall No. 500, demand for a second on the motion to suspend the rules and pass H.R. 11886, veterans disability compensation: "aye."

Rollcall No. 504, demand for a second on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill to provide for accelerated Federal research on developing energy cells to convert sunlight to electricity, H.R. 12874, solar power research: "aye."

Rollcall No. 512, amendment to waive the Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage requirements for housing rehabilitation projects, H.R. 12433: "aye."

On June 29, 1978, I was unavoidably absent for a vote. I would have voted "aye" on rollcall No. 514, a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for consideration of H.R. 12433, housing and community development.

On July 12, 1978, for unavoidable reasons, I was unable to vote on a measure before the House. I would have voted "aye" on rollcall No. 537, an amendment to allow local education agencies to qualify for special matching Federal grants.

On July 19, 1978, I was unavoidably absent from the House for one vote and would have voted "aye" on rollcall No. 572, a move to order the previous question on the motion to recommit the conference report on the Agricultural Credit Act to the Committee of Conference.●

A DISASTER—FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE SURVEILLANCE ACT

HON. ALLEN E. ERTEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Speaker, revelations of past abuses by the intelligence community have incensed the public to the point of demanding greater safeguards against intrusions into their privacy. In addition, prosecutions of former FBI officials, accusations of questionable CIA activities and a general revulsion for tactics that violate civil rights have aroused an effort to fashion "standards" or "guidelines" to govern the behavior of intelligence agents. These upheavals in the intelligence community have converged with such a force that Congress has taken far-reaching steps to correct these defects.

Unfortunately, the steps reach too far. There is no doubt that attitudes have changed and in so changing label as abuse those actions formerly countenanced by the Government and the public. It is also apparent that the outcry against past tactics and the new expectations have cast a pall over the intelligence community, which now balks at assignments that may later subject agents to reprisals.

No doubt the absence of statutory regulations or guidelines has contributed to an uncertainty that might impair our foreign intelligence operations. However, the procedures established by this bill for securing warrants to authorize electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence-gathering purposes do little to respond to the concerns that have surfaced. Instead, they perpetuate the lack both of accountability for agency actions and of guarantees against abuse. Rather than establish standards subject to careful scrutiny, the legislation blurs the constitutional delineations between functions of the Government and leaves the public with no, not greater, recourse against abuse.

This legislation is riddled with so many defects that its passage would further damage, rather than improve, the conduct of foreign intelligence operations. The legislation is a compromise, the worst of all worlds—a compromise of our intelligence community, our civil liberties, our judicial system, and our form of government.

I. COMPROMISE OF THE INTELLIGENCE COMMUNITY

The creation of a special court to rule on warrant applications for electronic surveillance in foreign intelligence activities poses a serious threat to the integrity of those activities.

Security problems would only be exacerbated. The existence of one court in one location increases the vulnerability of its proceedings to infiltration by foreign agents. The infiltration of this court would jeopardize all of our electronic surveillance of foreign agents. We would have effectively put "all of our eggs in one basket." By this legislation, we have helped foreign agents to isolate the one spot where all the information on our electronic surveillance is concentrated. We have unwittingly helped them solve one of their problems—the location of the information. The only problem left for them is to infiltrate the court.

Furthermore, the circle of people with access to information on foreign intelligence operations through this court, or to that information actually gathered through the electronic surveillance, widens far beyond those who need to know, thus increasing the risk of leaks and comprising national security.

The combination of these problems give foreign intelligence agencies reason to concentrate on this one court in our judicial system in their counterintelligence activities. Despite the requirement, under title I, section 103(d), that the chief judges of the special courts consult with the Attorney General and the Director of Central Intelligence in setting up security measures, the judiciary's lack of experience in the area of protecting national security interests will invite attempts to break down its security entirely.

This bill further undermines foreign intelligence operations by requiring a criminal nexus to justify the surveillance of a U.S. person. An application for a warrant must certify that the target of the surveillance is either a foreign government or an agent of a foreign government. To target a U.S. person, there must be a determination that his intelligence activities on behalf of a foreign power "involve or may involve a violation of the criminal statutes of the United States."

As Robert H. Bork noted in his testimony before this subcommittee:

> If a United States person is knowingly engaging in clandestine activities on behalf of a foreign power, that person ought to be under surveillance whether or not there is reason to believe that a crime may be committed. It is important to know who is working undercover for foreign governments and to know what networks exists.

The assembly of a complete picture of an intelligence operation is much like completing a jigsaw puzzle. Small pieces are joined together to constitute an entire picture; however, this legislation prevents the completion of that picture. The mechanism of court-issued warrants necessitates either that the intelligence community hope that the court defers to its expertise in determining the value of the information sought and the application's adherence to the standards, or risk subjection to the whims of a judge who may consider himself to be a foreign affairs expert. How is the judge to know the picture in order to make the judgment when only the total accumulation of knowledge, with which the judge has no experience, can develop that overall picture? This defies the establishment of any uniformity with respect to what is acceptable and unacceptable in foreign intelligence surveillance. The possibility of differing constructions of the standards, rendered in secret, does little to promote consistency or protect against abuses.

Judges' philosophies vary radically, and our intelligence communities will have no way to determine what a judge will authorize. It may be argued that because of the appeals process, we will establish when a warrant has been refused incorrectly. After all, if a judge refuses the warrant, an appeal lies to the appeals court. However, the delay in instituting an appeal (and getting a decision) may cause the intelligence opportunity to pass.

II. COMPROMISE OF THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY

This legislation proposes to thrust the judiciary into a foreign policy role under the guise of exercising traditional warrant powers. The argument that the authority to issue warrants for foreign intelligence surveillance is no different from the authority to issue warrants in criminal investigations is specious for a number of reasons.

To require a court to approve or reject applications for warrants for foreign intelligence surveillance is to involve the judicial branch in a managerial function belonging to the executive branch. The bill deliberately assigns to the judiciary the actual administration of a law and serves to aggravate a growing movement toward "judicial imperialism," wherein the judiciary has become overinvolved in legislative and executive activities. As Prof. Robert Bork of the Yale Law School testified:

> No one should underestimate the strength of the tendency displayed by the judiciary in recent years to take over both legislative and executive functions.

By dragging the courts into the foreign intelligence arena, this bill blurs the constitutional boundaries between the judicial and the executive and legislative branches of Government. This poses a problem of no lesser proportions than the ones the bill purports to solve. The authority the court would exercise under H.R. 7308 is one envisioned by the proponents of the legislation, not by the Constitution, and certainly is not a proper function of the court. If the court is to exercise the supervisory powers envisioned by this bill, the judge will have to become a foreign intelligence expert, a function which is hardly judicial in nature.

The article III judicial power extends to cases or "controversy to which the Unite States shall be a party." This legislation, broadening the judicial power to include warrants for foreign intelligence surveillance, is absent the required element of a case or controversy to give rise to Federal court jurisdiction; therefore, this can hardly be regarded as a legitimate judicial function. Generally, this particular warrant procedure will never be part of a case or controversy, whereas, in the criminal law, a warrant is issued based upon a criminal case. I would seriously doubt that this legislation would pass constitutional muster.

The determination to issue a warrant under this bill includes policy determination on questions of foreign affairs. For instance, under title I, section 105(a), the judge may "enter an ex parte order as requested or as modified (emphasis added) approving the electronic surveillance based on his judgment of the data submitted by the applicant. To modify the request most certainly would involve independent assessments by the judge of the need for and propriety of the surveillance. Foreign policy judgments would have to be made to establish any modifications. Judicial supremacy in this Nation does not mean that judges are so infallible that they should oversee our foreign affairs.

What qualifies a judge to make such independent assessments? How can this legislation presume to protect the national security in its foreign intelligence activities while granting to persons with no expertise or experience in such matters the power to evaluate our need for and to regulate the conduct of foreign intelligence surveillance. Not only does this place the integrity of such operations in serious jeopardy, but it also makes a mockery of judicial decisionmaking.

These are hardly the appropriate circumstances for judges to receive on-the-job training, but the alternative is no more attractive. The presiding judge may decide to plunge right into the thick of things, seizing upon this as an opportunity to become a foreign affairs expert. If he choses to develop such an expertise, he would have to be drawn deep into foreign intelligence operations; in the meantime, how are we to gage the damage done to our intelligence operations while the judge goes through such a learning process. In addition, this is a never-ending process; because the judges are rotated periodically, none ever really has the opportunity to develop the background needed to make such judgments of the issues involved.

Conversely, a judge may defer to the expertise of the intelligence community and the Attorney General. This situation is equally undesirable because it totally defeats the purpose of this special court as an agent for impartial review and provides no protection at all against abuse. The knowledge that a particular judge is predisposed to defer to the applicant presents all too great a temptation to misrepresentation or deceit, especially in borderline requests. This is especially true, because the factual situation will never be adjudicated. The warrant, once issued and utilized, is never expected to be subject to an adversary proceeding. Only the court and the applicant will know of the warrant's existence unless an oversight committee sees it, but it can reasonably be predicted that the committee will defer to the judge's decision.

This arrangement has glaring defects. First of all, there is no one to challenge the warrant prior to its issuance; second, there is no mechanism for contesting it once it has been exercised. Warrants issued in criminal investigations are not so flawed; it is fully anticipated that they will become known and will figure into ligitation. As an element of a criminal investigation, these warrants may be challenged.

Third, this procedure stamps the imprimatur of judicial sanction on the warrant, cloaking it in a presumption of legality. How, then, can an individual or a group ever contest the legality of its use? How could an accusation of abuse be seriously entertained? The ability to deal with such a possibility has been precluded. As noted, even the oversight committee will offer no challenge to the judge's determination. As a result, the oversight committees and the executive branch get the protection of a judicial order which has no real factual basis for a court's decision but which absolves them of any responsibility for the actions.

Through its involvement in the approval of the electronic surveillance, the court loses its character as a forum for resolving controversies. It has forfeited its role, its duty, to serve as an impartial body for rendering decisions in cases or controversy. This is certainly a corruption of the constitutional mandate for the judiciary.

Finally, the bill totally misconstrues the nature and scope of the traditional judicial warrant. Proponents of the bill have argued the logic of requiring warrants for foreign intelligence surveillance by noting that they are the traditional means utilized by the legal system for assuring citizens that the government adheres to "strict legal processes" when it must engage in "intrusive activities." As I have demonstrated throughout these remarks, the comparison between traditional warrant powers and those created by H.R. 7308 is specious, because of the nonjudicial role foisted upon the judges of the special court.

If this is such a "strict legal process," why is there no provision to inform the subject of the surveillance, after its completion, as there is under criminal warrants? This could be done without jeopardizing the intelligence operations or national security if confined to instances where no information results from the surveillance of a U.S. person. If this is so strict a process, why does the bill attempt to take the warrant process, utilized in securing information for criminal investigations and prosecutions, and extend it to cases of foreign intelligence, whether or not there is a violation of criminal law, no prosecution is intended or anticipated, and there will be litigation over the warrant's use?

Not only has this legislation presupposed the similarity of the warrants it requires and presently existing warrant procedures, but it also perceives no differences between the situations that give rise to both. In either instance, it is insisted, warrantless surveillance would constitute a violation of the fourth amendment and that only a warrant would legitimize the activity. To impose the formality of a meaningless warrant is to place form over substance; we are merely deluding ourselves.

The power to conduct warrantless electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes has been asserted by every President since FDR. This same power has been upheld by three out of four appeals courts to rule on the question. In United States v. Brown, 484 F. 2d 418 (Fifth Circuit, 1973), the Fifth Circuit Court made a strong statement asserting the powers of the President in foreign intelligence matters. They declared:

> As (the Keith case) teaches, in the area of domestic security, the President may not authorize electronic surveillance without some form of prior judicial approval. However, because of the President's constitutional duty to act for the United States in the field of foreign relations, and his inherent power to protect the national security in the context of foreign affairs, we reaffirm what we held in United States v. Clay, supra, that the President may constitutionally authorize warrantless wiretaps for the purpose of gathering foreign intelligence. Restrictions upon the President's power which are appropriate in cases of domestic security become artificial in the context of the international sphere.

It is particularly ironic that one of the judges who presided in the above-cited case and was instrumental in formulating such a powerful reaffirmation of the President's power in foreign intelligence matters, now serves as Attorney General of the United States and has lent his most ardent support to the present legislation.

In further arguing for the need for warrants in foreign intelligence operations, supporters have insisted that courts have held that foreigners in the United States are protected by the fourth amendment. As an example, they cite the Humphrey-Truong case, in which the court ruled that much of the surveillance against Truong, a nonresident alien, was unconstitutional, because a warrant was not obtained. However, they fail to point out that the court had a great deal of difficulty in reaching such a decision. The court determined that the Government, during its surveillance for purely informational purposes, had decided to prosecute Truong, at which point the Government should have obtained a warrant for continued surveillance for criminal investigatory purposes. It is expected that this ruling will be appealed on the basis of the contention that only when prosecution is the sole purpose of the surveillance is a warrant required.

Legislation enacted by Congress in 1968 makes a distinction between warrants for criminal investigations and warrants in national security matters—a distinction that proponents of this bill are unwilling to make. Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act established procedures for the judicial authorization of electronic surveillance for the investigation and prevention of specified types of serious crimes and the use of such information in criminal proceedings. That same title, however, denied any intention of extending its prescribed limitations on electronic surveillance to the "constitutional power of the President to take such measures as he deems necessary to * * * obtain foreign intelligence information deemed essential to the security of the United States."

III. COMPROMISE OF THE RULE OF LAW

One of the distinctions between a civilized, democratic nation, and others is an adherence to the rule of law. In America, we have established a written, open law to which Americans adhere. Beginning with our Constitution, we have established an open judicial system which, in interpreting the law, must rationalize its legal interpretations in writing, which are subjected to public scrutiny.

This legislation, for the first time in our history, will develop a hidden, secret body of law which will be available to only a very few people (whom we do not know) which is to guide the intelligence community. Personal liberties, the right to privacy and to some extent, the right to free speech, will be denied to certain American citizens by the judicial system of the United States, based upon no legal standards whatsoever. If, by some chance, legal standards are established in this secret body of law, no one will know what they are.

H.R. 7308 proposes that the special court shall grant warrants for foreign intelligence surveillance, but does not establish the standards the court should apply in granting them. In the event that the court denies the warrant request, the Government may appeal the denial to a special appeals court and even to the Supreme Court. These decisions are all secret, thus developing a secret body of law. The opinions are not open to the public and, in fact, one has to ask whether judges of the specially designated courts are entitled to review the previous decisions to attempt to determine what standards are to be applied.

The development of this secret body of law by our judicial system is alien to any theory of the rule of law. If we do not know what the law is, how do we make it better, how do we change it, and how do we monitor it? One has to ask, is it not better to have guidelines promulgated by statute for the authorization of electronic wiretapping for foreign intelligence-gathering purposes, allowing the Congress to exercise closed-doors oversight on a periodic basis? At least in this case, we have a group of people from tual basis for such activity. In addition, various walks of life examining the facthey have already formulated standards by which to judge and are policy makers, not judicial officers.

IV. CONCLUSION

There is no doubt a crucial need for demanding adherence to standards that will provide safeguards against abuses in the course of foreign intelligence operations. The executive branch responded to this need by formulating internal guidelines to regulate the conduct of electronic surveillance in foreign intelligence-gathering operations. However, shortcomings of such an approach have surfaced and the consensus agrees that statutory standard would provide the most effective check on these activities.

If this is the intent of the legislation before us, then it has failed miserably. Instead of improving accountability on the parts of those who are responsible for the conduct of those operations, this bill grants immunity to everyone. The judiciary cannot be held responsible for acting in good faith on information provided to it by the warrant applicants; the executive cannot be held accountable for acting on a warrant that the court has sanctioned.

According to the report of the Intelligence Committee, the purpose of H.R. 7308 is to "provide legislative authorization for and regulation of all electronic surveillance conducted in the United States for foreign intelligence purposes." If this is the case, then the mechanism for a judicial warrant is counter-productive to this very purpose. In issuing the warrant, the court makes the decision, without any legislative guidelines, as to which intelligence-gathering operations may be conducted. The oversight role of the Congress in foreign affairs has been emasculated and the constitutional functions of the court are recast beyond recognition.

Accountability for actions in foreign intelligence operations and prevention of abuses are unlikely to improve under the procedures of this legislation. The dissenting views to the Intelligence Committee's report described the conditions best suited to achieving these goals:

Aggressive oversight will let the Executive know that, should abuses occur, they will not go undiscovered, undisclosed or unpunished.

This preserves our constitutional separation of powers, meets the need for which this bill was designed by resting accountability with those directly answerable to the public, and strengthened the role of the court as an impartial arbiter should abuses occur.

One of the basic liberties we have is the right not to be exposed to star chamber proceedings, yet through this legislation, we are going to deny basic freedoms to U.S. citizens by court actions that will always be secret. For what purpose do we jeopardize the rule of law and our judicial system? To placate the critics of the intelligence community with a meaningless exercise of bureaucratic paperwork is surely a poor reason.●

SOVIET UNION'S VIOLATIONS OF HUMAN RIGHTS CANNOT BE IGNORED

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, the Soviet Union's total disregard for its obligations under the Helsinki accords—which guarantee basic human rights to the 38 signatory nations and specifically require adherence to provisions relating to freer movement of citizens—has recently manifested itself in a number of staged trials in which leading dissidents have been given the severest sentences.

These dissidents have faced trial conditions where only handpicked audiences are present, where they have been unable to introduce witnesses or documents in their defense, where spectators and judges incessantly interrupt and heckle them, and where their supporters have been harassed and intimidated.

The legal system of the Soviet Union has trampled the basic human rights of dissidents:

DISSIDENTS' SENTENCES

Yuri Orlov.—Convicted and sentenced to 7 years internal exile for "anti-soviet agitation and propaganda."

Victoras Petkus.—Convicted and sentenced to 3 years imprisonment, 7 years labor camp, 5 years internal exile for activities with the Lithuanian Helsinki monitoring group.

Ida Nudel.—Convicted and sentenced to 4 years internal exile for "malicious hooliganism."

Vladimir Slepak.—Convicted and sentenced to 5 years exile for "malicious hooliganism."

Alexander Ginzburg.—Convicted and sentenced to 8 years hard labor for his activities as a Helsinki monitor and administrator of relief fund for families of political prisoners.

Anatoly Scharansky.—Convicted and sentenced to 13 years at hard labor in a prison and labor camp on charges of "treason."

Now, two American newsmen, Craig Whitney and Harold Piper, have been brought to court by the Soviet Government which is unhappy about the reports these writers have filed on dissident activities in Russia.

Citizens of the world are horrified and indignant over the Soviet Union's unconscionable violations of basic human rights.

The U.S. Congress and the American people must send a loud and unmistakable message to the Soviet Union: its continuing disregard of the terms of the Helsinki accords, its continuing harassment of its citzens, and the deprivation of their human rights will bring about a worsening of the relations between our two countries—relations already strained because of earlier efforts by the Soviets to repress and oppress its dissidents.

The U.S. Congress intends to stand by the victims of Soviet hypocrisy and repression. The U.S. Congress will not remain silent.●

CARTER ADMINISTRATION EMBRACES TERRORISTS

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, U.S. policy toward Rhodesia is absolutely ridiculous. The Carter administration has thrown its support behind the pro-Communist terrorists and guerrillas while turning its back on the moderate biracial regime.

President Carter talks about the importance of human rights. At the same time, however, he has allied the United States with terrorist forces that engage in hit-and-run raids to kill innocent civilians. This was most vividly demonstrated by the recent massacre of a dozen British missionaries.

I call on President Carter to end his support for the terrorists. We should immediately remove the trade embargo against Rhodesia and give our support to the moderate internal settlement.

Following are editorial comments on U.S. policy toward Rhodesia by Kevin Phillips and M. Stanton Evans which were broadcast on CBS Radio Network's "Spectrum."

EDITORIAL COMMENTS

I'm Kevin Phillips.

"Barbarous" is the best word to describe unofficial United States support of Rhodesia's Popular Front guerrillas—barbarous and unbelievable. Two hundred years ago, during the Revolutionary War, Americans bitterly condemned the British government for using Indians to terrorize the colonial frontier, butchering and mutilating women and children. Massacres like that at New York's Cherry Valley in 1778 still live in infamy.

But now, in Rhodesia, the United States has allied itself with similar terrorism. We do not support the moderate bi-racial regime which has scheduled democratic elections later this year. Oh, no. Instead, we quietly embrace terrorism. In the words of The Washington Post, and I quote, "American policy is tipped towards the guerrillas. The United States funnels aid to the front-line states sponsoring the guerrillas and enforces no-trade sanctions against Rhodesia."

The guerrillas, of course, are the people who have been making news recently with such good-hearted political frolics as the massacre of a dozen British Pentecostal missionaries. The women were raped and bayoneted. Lesser outrages are a daily occurrence. Moderate, responsible black Rhodesians simply can't believe what is going on. The Reverend Sithole, one of the bi-racial coalition leaders, said in a recent interview that U.S. economic sanctions against Rhodesia help keep the guerrilla war going. He expresses concern that the West is "coming to a state of moral bankruptcy."

There are other disturbing theories, too. One liberal newspaper columnist suggests that Carter Administration Africa policy has come under the influence of black power radicals—black Americans, unconcerned about bi-racialism or democracy, who want to implement black power goals in Africa that they were unable to achieve in the United States civil rights revolution.

Whatever the explanation, though, there is no excuse. It is absolutely intolerable that the United States is allied, even unofficially, with murdering pro-Communist guerrillas against the forces of multi-racial democracy. I don't know whether the West can still win in Rhodesia; it may already be too late. But let us, at least, remove the counter-productive trade embargo, proclaim our support for the multi-racial internal settlement, and end our gruesome association with pro-Communist guerrillas whose daily atrocities make a macabre joke of President Carter's human rights rhetoric.

This is Kevin Phillips for Spectrum.

EDITORIAL COMMENTS

I'm M. Stanton Evans.

The brutal terror that is occurring in Rhodesia these days begins to resemble what happened earlier in Vietnam. This time, however, the situation is potentially much worse, since the American government now is on the side of the terrorists. We are lending our support to the Soviet-equipped forces of Joshua Nkomo and Robert Mugabe, who conduct hit-and-run raids across Rhodesia's borders to slaughter innocent civilians.

The degree to which our policy is responsible for the debacle in Rhodesia is discussed by Allan Ryskind in the current issue of "Human Events." Ryskind has just returned from Rhodesia and his discussion makes it plain that President Carter and Andrew Young are the parties chiefly to blame for the success of terrorist warfare against that country.

The key to everything else, Ryskind reports, is the system of economic sanctions imposed by the United Nations and honored by the United States. The embargo prevents exports, denies Rhodesia materials from the outside world, and causes unemployment and general discontent. And it isn't, of course, just the embargo.

In addition to this attack we have also permitted the terrorist Nkomo into this country but barred the moderate black Rhodesian leaders; we have tried to silence the tiny Rhodesian information office; and we have denounced the internal settlement pointing to eventual black majority rule. Our government says it won't go for a settlement unless it is acceptable to the terrorists, who want Rhodesia handed over to them on a silver platter, without the formality of a vote.

Against that backdrop, it's apparent that a solution to the Rhodesian problem is within our grasp: All we have to do is change sides. We need merely give support to the forces of anti-Communism and majority rule and remove it from the forces of Marxist terror and dictatorship. Since that is more or less what our official policy is supposed to be, why haven't we done it? The answer it seems, is Andrew Young's conviction that anyone who has been a Marxist-supported terrorist can't be all bad.

Ryskind concludes that the simplest and best thing we could do to change the situation in Rhodesia is to lift the embargo. That is exactly what the Congress ought to do, and at the earliest possible opportunity.

PLUTONIUM FROM CIVILIAN NUCLEAR FUEL REPROCESSING PLANTS WILL NOT BE USED FOR NUCLEAR WEAPONS

HON. MENDEL J. DAVIS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of concern expressed by the administration and Congress during the past year on the matter of nuclear weapons proliferation. Administration efforts have focused on controlling plutonium and its spread beyond the so-called weapons nations. A part of this effort has involved the indefinite deferral of commercial reprocessing in the United States, with an urging that other nations have, however, refused to follow the President's deferral and their reasons for not following were succinctly stated recently on the House floor by Representative MIKE MCCORMACK. During the course of House debate on House Concurrent Resolution 599, on July 12, which sought to disallow the export of low enriched uranium to India, Representative MCCORMACK differentiated between plutonium from civilan nuclear programs and military production programs and noted that plutonium from civilian nuclear fuel reprocessing programs is a very poor weapons grade material. If other nations want weapons grade plutonium, they will look at other sources for that plutonium rather than the civilian nuclear fuel reprocessing plants. Representative MCCORMACK also stated that other nations are committing to nuclear fuel reprocessing development for their economic survival. Because Representative MCCORMACK is a recognized expert on this matter, I have compiled his July 12 remarks on the House floor for the benefit of my colleagues. Those remarks are as follows:

We must understand that India has a very large amount of fuel which it must reprocess. It would be both misleading and foolish to suggest that there is any significant relationship between reprocessing this nuclear fuel from nuclear powerplants, on the one hand; and nuclear weapons, on the other. This is the fallacy of our trying to stop reprocessing. No nation, including India, has ever made a nuclear weapon from plutonium produced in a nuclear power reactor. India did not divert nuclear fuel to make its weapon, it clearly indicated what it was doing, and many nations knew what it was doing for many years. The plutonium was produced in a small Canadian heavy-water research reactor, not in any nuclear powerplant.

While I deplore this 1974 action by India, and I wish that they would sign the NPT, and I wish they would subject themselves to inspection by the IAEA (the same as I wish the United States would be so subject to inspection by the IAEA), it must be recognized there is a fundamental difference between what the Indians did and what we are talking about preventing.

There is a fundamental difference between the plutonium for weapons and that which is produced in a powerplant. Weapons-grade plutonium is composed of less than 6 percent plutonium-240. When we make plutonium for weapons, this is what we use. The Indians made plutonium of only about 1 percent plutonium-240, which is just about perfect for weapons.

However this is the opposite extreme from the plutonium which is produced in nuclear powerplants. It is 20 to 25 percent plutonium-240, and is almost worthless for weapons production. We made a test explosive from it once, and we found that it is extremely poor material for weapons.

No nation is interested in using nuclear fuel for weapons because weapons-grade plutonium can be produced more cheaply and quickly than the low quality material produced in powerplants. About three dozen nations can make weapons-grade plutonium today if they wish to do so, and it can without any nuclear powerplants at all. No permission or materials or secrets or any technology from the United States is required. It would only cost about $50 million to build a small nuclear reactor, such as the Indians used, and a couple of hot cells for processing special small fuel elements into weapons-grade plutonium. It would take about 5 percent of the cost of one conventional nuclear powerplant to make these weapons, and only half the time required to build one nuclear plant. It is important to understand this. The reason nuclear weapons are not being made is because the countries that can make them understandably do not want to make them, not because they are not reprocessing nuclear fuel.

It is useless to try to control weapons production by trying to prevent nuclear fuel reprocessing. If we undertake policies which have the effect of reducing the potential for energy production among the nations of the world, especialy nuclear energy which is so critical in many countries, this would create a far greater destabilizing factor than trying to stop the reprocessing of nuclear fuel.

We must be realistic in this matter, and deal in facts. We can minimize the potential for nuclear proliferation from production fuel elements by establishing regional reprocessing centers under the control of the IAEA, and have them regionally controlled, so that the countries involved can police themselves. We cannot control other nations to their disadvantage. They are telling us this.

The rest of the world is moving ahead of us. The most certain way to promote nuclear weapons proliferation is to try to stop nuclear energy production in the world. Nations without adequate supplies of energy may turn to military adventurism or threats, and may make nuclear weapons without having any nuclear energy plants.

Mr. McCORMACK concluded by reviewing the Russian policy on reprocessing and how it is a model other nations should follow in controlling nuclear proliferation:

The Russians are implementing the policy on an international scale that the Western World should adopt in order to minimize proliferation. The Russians simply lease nuclear fuel to many nations, on the condition that the fuel is sent back for reprocessing under Russian control. The Russians do not pretend, as we do, that running a nuclear powerplant creates a threat from nuclear weapons, because they know that the fuel will be reprocessed under their controls. If we would establish a similar program in the Western World, with international controls, would take a big step toward controlling potential proliferation. It would be much more realistic than attempting, as the sponsors of this resolution would do: Attempt to forbid other nations from doing what they must do for the economic survival, that is, reprocess their nuclear fuel.

In summary, Representative McCORMACK states that other nations have not followed President Carter's indefinite deferral of reprocessing because they do not view the separated plutonium product from civilian reprocessing plants to be of a significant weapons threat. Those nations that desire plutonium for weapons production can use means other than reprocessing which are quicker, cheaper, and less easy to detect. Another reason given by Representative McCormack for other nations' development of reprocessing technology is for economic survival. Nations simply cannot afford to throw-away the in-hand energy that exists in spent reactor fuel. Each spent fuel assembly contains the energy equivalent to 80,000 barrels of oil.

Regarding the Russian position on reprocessing, the Soviets have not forsaken reprocessing, but are proceeding under international controls to prevent any diversion of plutonium. Representative McCORMACK's remarks provide yet another reason for keeping the Barnwell Nuclear Fuel Plant in South Carolina available for possible reprocessing of spent reactor fuel in the United States.●

FORGETTING OUR HERITAGE

HON. DAVID F. EMERY

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. EMERY. Mr. Speaker, the Carter administration does not seem to enjoy a very good relationship with our veterans community. Many of the veterans I have spoken to in the State of Maine have expressed a real disappointment with the President. They often cite, as the cause of their frustration, the inadequate Veterans' Administration budget submitted by the President, the lack of support given by the administration for the programs designed to help Vietnam-era veterans find employment and the proposed civil service reform measures which would effect the veterans preference.

I, too, share the feelings of those veterans who feel that the administration has displayed an unusual insensitivity to those to whom this Nation owes so much.

Aside from the larger, more visible, issues confronting the veteran, there are many other smaller, less public, issues which seem to emerge every now and then. One of those issues was brought to my attention recently by the State adjutant of the Maine American Legion.

The following article, written by the State adjutant, Daniel Lambert, represents the position of the department of Maine American Legion on the subject dealing with the attempts to place seven World War I military cemeteries in France under the supervision of foreign nationals.

Mr. Speaker, I commend this article to my colleagues:

FORGETTING OUR HERITAGE

Those who served America in the Armed Forces during dangerous days when war and destruction threatened our nation are today the forgotten ones.

They were cheered into battle by the same editorialists who now write essays against veterans benefits. The veteran learns quickly upon returning to civilian life that he does not remain a hero for long. In fact, to our politicians and some of his fellow citizens, the veteran becomes an embarrassment as danger recedes. It seems that God is also treated the same way.

The American Legion's struggle to codify into law a system of veterans benefits is the answer one veterans group gives to the scoffers. Although, The American Legion deplores the fact that some policitians and citizens have forgotten the needs of the veterans, widows, and orphans, it does not surprise us.

It is one thing to attack and attempt to destroy veterans benefits for sick and disabled veterans, reduce widows pensions, and forget the obligation to living veterans. The Carter Administration has now begun to set its sights on the honored dead of our nation.

Taking a cue from the U. S. Ambassador to France, the Carter Administration now proposes that the seven World War I American military cemeteries in France now maintained by the American Battle Monuments Commission be turned over to the supervision of foreign nationals rather than being maintained by American personnel. It seems that the Carter Administration, continuing its anti-veteran thrust, now wants to heap insult on our aging veterans of World War I.

In the name of economy, and to assist in the balance of payments, the Carter Administration proposes to turn over the care of the seven WW I cemeteries in France to those who do not understand what these cemeteries mean to us. The proposal calls for the replacement of American personnel without requiring English speaking personnel.

As one who has visited all the military cemeteries abroad including the seven WW I cemeteries proposed for turnover to foreign nationals for care, I have tender memories of these shrines of honor.

The beauty and serenity that envelopes the visitor to our military cemeteries is long remembered. Seeing the host of visitors coming with flowers to pay tribute to our honored dead reminds the visitor of long journeys, expressions of love and gratitude, and people remembering our heroes.

The Carter Administration is testing the waters of public opinion, and if the seven World War I military cemeteries in France can be turned over to the care of foreign nationals, then only time will tell the full story of turnover of all military cemeteries abroad to foreign nationals.

The American Legion of Maine can only feel pity and wonder for an administration in Washington so devoid of reverence for our heritage that such a recommendation would be made.

In keeping faith with our honored dead, The American Legion of Maine urges all citizens to speak up and be heard on this issue.

DANIEL E. LAMBERT,
State Adjutant.●

CONGRATULATIONS TO PUERTO RICO—26 YEARS A COMMONWEALTH

HON. JOHN G. FARY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. FARY. Mr. Speaker, on July 25 Puerto Ricans, both in the United States and in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico will celebrate their 26th anniversary of the founding of Commonwealth status within the United States. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Puerto Ricans everywhere on this Constitution Day for their social and economic progress, growing prosperity, and well-earned reputation as a successful and workable form of self-government within the Federal structure of the United States.

On this date in 1952, the Governor of Puerto Rico proclaimed the establishment of the constitution, which describes the Commonwealth as "a permanent union between the United States and Puerto Rico on the basis of common citizenship, common currency, free market, and a common loyalty to the value of democracy."

The Commonwealth was established after Congress adopted the Puerto Rican Federal Relations Act in 1952, which changed the status of Puerto Rico from that of an unincorporated territory to a Commonwealth freely governing itself and associated with the United States.

It is an important celebration, not only for the Puerto Ricans, but also for the history of the United States. The Commonwealth Day celebration not only recalls the birth of the Puerto Rican Commonwealth, but it also salutes the Puerto Rican leaders and the Congress who formulated this unique relationship between the United States and the island.

With the help of the great political figure and founder of the Commonwealth, Luis Munoz Marin, and Gov. Rafael Hernandez Colon, who continued the statesmanlike tradition of Luis Munoz Marin, Puerto Rico has maintained strong mutual interests with the United States. Governor Colon, on recent visit to Washington, D.C., commented that we have a common commitment to individual freedom and to the tradition of democratic, representative government. We share a common concern for the economic growth and political development of the Caribbean region. Above all, we are bound together by the ties of common citizenship we enjoy.

Citizens of Puerto Rican heritage have played an important role in America's progress, and, at the same time, have maintained their own identity. Today Puerto Ricans can be found in every walk of life. In business, education, science, commerce, and at all levels of government, we find Puerto Ricans are good leaders. As a nation of immigrants, the United States takes great pride in its commitment to uphold the rights of all peoples who aspire to freedom and greater opportunity.

Under the 1950 law, Puerto Ricans enjoy the rights of American citizenship, except that they do not pay Federal taxes or vote in Federal elections. Puerto Rico has a delegate in Congress who, although he has no vote on the floor, may vote in committee and propose legislation. Puerto Ricans are free to migrate to the mainland United States and establish residence, thereby gaining voting rights.

This successful experiment today is celebrated by Commonwealth Day, which reflects opening new vistas of freedom, self-identity, and interdependence. It does so in a world desperately in need of new political structures, approaches, and initiatives that may render possible the preservation of eternal values in the face of continuous change. In commemorating this event, I acknowledge the contributions Americans of Puerto Rican descent have made to the cultural diversity and growth of American society.

Mr. Speaker, I would like my colleagues to join with me in extending to the peoples of Puerto Rico on this 26th anniversary our best wishes.●

BAYOU BODCAU PROJECT REMAINS A POOR INVESTMENT DESPITE REEVALUATION

HON. ROBERT W. EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, on June 15, the full House defeated my amendment to delete funding for eight water resource projects from the Public Works-Energy Research appropriations bill. During consideration of my amendment, it was pointed out that there had been a reevaluation of the economic benefits of one of these projects, the Bayou Bodcau project in Louisiana.

A White House-prepared fact sheet on this project documented that 60 landowners would benefit from the $15.5 million project, a Federal investment of $240,000 for each landowner after taking into account a local funding share. A reevaluation turned up 150 farms which would benefit by the project.

As the following exchange of letters indicates, this project remains economically unjustifiable despite the reevaluation of economic benefit. Also, the increase in economic benefit fails to overcome adverse environmental impact:

JUNE 13, 1978.

Hon. ROBERT W. EDGAR,
House of Representatives,

DEAR MR. EDGAR: The purpose of this letter is to provide Department of the Army views on five Civil Works projects of the Army Corps of Engineers for which resumption of construction funding in FY 1979 has been recommended by the House Appropriations Committee. The five projects at issue are: Yatesville Lake, Kentucky; La Farge Lake, Wisconsin; Lukfata Lake, Oklahoma; Bayou Bodcau and Tributaries, Louisiana; and Meramec Park Lake, Missouri. The economic, environmental resources. Indeed, three of these projects were analyzed in great detail as part of the Presidentially-directed Departmental review of ongoing water resource projects in the spring of 1977. The Corps of Engineers subscribed to the criteria which were used in the evaluation. Subsequent to completion of this review, Congress and the President agreed last year to not continue construction funding for these five projects.

None of these projects, in the view of the Department, has economic benefits which outweigh its adverse impact on the nation's environmental resources. Indeed, three of them—La Farge Lake, Lukfata Lake and Meramec Park Lake—would have specific adverse effects on the habitat of endangered plant or animal species. These three reservoirs, along with Yatesville Lake, would inundate thousands of acres. Much of this land is either prime farm land or land which contains important natural values. The remaining project, Bayou Bodcau and Tributaries, which consists of extensive levee and channel work, would adversely affect some 1560 acres of game and water-fowl habitat.

The Department of the Army believes that completion of these projects would not represent a good use of public funds and thus recommends that no FY 1979 construction funding be made available for these projects.

Sincerely,

CLIFFORD L. ALEXANDER, JR.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., June 28, 1978.

Hon. CLIFFORD L. ALEXANDER, JR.,
Secretary of the Army, The Pentagon,

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I appreciated receiving your letter to me of June 13th commenting on five authorized Corps of Engineers projects. You state that the "economic, environmental, and safety aspects of each of these projects were analyzed in great detail as part of the Presidentially-directed Departmental review of ongoing water resource projects in the spring of 1977."

During testimony today before the Senate Public Works Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, representatives of the Corps testified that the cost-benefit ratio for the Bayou Bodcau project had been reevaluated. Approximately 150 farms would benefit instead of the 60 or so previously identified.

I would like to know if this new information changes in any way the statement in your letter that "none of these projects, in the view of the Department, has economic benefits which outweigh its adverse impact on the nation's environmental resources."

Cordially,

ROBERT W. EDGAR.

JULY 14, 1978.

Hon. ROBERT W. EDGAR,
House of Representatives,

Dear Mr. EDGAR: Thank you for your June 28, 1978 letter to the Secretary of the Army regarding the Bayou Bodcau, Louisiana, Project. I am enclosing a copy of my June 21, 1978 memorandum to Kathy Fletcher which addresses the issue of limited beneficiaries.

In my memorandum I point out that with 150 farms benefitted by the project, the average subsidy per farm amounts to almost $100,000. Moreover, it is important to recognize that the magnitude of the economic benefits claimed for the project is not affected by the number of beneficiaries. Accordingly, the updated information on beneficiaries in no way affects the Department's view that the Bayou Bodcau Project does not have ". . . economic benefits which outweigh its adverse impact on the nation's environmental resources."

Sincerely,

MICHAEL BLUMENFELD,
Deputy Under Secretary.●

MORATORIUM ON SACCHARIN BAN RIGHT DECISION

HON. SAMUEL L. DEVINE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. DEVINE. Mr. Speaker, last year, much to the regret of Commissioner Kennedy of the Food and Drug Administration, as well as a number of other regulatory zealots, the Congress placed an 18-month moratorium of the ban on the use of saccharin. This was done in order to provide time for further study; to determine whether the rat tests in Canada were credible or inconclusive, and to prevent another premature regulatory edict affecting the lives of millions of Americans.

The Wall Street Journal of July 24, 1978 reported the findings in the journal of American Medicine, based on a Baltimore study of over 1,000 human patients. The article follows:

MODERATE USE OF SACCHARIN, CYCLAMATES UNLIKELY TO CAUSE CANCER, STUDY FINDS

(By Joann S. Lublin)

Ordinary amounts of artificial sweeteners such as saccharin and cyclamates don't appear to cause bladder cancer in humans, scientists reported in a study released today. The study is sure to fuel the long-simmering controversy over the safety of these sweeteners.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration banned cyclamates in 1970, after a study suggested they caused cancer in laboratory animals. Abbott Laboratories, a North Chicago, Ill., health-care products maker, has been fighting to get cyclamates back on the market since 1973. Abbott had been a major cyclamates producer. Last year, the FDA proposed a ban on saccharin after studies indicated that large amounts cause bladder tumors in rats.

Congress has postponed the ban for 18 months while further studies are made. In the meantime, saccharin-sweetened beverages, foods and other products carry a label warning of the possible health hazard.

STUDY OF 1,038 PATIENTS

"Neither saccharin nor cyclamate is likely to be carcinogenic in man, at least at the moderate dietary ingestion levels reported" by patients studied, concluded the latest report, which appears in this week's issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association. The conclusion was based on a Baltimore study of 1,038 patients, evenly divided between those with bladder cancer and those hospitalized for other reasons.

The study doesn't answer the question of whether there is any risk at all of developing bladder cancer from use of saccharin or cyclamates, conceded Dr. Irving I. Kessler, one of two authors, in an interview. Dr. Kessler is chairman of the University of Maryland School of Medicine's Department of Epidemiology and Preventive Medicine.

But regulators considering a ban an saccharin should consider "the totality of the evidence, the weight of the evidence and the biological consistency of their evidence before making their decision," he added.

Dr. Kessler also noted that if either cyclamates or saccharin did cause bladder cancer, then the bladder cancer patients should have used the sweeteners in greater amounts or for more years than the control group. "Almost always in human cancer, the risk of cancer . . . increases as the dose or length of exposure increases. We carefully analyzed that and could find no relation," he said. This was true, he added, even when such variables as age, sex, occupation, race and smoking habits were controlled.

For the study, Dr. Kessler and his colleagues extensively interviewed the patients about their use of artificial sweeteners in tablet, powder and drop form, as well as in diet beverages and foods. Patients reported how often, how much and how long they had consumed the substances.

CANADIAN FINDINGS DISAGREE

The JAMA article noted that these findings disagree with a recent Canadian investigation of hospitalized cancer patients. Researchers there concluded that bladder-cancer risks rose 60 percent among men who used saccharin tablets, but not among those who drank dietetic beverages or ate dietetic foods with saccharin. Women didn't seem to have similar increased risk.

Such conclusions don't make sense, the JAMA report suggested. "The divergence in relative risk between men and women observed in Canada would be extraordinary for human carcinogen . . . an equally puzzling, if not biologically inconsistent finding" was the lack of risk for men who consumed saccharin-containing drinks or foods, the report said.

The Calorie Control Council, an Atlanta-based group of diet-food manufacturers and others, praised the Baltimore study as support for its argument "that saccharin should remain available," a spokesman said. Noting that Congress has asked the National Academy of Sciences to investigate saccharin further, he added: "This (study) will be an important contribution to their assessment of saccharin's safety."

A recent FDA report also supports the council's viewpoint. Morris Crammer, director of the FDA's National Center for Toxicological Research, said in a report released earlier this month that health hazards posed by saccharin may be outweighed by its possible benefits.

While saccharin may, indeed, cause cancer—either directly or by "promoting" the effect of some other substance—"the cancer risk of the carbohydrates that saccharin replaces are several times greater than the cancer risk for saccharin," Mr. Cranmer asserted in his study.●

OAHE AUTHORIZATION NEEDED

HON. LARRY PRESSLER

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. Speaker, recently, I introduced a resolution in Congress calling for preservation of the existing Oahe authorization and expressing the sense of Congress that it would welcome modification to the Oahe plan.

It has been my strong belief that we should preserve the Oahe authorization, but make modifications and changes in it to make it more acceptable to our people. It cannot, of course, be acceptable to everybody, but the original Oahe plan had problems which many of our people objected to—particularly farm people along the area where the basic ditch would be dug. There were also problems with the land mitigation program and other parts of the project.

I know that this plan has been studied for years, and I know that many Members of Congress have faithfully supported it. I believe it is well worth preserving the authorization and making a major effort at coming up with a modification before we lose it.

Next March and April, we will be considering appropriations again. I am very excited about the possibility that the Governor, the legislature, the local boards, and the congressional delegation can come up with a major new plan by next March or April. I certainly am willing and eager to participate in that planning. I have been meeting with the different local boards, and I have been discussing possibilities. No one person will be able to do this, but I shall certainly continue to work and continue to assist.

A chief objection to any modification must be to get water to our eastern cities—such as Aberdeen, Redfield, Huron, and Mitchell. If we are unable to agree to commence with a canal, it has been suggested that the possible use of one or two large pipelines alongside railroad rights-of-way that run from the Missouri River eastward and westward; the possibility of using the existing pumping plant at Blunt to fill the canal to Medicine Creek, and from there transferring into one or two large pipelines running alongside the railroad right-of-way to Huron; of modifying the land mitigation program; of a Lower James addition; of canalside and alongside the Missouri irrigation; and other possible modifications—all these are needed in our State and probably could be done within the existing authorization or with slight variations in that authorization. I am sure that there are other possible modifications, and I would like to have them suggested. But, by next March or April, we must have an acceptable plan.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I insert a copy of the resolution I have introduced:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of Congress—

(1) that the Oahe unit, James division, Missouri River Basin project, South Dakota, is a worthwhile project but the authorized plan is in need of modifications;

(2) that Congress welcomes a modification plan from the State of South Dakota;

(3) that, although certain modifications of such project are desirable to facilitate the future development of such project, the authorization of such project under the Act entitled "An Act authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes", approved December 22, 1944 (58 Stat. 887), as modified by the Act entitled "An Act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the initial stage of the Oahe unit, James division, Missouri River Basin project, South Dakota, and for other purposes", approved August 3, 1968 (82 Stat. 624), should remain in effect.●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. BARBER B. CONABLE, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 18, 1978

● Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, in our observation of Captive Nations Week it is important to let the world know that America still cares about the fate of human liberty throughout the world. We must let the world know that the ideals of liberty and respect for the principle of national self-determination are still as strong in the United States as ever. The desire to enjoy the blessings of liberty is embodied in the American dream and it is a dream that we want all peoples to be able to share in.

I want to join with my colleagues in expressing continuing concern for the peoples who are seeking mastery of their fates, free from the yoke of foreign domination. As Americans we seek universal respect for the principles of human rights, as embodied in the Helsinki Declaration so that all may enjoy the basic human freedoms.●

REOPENING INQUIRY INTO MURDER OF VIOLA LIUZZO

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, on March 25, 1965, Viola Liuzzo, a mother of five children and a civil rights activist, was shot to death while driving between Selma and Montgomery, Ala., after participating in a civil rights march. Her assailants pursued her for approximately 20 miles on highway 80. One of the occupants of the vehicle from which the fatal shot was fired was Gary Thomas Rowe, who at the time was an employee of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and allegedly an undercover agent in the Ku Klux Klan.

Rowe's testimony after the murder worked to convict three Klansmen of conspiring to violate Mrs. Liuzzo's civil rights. In court he maintained that while traveling in the car, he only pretended to shoot at Mrs. Liuzzo, but that the actual shooting was done by the others. Not until a 1975 hearing before the Senate Select Committee To Study Government Intelligence Operations did it become known that Rowe worked for the FBI and was communicating with them concerning his activities. Two years later, a reopened Alabama investigation into the 1963 bombing which killed four children in a Birmingham church disclosed that Rowe, while employed by the FBI, engaged in numerous violent activities, which the FBI had knowledge of.

The Justice Department has recently undertaken an investigation of Rowe's relationship to the FBI. This and other investigations will be necessary to answer a great many questions that go to the heart of the corruption and lawlessness which the FBI was a party to during the ferment of the 1960's. Whether undercover agents, recruited by the FBI to monitor Klan activity, operated as agents provocateur; whether the FBI had information that such employees engaged in violence against civil rights activists; whether the FBI instructed such employees to conceal such information from official investigatory bodies and itself covered up the information; and, if the FBI had knowledge of violence against civil rights activists, why it did nothing to avert it. Gary Thomas Rowe's responsibility in the murder of Viola Liuzzo has yet to be disclosed.

It is a sad commentary on the Justice Department and the FBI that it had to be prodded into action after numerous journalistic investigations and news reports disclosed evidence of a pattern of wrongdoing on the part of the FBI. One of the news reports that has led to Justice Department action appeared in the New York Times on July 17. The article, "Inquiries Link Informer for FBI to Major Klan Terrorism in the 1960's," written by Howell Raines, follows:

[From the New York Times, July 17, 1978]

INQUIRIES LINK INFORMER FOR F.B.I. TO MAJOR KLAN TERRORISM IN THE 1960'S

(By Howell Raines)

ATLANTA, July 16.—Renewed investigations into the activities of Gary Thomas Rowe, Jr., the Federal Bureau of Investigation's chief paid informer in the Ku Klux Klan, have produced a portrait of Mr. Rowe as a man who "loved violence" and who could be linked to most major incidents of Klan terrorism that occurred in Alabama while he was on the bureau's payroll.

While receiving F.B.I. money, Mr. Rowe, by his own account, was directly involved in racial violence beginning with the assault on the Freedom Riders in Birmingham, Ala., in 1961 and extending to the shooting of Viola G. Liuzzo, a participant in the Selma-to-Montgomery march in 1965.

Federal pay records introduced in a trial at which Mr. Rowe testified 13 years ago showed that the bureau paid him over $12,000 from 1960 to 1965 for undercover activities that are now the subject of a Justice Department inquiry. He has also said that the F.B.I. gave him $10,000 more to finance his relocation under a new name.

The Justice Department's formal inquiry will seek to determine if Mr. Rowe, who has made many conflicting statements about his activities while on the F.B.I. payroll, functioned as an agent provocateur in the Klan, helping to plan and carry out the violence he was paid to monitor.

The inquiry was ordered last week following reports in The New York Times that the Alabama authorities, in their renewed investigation of the racial killings of the 1960's, had found information linking Mr. Rowe to the 1963 bombing that killed four black children at the 16th Street Baptist Church in Birmingham.

The Times also reported that Alabama investigative files showed that he told a state investigator that he killed a black man in a race riot in Birmingham in 1963 and was told to keep quiet about it by his F.B.I. "control" agent. The agent has denied the charge.

The Justice Department inquiry, ordered at the request of two members of the Senate committee that is drafting a new legislative charter for the F.B.I., will also seek to determine if agents in Alabama condoned and helped cover up violence by Mr. Rowe.

Investigators for both the State of Alabama and the Birmingham Police Department have concluded that Mr. Rowe probably helped provoke violent acts by other Klansmen.

"Rowe was a guy who loved violence," said a detective who interrogated him for more than six hours last fall.

QUESTION OF CONDONING

But city and state investigators are at odds over whether the F.B.I. condoned such behavior. Birmingham detectives take the harsher view of the Federal role, perhaps because of Mr. Rowe's allegations that the Birmingham Police Department had many Klan sympathizers in its ranks.

"The files are full of people telling the F.B.I., 'Check Rowe, check Rowe, check Rowe,'" said a detective who has seen some bureau field reports on Mr. Rowe's activitis. "But I've never seen anything in the files showing that they checked him."

Such disputes aside, it is possible at this point to draw together accounts of Mr. Rowe's financial dealings with the bureau and of his activities in the Klan, which he joined in 1960, apparently at the urging of the F.B.I.

Sources for these accounts include previously ignored court documents, his public and preliminary testimony to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence Operations in 1975, his book about his adventures in the Klan and, most importantly, information developed in the recent investigations by Birmingham and Alabama authorities.

In the trial of the Liuzzo case in 1965, the F.B.I. confirmed that it had paid Mr. Rowe $6,971.50 for information and $5,404.27 for expenses over a five-year period.

$10,000 REPORTED DELIVERED

He has also told a Senate investigator that Federal agents promised him an additional $30,000 to $50,000, but actually delivered only $10,000 in cash after he testified against the three Birmingham Klansmen accused of killing Mrs. Liuzzo.

In a statement to a lawyer for the Senate intelligence committee, he said that an F.B.I. agent had told him that the $10,000 was being paid on behalf of J. Edgar Hoover, then the bureau director. He said that the agent said the money reflected Mr. Hoover's view that Mr. Rowe was the best undercover agent "we've ever seen."

Mr. Rowe's statement about receiving $10,000 could not be confirmed or denied immediately by the F.B.I., nor did it rule out the possibility that the money could have come from other sources in the Government.

James L. McGovern, the former agent said by Mr. Rowe to have mentioned the $30,000 to $50,000 figure, said yesterday that he did discuss "relocation" money with Mr. Rowe, but never in such large amounts.

PAYMENTS USUALLY LOWER

Mr. McGovern said such payments usually were "considerably lower" than the figures used by Mr. Rowe. However, the bureau is reported to have paid $25,000 to the informer who led agents to the graves of three civil rights workers murdered in Mississippi in 1964.

Neither Mr. Rowe, who lives at an undisclosed location uder a new identity assumed with the help of the F.B.I., nor his attorney could be reached to comment on payments to him or on the racial incidents in which he was involved.

The first major incident of racial violence to which Mr. Rowe has been linked was the Mother's Day beating of Freedom Riders at two Birmingham bus stations on May 15, 1961, about a year after he joined the Klan. He has told a Senate investigator that a photograph showing him beating a black bus passenger led to the first effort by Federal agents to cover up his violent activity, according to a document of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

He asserted that his control agent instructed him that even if Mr. Hoover asked whether he was the man in the picture, "You're going to look at him, straight in the eye, and say 'No, sir, that's not me.'"

FOUND HIM RELIABLE MEMBER

A former Klansman who was with him that day said in an interview recently that Mr. Rowe's behavior at the bus station established him in the Klan as a reliable and "true-blue" member of the Klan "action squads." The former Klansman, who asked not to be named, said Mr. Rowe personally directed the white mob to shift from the Greyhound to the Trailways station to intercept the first busload of civil rights activists.

"I can hear him now, saying, 'Come on, come on, we're going to be late. They're going to be there before we get there,'" said the former Klansman. "He was the commando. That's how he got those other boys to follow him."

In his book and Senate testimony, Mr. Rowe claimed an active role in the Freedom Rider incident as liaison between the Klan and the Birmingham police in devising a plan whereby Klansmen would be allowed ample time to beat the Freedom Riders before the police moved in.

Among the other incidents to which Mr. Rowe has been linked are the following:

The transporting of guns to Tuscaloosa, Ala., in June 1963, when Gov. George C. Wallace was preparing to make his "stand in the schoolhouse door" at the University of Alabama. Mr. Rowe, who had then been on the F.B.I. payroll for over three years, was arrested along with several Klansmen later identified by Alabama law enforcement sources as suspects in racial bombings.

The fire-bombing of the home of A. G. Gaston, a black millionaire. In interviews with Alabama authorities and in his book, "My Undercover Years With the Ku Klux Klan," Mr. Rowe told in detail about an unsuccessful foray he and other Klansmen made against the Gaston residence. Investigative documents show, however, that he failed a lie-detector test in which he denied involvement in a fire-bombing that "actually damaged" the Gaston home.

The bombing of the 16th Street Baptist Church on Sept. 15, 1963. In reopening the investigation into the deaths of four children there, the Alabama authorities reached Mr. Rowe in the hope that he could help them. But investigative files show that he failed a polygraph test about his own involvement in the incident. As a result, key investigators said that he was suspected of having been with Robert E. Chambliss, the 74-year-old Klansman convicted of murder in the case last November.

A double bombing in a black neighborhood on Sept. 25, 1963. The investigative files show that Mr. Rowe also failed a lie-detector test in which he denied direct involvement in planting these bombs, the second of which contained shrapnel. It was apparently intended to maim spectators drawn to the area by the first explosion. Investigative records indicate that Mr. Rowe was spotted by the Birmingham police in a telephone booth four blocks away at the time of the twin explosions.

The 1965 shooting of Mrs. Liuzzo on Highway 80 between Montgomery and Selma. Mr. Rowe's testimony helped convict three Klansmen of conspiring to violate Mrs. Liuzzo's civil rights by killing her on the night after the march. In court, he testified that he was in the car that chased Mrs. Liuzzo's automobile. He said he only pretended to shoot at her, however, leaving the killing to his companions.

STATEMENTS TO POLICE CITED

Investigative files in Alabama contain statements from police officers who contended that Mr. Rowe had made incriminating statements about his own involvement in that killing. And ABC Television recently broadcast a polygraph test that indicated that he gave deceptive answers when he denied a role in the killing.

A Senate intelligence committee document that came to light last week added still another confusing footnote to the Liuzzo case.

In 1975, Mr. Rowe told a committee lawyer that a black man was killed along with Mrs. Liuzzo and that government lawyers, including John Doar, then the Deputy Attorney General, forced Mr. Rowe to mold his testimony to fit the case the Government wanted to present.

Yesterday, Mr. McGovern confirmed one aspect of Mr. Rowe's account of his feud with Mr. Doar. Mr. McGovern said he recalled hearing that Mr. Rowe did tell investigators that Leroy Motan, a key prosecution witness, was not the black man Mr. Rowe saw in the car with Mrs. Liuzzo. According to the Senate document, Mr. Rowe said that Mr. Doar forced him to keep quiet about his misgivings about Mr. Motan's identity. Mr. Doar, reached at his law office in New York Thursday, refused to comment on Mr. Rowe's allegations.

MAY BE ATTEMPT AT IMMUNITY

Mr. Rowe's description of shooting a black man in 1963 came to light unexpectedly while he was being questioned last fall about the church bombing. Alabama investigators' files contained speculation that he might have brought up a previously undisclosed shooting in an effort to win immunity for all capital offenses, should he agree to return to Alabama to testify in the church bombing case.

Birmingham detectives have since found reports that Mr. Rowe boasted to a fellow Klansman and another man in 1963 that he had shot rioting blacks. A Birmingham police officer has also recalled seeing Mr. Rowe in a riot zone with a pistol tucked in his belt. However, city investigators have not yet found a specific unsolved killing that fits the circumstances described by Mr. Rowe.

Investigative sources indicated that it was possible that a racial killing in Birmingham in 1963 could have gone unrecorded or have been covered up in some other way.

In his public testimony before the intelligence committee in 1975, Mr. Rowe insisted that the F.B.I. had approved his participation in violence. The bureau gave the committee a memo of April 1964 in which Mr. Rowe was ordered to give up leadership of a Klan "action squad."

"Nevertheless," the committee's final report stated, "even those instructions did not extend to ruling out Rowe's participation in violence, but rather only leading or directing violent acts. The essential characteristic of Rowe's status was expressed by the following testimony of his F.B.I. handling agent: If he happened to be with some Klansmen and they decided to do something, he couldn't be an angel and be a good informant." ●

MISSING IN ACTION: LINGERING DOUBTS

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, the stories of live sightings continue. On the horizons, appear, now and then, small glimmers of light against the black night of despair. For far too many mothers and fathers, brothers and sisters, friends and relatives, the agony of the Vietnam war continues. They do not know. They do not know whether their brothers and sons are still alive. This awful uncertainty gnaws at them day and night.

I know it will be objected from several quarters that these sightings and reports of American prisoners living in Southeast Asia are nothing more than the normal aftermath of an emotionally trying war. I know that there are some who firmly believe that no American is, or can be, living in Southeast Asia under the guard of Communist authorities. But can anyone in the administration say—with absolute moral certainty—that these Americans are dead; that they do not exist; that these live sightings of U.S. personnel are a hoax? Of course, not.

Mr. Speaker, the fact remains. We do not know. Therefore, every effort should be made by the Defense Intelligence Agency, among others, to investigate each and every case of a "live sighting." There ought to be no hesitation on this matter. Investigations should include, at the very least, the employment of the most sophisticated polygraph equipment available, accompanied by the most thorough expert cross-examination and analysis.

The most recent case is the report of a Vietnamese refugee, Mr. Ngo Phi Hung, who claimed to see 49 American POW's in jails after the Vietnam war had ended. Mr. Hung said other sources indicated to him that anywhere from 200 to 250 other Americans were still being held captive. I ask that every Member of this House give the articles by Mr. Jack Anderson of the Washington Post and Mr. Roger Showley of the San Diego Union, of July 16, his or her undivided attention:

[From the San Diego Union, July 16, 1978]

BUSINESSMAN LOSES NAME LIST—AMERICANS REPORTED IN VIET PRISONS

(By Roger Showley)

A 48-year-old Vietnamese businessman, who arrived in the United States within the past two weeks, claimed yesterday to have seen forty-nine American prisoners held in Vietnamese jails after the Vietnam war ended.

Ngo Phi Hung, who has just rented a house here for himself, his wife and 11 children, told the annual meeting of the National League of Families of American Prisoners and Missing in Southeast Asia that three of the men died during the time he had access to the prisons from May 1975 to April 1977.

Speaking through an interpreter, Hung said he compiled a list of names of the prisoners but lost it to pirates as he was fleeing to Thailand this past February.

However, league officials said the list could have been copied by members of the underground resistance movement in Vietnam. They said they hope to obtain the names so they can be released.

Hung's account had not been given to U.S. government officials prior to yesterday's disclosure before 300 league delegates meeting at the U.S. Grant Hotel.

Frank Sieverts, representing the State Department at the meeting, promised to interview Hung and determine if the story is correct.

"I think we will follow up on this information and we are glad to have it brought to our attention here," Sieverts told the audience, some of whom booed Sieverts because of reports that government officials have failed to interview all Vietnamese refugees about Americans who may still be in Vietnamese prisons.

The Vietnamese government has consistently denied that any more Americans are being held or that there is any more information about persons who were killed or missing in action during the Vietnam war.

Hung said he saw an advertisement in a weekly news magazine aimed at Southeast Asia refugees asking for information about Americans still in Vietnam. The ad was placed by Le Dhi Anh, a resident in the United States since 1964 who acts as a liaison between refugee groups and organizations seeking information about POWs and MIAs.

Anh, who lives in Cheverly, Md., a suburb of Washington, flew to San Diego Friday and interviewed Hung for 6½ hours along with officials of the National League of Families, which will conclude its ninth annual meeting today. Hung had written out as much as he could remember and Anh said she was in the process of translating his account into English.

Hung said that after the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong took control of South Vietnam April 30, 1975, he volunteered to continue operating a 100-unit truck transfer service, which included periodic visits to jails.

Hung said he first saw Americans in Vietnamese jails at the end of May 1975. He said he was participating in the interdenominational resistance movements and was passing information to that group's leaders.

During the nearly two years he tracked the prisoners, Hung told the audience, he learned through the prison warden that three of the 49 men were civilians, three officers had died—two by suicide and one from illness—and six were in very poor health.

"The treatment was not harsh. It was nice," Hung said, as translated at the podium by Anh.

During a lengthy question-and-answer session with reporters and delegates, Hung was asked why the men were still being held.

"I didn't dare ask (the prison warden) and he never told me," Hung replied. "If I ever hinted at that, I would never have been able to set foot in the compound again. But other officials I talked to said, 'We're keeping the prisoners in exchange for aid for reconstruction, because the United States agreed to give us $2 billion.' I think it was difficult for them to admit they were keeping the men alive."

Hung was referring to a post-war claim by the new Vietnamese government that then-President Richard Nixon had agreed to give $2 billion in aid once the war was over and POWs had been exchanged and MIAs had been accounted for.

The U.S. has so far refused to grant any aid, claiming that the accounting of POWs and men missing in action has been unsatisfactory.

Hung said the prisoners were held in five different prisons, including the former headquarters of the U.S. Agency for International Development in Saigon.

Hung escaped on a fishing boat to Thailand with his family and moved to San Diego because a nephew lives here.

Anh said Hung was a wealthy businessman in Saigon and lost all his possessions when he escaped—including a briefcase with 175 ounces of gold and the list of the 49 prisoners.

In response to another question, Hung said he gathers from other sources that there are between 200 and 250 Americans still being held captive.

Before Hung spoke, Rep. Bob Wilson, R-San Diego, addressed the gathering. He urged that President Carter pressure Vietnam through the United Nations to reveal what it knows about American prisoners.

"It is the obligation of the Congress—and its responsibility—to state the demand again and again that an accounting must be forthcoming," said Wilson, the ranking Republican member of the House Armed Services Committee. "This final accounting will never be gotten until the U.S. government, as personified by our American diplomatic delegation to the U.N., decides to put severe political and economic pressure on the Vietnam Communist regime.

"We have a duty to our missing servicemen, to their families and to the nation as a whole not to allow them to be used as pawns in a brutal game of diplomacy."

THOSE REPORTS OF MIA'S

(By Jack Anderson)

On May 2, 1975, the fleeting shadow of a sampan slipped through the marshy Vietnamese waterways. It scooted up one of the myriad tributaries past the village of Xeo Ro. Huddled in the back of the boat were two Americans—a gaunt white man and a huskier black man—with their hands lashed behind their backs. Curious villagers hurried to a dock to stare.

Five months later, two other emaciated Americans were seen in the same vicinity. Both were white, both "very thin." Reported a witness: "They lay in a motorized sampan. Their heads were shaven like monks'. Their wrists were tied with ropes behind their backs."

Similar haunting reports—here, two scraggly Americans begging for cigarettes, there, a scrawny white man with a faraway stare—have been brought to us. The stories can't be verified, but neither can they be disproved. They linger as an ugly memory of a war America would like to forget.

The fate of 697 Americans, missing in action, still nags the Pentagon, which is trying to close the books on the Vietnam War. Many of those men were definitely alive in communist prison camps. They were seen by comrades or spotted in photographs. But where are they now? No one has explained what happened to them.

To find out, President Carter established the Woodcock commission in February 1977. Its members traveled to Vietnam to take up the case histories of the MIAs with the Vietnamese. After a painstaking review, the commission concluded: "For reasons of terrain, climate, circumstances and passage of time, it is probable that no accounting will ever be possible for most of the Americans lost."

A House select committee conducted its own separate investigation of the missing Americans. Chairman G. V. Montgomery (D-Miss.) told us sadly: "I wish it weren't true, but I know no Americans are still alive."

Yet whispered reports continue to drift out of Vietnam. They are brought out by refugees who furnish tantalizing fragments of information that often seem authentic. Three of the 10 members of the House Committee refused to accept the conclusion that no Americans would be found. Even Montgomery admitted to us: "It is conceivable we might make one or two mistakes. But this can't go on forever."

An unofficial delegate, who toured Indochina with the Woodcock commission, also disagreed with its findings. He is Dr. Roger Shields, the deputy assistant defense secretary in charge of MIA affairs from 1973 to 1976. He wrote a scathing letter to Defense Secretary Harold Brown, informing him, in effect, that "the Vietnamese sold us a bill of goods. I did not believe what I was told."

The State Department's MIA expert, Frank Sieverts, has dismissed most refugee sightings as inaccurate. Yet he acknowledged: "Of course, there is the possibility of collusion by Vietnam. We are ultimately at their mercy."

We have tried in vain to verify the refugee reports. W have carefully extracted details from letters that the refugees have written. Our reporter Josh Levin has questioned a dozen refugees directly. A Vietnamese woman in Cheverly, Md., placed an ad in a Vietnamese-language newspaper. She has received 12 responses, with details about MIAs. Some offered to provide more information if their identities and security could be protected.

But Sieverts is still skeptical. "Refugees often want to make a good impression on us," he said. "We can't deal with imagination in a subject as important as this."

The Defense Intelligence Agency has analyzed some of the refugee reports. It found the story of the two Americans with shaven heads "quite doubtful" and another account suspect because of the witness's "obvious desire to call attention to [a] request to be allowed entry into the United States."

But the DIA cancelled an interview with Trinh Hung, now living in Philadelphia, who told about seeing the shorn Americans. His written account was rejected because it mentioned that the pair were on their way into the U Minh forest. The DIA claimed that American prisoners in South Vietnam "were transferred north for detention," so Hung's story was "contrary to known events."

But we have received other accounts of prisoners being led into U Minh forest. According to one report, 15 cinderblock prison cells were located in this forest in the spring of 1975. Fifteen American soldiers, "probably officers," five black and 10 whites, were reportedly held there.

Nor do all the reports we have seen appear contrived to impress American authorities. Many of them, in fact, appear hauntingly legitimate. We have also interviewed several refugees who, contrary to official statements, were never questioned about MIAs by American officials.

It also seems as if the Pentagon is overeager to close the files on the MIAs. That was recommended, in fact, by the House select committee. The Pentagon's four service secretaries subsequently mulled over the folders of 286 MIAs. All of those reviewed have been reclassified "presumed dead."

The military brass may be correct to believe there is no hope of recovering any more MIAs alive. Certainly, the families of MIAs shouldn't have their hopes raised unwarrantedly.

But the Pentagon should not close the files on those men prematurely. There are still reports that haven't been analyzed. The generals, who were so willing to send young men to fight in Vietnam, owe it to them to wait until the last possible minute before pronouncing them dead and forgotten.●

ARIAS' RETURN—II

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, on July 20, 1978, I inserted the first portion of an address by former President Arnulfo Arias to the people of Panama. It was an emotional occasion for the Panamanian people, for it was the first time they had a chance to hear this leader since his enforced exile 10 years ago.

It has been said that the dictator Torriios has been loosening up his domestic control over the political life of the Panamanian people. I sincerely hope that this recent "thaw" in Panama's political life is long term, and not simply a set of tactical maneuvers on the part of the dictatorship to divert the attention of the world away from the true character of the regime. I sincerely hope that the absence of intense repression is not a quiet prelude to another round of Torrijos police-state crackdowns. We will see.

In the meantime, I offer to my colleagues the second portion of former President Arias' speech. It is a document to be pondered by this Congress and historians concerned with the future, as well as the past, of our great canal in Panama:

ARIAS' SPEECH

Be patient. [shouts in background] We remind the Panamanian public that several important articles on implementing the treaty still have to be approved and that the treaty is not yet finished. [shouts, applause] These articles on implementation are required for the treaties to enter into effect. It is necessary to refer to a reservation to the text of the treaties proposed by Senator Edward Brooke, which specifies that the articles for the ratification of the treaties must be drafted [hacerse] after 31 March 1979 and that this deadline may be extended until 31 October 1979, that is, until next year. [shouts, whistles]

In the House of Representatives there is also a resolution presented by Representative George Hansen, which establishes that no property within the Canal Zone may be transferred until both U.S. congressional chambers, that is, the Senate and the House of Representatives, have approved such a transfer. [shouts, applause]

Those who go around proclaiming a short-range economic orgy to be derived from the canal are wrong. It is high time we Panamanians dedicated ourselves to work, and develop our own country in order to depend more on our own efforts and less on the rivers of gold flowing from the Canal Zone. Our privileged geographic position [applause, shouts] should contribute to the integrated development of our nation's fertile territory, from Darien to Chiriqui.

This afternoon, the Panamanian people are showing that they continue to be loyal to a deeply felt and deep-rooted ideal. The desire for important and undelayable moral, social and economic achievements is linked to this ideal.

In this welcome today there is a reaffirmation of patriotic principles and an evidence of our indomitable faith in our redeeming efforts, in which all Panamanians, regardless of race or class have joined. [applause, shouts]

The struggle against the merchant policeman currently infesting the fatherland's temple with his [word indistinct] has begun and the challenge is there for all to see. This great movement for the reestablishment of democracy in Panama and the forgotten masses' desperate cry for redemption will find in Panamenism and our call for national unity the only hope for the country's renewal. [applause]

In these historic efforts, we are accompanied by the Republican Party, Christian Democracy [applause] and the new Social Democratic Party. We are also accompanied by the old members of Communal Action, Democratic Action and the Third Nationalist Party [applause, shouts, whistles] our friends from the patriotic coalition and the independent liberals. We are also very interested in the sincere adherence to this undeniable cause by the members of the National Liberal Party and the Agrarian Labor Party [shouts, applause]. We also have the enthusiastic participation of civic organizations, which have before them the edifying example of the movement of independent lawyers [applause, shouts, whistles], the national studies group and the new Democratic Independent Movement [applause]. Let me know if you are tired [repeated shouts of "no!" and "presidency!"]

The Panamenists have made an apostolate of their lives, an altar of their duties and a sacrifice aimed at the creation of a great, noble, free and just fatherland of the present.

Men and women, firm of heart and principles, old friends who have been tested in much remembered previous campaigns, and new members full of energy and firm determination are now swelling our ranks. All of them together, in a harmonious task force, are carrying out missions, endorsing goals, making decisions and disseminating our undying doctrine.

For this reason, as we have upheld our ideals and sought the unity of our followers, as have we maintained our enthusiasm for the worthiness of our cause and expanded the creed which has created confidence in the innermost hearts of Panamanians, we have never practiced deception, with illusory promises. For this reason, the voice of the people resounds in the galleries of the fatherland today. [applause, shouting]

Students and youths, instead of being taught the history of the fatherland and receiving guidance in line with their ancestors' principles of hard work and honesty, are being indoctrinated with communist lies. The poisonous [shouting] educational reform program is fulfilling its task of causing alienation. In educational terms, however, it is a total failure.

Today, more than ever, the young people here in Panama demand participation in keeping with the free and democratic ideals that they hold. They wish to be free of all venal ties, of all muzzling, and are prepared to play their legitimate role in these dangerously critical times we are experiencing, times they understand better than anyone because, in the final analysis, they will have to occupy the posts which we occupy today. [shouting]

Thanks to Almighty God, I studied in the best universities and I graduated as a surgeon from Harvard, where I learned to alleviate and cure the illnesses that afflict us. With budding intuition I felt it too was my duty to take an interest in the political and social evils that afflicted our underdeveloped people instead of devoting myself solely to malaria, typhoid, gonorrhea or syphilis. And for this reason, I have worked since 2 January 1931, not only trying to cure those illnesses, but also to remove tumors through surgical procedures.

However, to remove the cancer which corrodes our society, a contribution is necessary from all the inhabitants of our land—men, women, children, the elderly, adolescents, natives and foreigners. This is not a job solely for individuals or civic associations or political parties. It is a job for the entire nation, and it requires a common front against the dictatorship.

The call from our people, who were represented at the meeting in Hallandale, Florida, on 12 February of this year by several parties and civic associations, and the call from the leaders of the Panamenist Party issued in Miami on 6 May 1978, which I could not refuse, have convinced me of the need to unite the people, from Darien to Chiriqui, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, in order to correct the evils which afflict us now and in order to be able to participate in the great battle of Armageddon that began in the Middle East, is underway in Africa, and now threatens Nicaragua and El Salvador, and even us. Only God knows when it will end. I refer to the imminent world war.

The legitimate U.S. legislators of both chambers and President Carter himself, as the world champion of human rights, must be appalled to see that on the coasts of the isthmus the use of force and threats is increasing. This implies the existence of secret pacts with the bitter enemies of democracy, who, in bombing the canal in the future, will also be bombing thousands upon thousands of Panamanians in the neighboring cities of Panama: Colon, Arraijan, Chorrera, Pacora and Chepo. This is the near future that the bossman [mandamas] was predicting for us when he said that he would blow up the Panama Canal. [applause, shouting]

A few cheap political mercenaries are unable to sacrifice their positions and aspirations, and are confused by the voracious merchants who seek quick profits. The total renunciation of personal gain out of pure love for our land is difficult. The altruistic ideals and lack of pettiness that characterize the great majority of Panamanian political parties and Panamanian civic groups, united as brethren in a genuine national unity, is an eloquent and noble contrast to those who seek to legitimize a new electoral force that has as its purpose the perpetuation of the tyrannical and traitorous regime.

The inexorable force of the present situation in Panama is increasing the scrutinizing capacity of the Panamanian, who despises and repudiates electioneering politicians and the supreme traitor, who clings to his ill-gotten power. [applause, shouting]

Today, 11 June 1978, we announce to the people that we are back, [applause, shouting] without weapons or bullets [words indistinct]. Nor have we come with little soldiers in uniform to frighten you. [shouting and chanting: president, president] We have come with our souls and hearts filled with patriotism and love to occupy the place which you, our beloved people and the will of God have appointed for us [applause, shouting: president, president, president] to contribute with projects and institutions, as we did in 1941 and in our other truncated presidential terms. At those times we gave land, tools and seeds to the farmers, who received 45,000 titles to land. We have come to contribute with projects such as the social security institute, whose beneficiaries would live like paupers today if they had not paid their dues. We have contributed to Panama the security of its homes; we have contributed women's right to vote, which at least helps to check political abuses. We contributed with the law recognizing children born out of wedlock, trying to save them from the inferior status that still affects many of them. [shouting, applause] The provincial hospitals would still not be built if it had not been for the herosim of the community action boys. The Bridge of the Americas would still not be built if we had not had the support of the Panamanian people when we presented the 12 points to the United States.

In the construction of public buildings we did not give commissions or bribes. However, there have recently been many bribes in the commissions from loans of doubtful origin. [applause, shouting]

Yes, we have returned to you to promote education in kindergarten and vocational, drama, music and ballet schools; to promote the university in the four languages of our Americas; to improve hospitals with the best medical technology; to help shops and small factories, to insure that we benefit from what is produced in Panama and that banks give loans to men and women with creative ideas whose greatest guarantee will be their honesty and that these men and women will have capable technicians to guide them in their endeavors. [applause]

Yes, we have returned. [shouting, applause] We have returned to help our people strive for a better Panama through democratic methods and constitutional governments, in order to insure that Panama will never be the first Soviet colony on the American mainland. [shouting, applause] Remember that the communist fifth column is among us with the greatest budget in its history. [applause]

On 30 November 1940, during my first term, Jephta B. Duncan, an illustrious and venerable man, in the swearing in ceremony at the national university said the following: "Weapons by themselves are no longer sufficient to defend the sovereignty and territory of free peoples. People need an intelligent awareness of the needs and risks which expose them to the loss of their freedom or the crisis of the institutions which protect them. The defense of a nation is made stronger and more efficient when one knows what one is defending and when one is aware of the extraordinary importance for a society of the social, economic and political principles which make up the most important aspects of the system under which it operates." [applause, shouting]

This is not the time for personal ambitions, sectarian activities or petty politics. We need activities and movements that promote national unity. Civilians and military, merchants and industrialists, workers and government employees, clergy and civic leaders full of patriotism are needed to put an end to the institutional crisis and save our language, our religion and the traditions taught us by free men like Bolivar, San Martin, Washington, Marti, Juarez, Moraza, Duarte and our own Urraca and patriots like Justo Arosemena, Belisario Porras, Harmedio Arias and Juan Demostenes Arosemena.

We await the precise moment when St. Michael, the great archangel, will arrive with the great demolishing sword of justice in his hands to exterminate the evils which afflict Panama because of the unworthy conduct of its unworthy sons.

We are here, ready for dialog with anyone who is concerned about the fate of the great majorities and who honestly wishes to contribute to the reconstruction of the country and its genuine welfare. We are ready for action at all times, in conformity with the mandates of the fatherland. [applause, shouting]

During our 47 years of public life, we have desired no other title than that of servant of the fatherland and brother of the Panamanians. For this reason, we are here, prepared to sacrifice—as we have done on other occasions—our personal peace for the sake of defending the national interests which represent the sacred destiny of our fatherland. Thank you very much.●

LETTER FROM AN ECONOMIST WITH SOUND ADVICE

HON. DAVE STOCKMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. STOCKMAN. Mr. Speaker, Prof. George W. Trivoli, the chairman of the Department of Economics and Business Administration at Hillsdale College, recently published an "open letter" to President Carter that presents in succint terms the source of our current economic problems.

I would like to share Professor Trivoli's comments with the Members of this body because, although his comments were directed to the President, the Congress must share equal responsibility for misguided policies of constantly expanding deficits, costly regulations, and other inflationary forces.

Hillsdale College is one of the few institutions of higher learning in our country that is blessed with an economics department capable of perceiving that an expanded Federal Government is not the solution to every problem. If we were to follow Professor Trivoli's advice instead of the advice emanating from the advocates of big Government—whose policies produced our current problems—we could avoid entering another cycle of double-digit inflation and economic contraction.

[From the Lima (Ohio) News, Apr. 9, 1978]

ARE YOU LISTENING, MR. PRESIDENT?

An open letter to the President of the United States:

There are several important and urgent economic problems facing the nation. These are: (1) an acceleration in the already historically high inflation rates; (2) the continued impasse on energy policy; and (3) the precipitous decline of the dollar in foreign exchange markets. As a result of these and other problems, the general mood of business and investors seems to be negative as evidenced by the continual depressed state of the stock market and business investment.

The increased pace of inflation, which I contend is the root cause of most of the present problems, has been generated by the constant increases of federal spending throughout the present recovery since 1974–75. With the growth of federal spending proceeding at the pace in recent years of between 8 and 10 percent, the total size of the federal budget within 10 years will more than double the current projected $500 billion level. That would place the federal budget at $1 trillion or between 38 and 40 percent of nominal GNP, assuming continued economic growth of between 3 and 4 percent per year. Surely something must be done to stop runaway growth of federal spending, regulation and control of every aspect of American lives.

The evidence from the experience of other nations, as well as our own, clearly shows that as the size of the public sector grows, the private sector necessarily shrinks. A recent Wall Street Journal report indicated that as a percentage of GNP, government spending and taxes among major Western nations were the highest in the U.S., exceeded only by Great Britain.

The growth of federal spending has been matched by accelerating deficits throughout the present economic recovery, but the proposed administration budgets for fiscal 1978–79 call for back-to-back $60 billion–plus deficits. Continual budget deficits, as you are well aware, lead inevitably to large additions to our already horrendous national debt and also generate increased inflationary pressures. Since the combined refunded national debt plus the new budget deficit must be financed in the private capital market each year, private borrowing and business investment necessarily must bid for increasingly scarce savings.

In addition, the Federal Reserve is forced to support all new federal debt issues (adding last year almost $10 billion to its permanent holdings of federal debt). When the Fed buys Treasury debt, we have a simple process of monetization of the debt, which is purely inflationary. The growth of banking reserves upon which banks can create ever-increasing amounts of money and credit has been accelerating at a rate of 9 to 10 percent per year. Increased reserves to the banking system inevitably lead to inflation. Hence, it comes as no surprise that both wholesale and consumer prices now appear to be currently rising at near double digit rates.

The answer to accelerated inflation is not more restrictions and controls on American labor and business, since they simply are trying to keep pace with the inflation. The president must order immediate and decisive reductions in federal spending, amounting this year to between $25 and $50 billion.

Impossible you say. Between the beginning of 1975 and the end of 1976, more than $60 billion was added to the federal budget. Surely $25 to $50 bilion can be cut within a commensurate time.

Please don't ask me what programs to cut. Ask instead the bureaucrats running your agencies to justify what programs should remain, given the current crisis of gargantuan government.

Our domestic inflation, along with our nation's increased dependence upon foreign oil, has driven our balance of payments into an unprecedented deficit approaching $25 billion in 1977 and projected to be at least that level again in 1978. Foreign holders of U.S. dollars have become increasingly weary of this nation's inflationary policies and are becoming less willing to hold U.S. IOU's. The excess dollars in foreign exchange markets, with fewer demanders to purchase U.S. merchandise or financial assets, is the main cause of the dollar's decline in value vis-a-vis major world currencies.

Instead of prodding our allied and major trading partners such as West Germany and Japan to accelerate their domestic inflation rates, as administration officials have been doing in recent years, we should be taking drastic steps to reduce or eliminate our own inflation.

How can this be done? You, Mr. President, must take decisive action! No, not wage-price controls. We have seen an example of how effective they can be in the administration's inability to deal with the coal miners' union. By the way, wasn't it a bit short-sighted for the administration to advocate, and the House-Senate Energy Conference to suggest, increased dependence upon coal in production of energy during the coal negotiations? Surely the miners read that as a signal to gain as much as they possibly can from this contract.

Which brings us to what appears to be left of the administration's original energy proposal. It has become apparent to you, as it has to most Americans evidenced by the dealock in the House-Senate conference, that the original plan was ill-conceived. What the U.S. energy industry needs is disintervention by the federal government in the case of petroleum and deregulation by the Federal Power Commission for the natural gas industry.

The evidence is overwhelming (much of it supplied by ERDA, now part of the vast new Energy Department bureaucracy) that there is plenty of petroleum and natural gas right here in the U.S. With the world price of petroleum at about $14 per barrel, do you really think it pays domestic producers to go to the expense of enhancement of existing wells—in which as much as 60 to 75 percent of the oil still remains in the ground—to sell it at the government regulated price of between $5 and $9 per barrel? A former peanut grower should know better than that!

Under the regulation of the Federal Energy Administration, our current energy program has the effect of a direct transfer from domestic oil producers and refiners to foreign oil refiners in order to enforce a lower petroleum price in the U.S.—discouraging domestic production and encouraging domestic consumption—while our nation's dependence on OPEC supplied oil increases.

If all Americans knew that since 1974 U.S. oil producers and refiners were being taxed so as to subsidize the importation and refining of OPEC oil, what do you think they would say? As you know, this is precisely what the FEA policy has accomplished. Adding yet another tax on domestic oil producers, as your proposed crude oil tax would do, is hardly the way to solve our domestic petroleum crisis.

An immediate elimination of price ceilings on U.S. petroleum—the only remnant of the Nixon era price controls—accompanied with a temporary quota on OPEC imported oil, would cause several important actions. Our domestic petroleum industry would be immediately revitalized; the slightly higher price of petroleum products would cause Americans to conserve in their consumption. But the price of oil would not rise to the OPEC level. The OPEC cartel, already facing the prospect of tremendous excess oil reserves, would be forced to break the world price of oil or face the prospect of widespread cheating among cartel member nations seeking to maintain sales.

Space limits a consideration of the natural gas problem, except to say that under the FPC gas prices have been controlled at such a low level that in real purchasing power terms, natural gas is cheaper than in the early 1950's. Only a few lucky Americans are still able to get natural gas because at the lower regulated price there are no longer incentives to search for and produce new gas. Yet natural gas is potentially our most abundant, cleanest fuel. Moreover, it is a major feedstock for our vast petrochemical business.

Surely, you don't wish to be remembered as the president who administered policies that resulted in the total collapse of the dollar in international markets, runaway inflation and total wage-price controls, with commensurate loss of freedom and the destruction of our domestic petroleum and gas industries (to be taken over by whom, our new Department of Energy?).

Please forgive me for such stark revelations, but someone had to tell the emperor that his underwear is showing!

Respectfully,

GEORGE W. TRIVOLI, Ph.D.,

DEEP SEABED APPLICANTS SHOULD HAVE WORK PLAN

HON. PAUL N. McCLOSKEY, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow during consideration of H.R. 12988, I intend to offer a series of amendments which will require that an applicant for a license or permit submit a "work plan" along with his application.

I am offering these amendments to remedy a particularly undesirable aspect of the bill, as presently drafted. This is the language which would appear to claim sovereign rights by the United States over a specific area of the seabed.

Under international law we can claim access to seabed minerals, but there is no basis for claiming jurisdiction over the seabed itself. While this may be argued to be a mere legal distinction, the issue is a very real one in the minds of other nations.

As Ambassador Elliot Richardson pointed out:

> I think it is important . . . to get across as clearly as possible that the United States is not purporting to establish a claim of sovereignty over a portion of the seabed. If that impression were to be created, no matter how slight a foundation, it could trigger comparable claims by other countries. And, we could end up seeing the whole seabed carved up among competing national claims in the way the continent of Africa was once carved up.

The work plan mechanism avoids an assertion of jurisdiction by the United States over a specific area of the seabed. As stated by Secretary of Commerce Kreps before the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, a work plan will make it clear that:

> Neither the United States nor the miner would have any territorial or property right in an area. U.S. jurisdiction would be purely in person, that is, over the licensee, not the area subject to the license.

In addition to the international law protection, the work plan mechanism supports strong environmental protections and facilitates the administration of the bill.

The environmental policy center lists the incorporation of a work plan as a "key amendment which must be included in final passage of the bill if Congress is going to pass a strong ocean mining bill."

The administration also supports the inclusion of a work plan amendment stating that it is the "centerpiece of the management plan" and that the diligence requirement in the work plan is "critical and provides the Secretary the necessary authority to insure that the exploration and development plan proposed by the applicant and approved by the Secretary will be carried out in a reasonable manner."

The majority of the amendments are technical and bring the language of the bill in conformity with the establishment of the work plan.

The key amendment is as follows:

On page 14, after "applications." add "Each application shall contain a work plan describing—(A) the location of the area of the seabed proposed to be explored or where commercial recovery activities will be conducted;

"(B) a schedule of exploration or commercial recovery activities, and a description of the system to be employed, such information to be used by the Secretary in determining whether the applicant is carrying out such activities with due diligence;

"(C) a schedule of expenditures for exploration or commercial recovery activities; and,

"(D) proposed measures to protect the environment and to monitor the environmental impact of the operations.".

The remaining amendments are as follows:

On page 9, at line 22, delete "with respect" and insert in lieu thereof, "based on a work plan referring".

On page 12, strike lines 10–25 inclusive and insert in lieu thereof, "(D) any license for exploration or any permit for commercial recovery if the work plan for such license or permit describes an area of the deep seabed the same as that described in a work plan for a license or permit previously issued to that applicant which has been surrendered, relinquished or revoked under section 104 within the preceding 3 years;

"(E) any license for exploration or any permit for commercial recovery if the work plan for such license or permit would conflict with: (i) any work plan for any pending application for a license or permit to which priority of right for issuance applies; (ii) any work plan for any existing license or permit; or (iii) any equivalent authorization which has been previously issued by a reciprocating state.".

On page 15, after line 15, insert "(D) the applicant's proposed work plan meets the requirements of this Act and the regulations promulgated pursuant thereto."

On page 18, at line 8, delete "area which is" and insert in lieu thereof, "activities".

On page 26, line 9, after "permits" insert, ", or modification of work plans,".

On page 26, strike lines 14–25 inclusive, and on page 27, strike lines 1–9 inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof:

"(1) WORK PLAN.—(A) The area for exploration shall be of sufficient size to allow for intensive exploration activities.

"(B) The area for commercial recovery shall be of sufficient size to meet estimated production requirements.

"(C) The areas of exploration or commercial recovery shall be reasonably regular in shape.".

"(D) When a licensee obtains approval of a work plan associated with a permit for commercial recovery, the work plan with his license shall be relinquished.".

On page 27, on lines 12 and 13, delete "the license" and insert in lieu thereof "its work plan".

On page 27, on lines 18 and 19, delete "which is authorized to be recovered under the permit" and insert in lieu thereof "covered by its work plan".

On page 28, at line 5, delete "the license" and insert in lieu thereof "its work plan".

On page 29, starting on line 5 through line 6, delete "area of the deep seabed" and insert in lieu thereof "right to conduct any deep seabed activity".

On page 29, at line 8, delete "area of the deep seabed" and insert in lieu thereof "such right".●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK 20TH ANNIVERSARY COMMEMORATION

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 18, 1978

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, this week we observe a most solemn event, the 20th anniversary of the first Presidential declaration of Captive Nations Week. It is a time to reflect over the tragic fact that there has been so little progress made in 20 years to improve the plight of the captive peoples of the world.

The people in the captive nations have had great hopes in America during these 20 years and more often than not our policies have caused these hopes to be dashed. Captive nations have been betrayed by détente and have yet to see the benefits from the present human rights policies of this administration.

We should make as a national foreign policy goal to reinforce our solidarity with those in captive nations who seek freedom. The spirit of captive nations' many freedom fighters is inexhaustible and hopefully they will triumph in the end. In addition to working for improved freedoms in captive nations we must be wary of any further Communist adventures in Third World nations especially in Africa. They are vulnerable and must be protected.

On Sunday an important demonstration was conducted by the Captive Nations Committee of New York. I was proud to participate in the observance and was very much impressed with the opening remarks delivered by the chairman of the committee Horst Uhlich. Perhaps the most salient of his many relevant remarks was his recognition that freedom is by no means a static entity to be taken for granted. As Uhlich said "Freedom like friendship continues only when we work at it—dream about it, wish for it with all our hearts because freedom is very difficult to win and to keep, but very easy to lose." Words of wisdom indeed. Let us renew our pledges of support to those in captive nations and continue to serve as the beacon of freedom shining on around the world.

Mr. Uhlich's speech and the program from the New York Captive Nations Week rally follow:

OPENING DAY OF CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

Distinguished guests . . . members and friends:

In the name of the Captive Nations Committee, of New York—it is a pleasure to welcome all of you—on the occasion of this 20th Annual Captive Nations parade and commemoration.

We are honored by your presence, here. We know that you have made a special sacrifice, during vacation time, to join us here, today. And we are well aware that those who still remain inside captive territory are making the greatest sacrifice of all—because the loss of man's freedom is the greatest sacrifice of all.

We are all, indeed, honored to have with us our distinguished guests who bring us strength—and who raise our spirits with their presence. We would also like to take this opportunity to thank our committee members whose efforts and encouragement have been the support of our organization. And all of you who have helped in your own special ways: many, many thanks! And our special thanks to our honorary chairman, Dr. Ivan Docheff, for his good advice and guidance. . . .

We are here today, to honor those who have died at the hands of the Communist party—and those who are living their lives in Communist concentration camps, or who are detained, for reasons of mental health.

We are the fortunate ones, to be living in this great country, the United States of America—to have the freedom to meet, here, today. And it is only a few days after the celebration of our Independence Day on July 4th, a reminder that freedom, like friendship, continues only when we work at it—dream about it—wish for it with all our hearts—because freedom is very difficult to win and to keep, but very easy to lose. We have, in our own experiences learned many hard lessons.

We have suffered—and many of us still have relatives, families and friends who are weeping, starving, and suffering at this very moment. And they only ask for a word of encouragement from us—to assure them that they are not forgotten—to let them know that we are gathering together, as we are doing today, to send them a message of hope.

But above all—we must send our stern message to the Communist slaveholders ruling the captive countries, that we will never, never stop demanding freedom for all nations—and that we will never give up, until all peoples who are living under Communist slavery are liberated.

One visible activity is the pressure that the United States has been putting on the Communists, demanding human rights. This country is, in principle, attempting to remind the Communists that the human rights issue . . . one of the vital agreements which they signed during the Helsinki conference in 1975 . . . has been disregarded by them. The news coming out of Moscow, even today, shows only too clearly what the Bolsheviks understand by human rights. President Carter we understand is just visiting Berlin. When he looks at the Berlin Wall, it is like seeing the face of death . . . he should have the truest possible understanding of what Bolshevism means by human rights.

In 1945, when I was only a boy of 9 years, I was one of 17,000,000 East Germans who were expelled from our homeland of East and West Prussia, Pomerania, Silesia, and Sudetenland . . . and many people are not aware of the fact that 2,280,000 East Germans, mostly helpless women and children, were massacred after World War Two. And we know that the Crimean Tatars had almost half of their entire population killed off. And all the other captive nations of every culture have suffered similar disasters. Therefore, it is the duty of those of us who have survived to tell the truth about Communism. So that those who have not lived through the horrors of Communism, as we have, will understand more clearly what is to be expected from Communism . . . the madness of Communism . . . the murderous ambition of the Communist Party to conquer the entire world. These may be the final hours in history for us to alert the people who yet remain free . . . to wake up to the danger of the Communist Party International, which has conquered three quarters of the world, and having succeeded in Vietnam, immediately transferred their military operations to Africa.

And finally, on this occasion, today, we cannot afford to sleep peacefully until the cause of the captive nations has been made popular before the eyes of the American people and the entire free world . . . equally popular with the cause of the two Russian dissidents.

Albania, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Bulgaria, Byelorussia, Cambodia, China, Crimean Tatars, Cossackia, Croatia, Cuba, Czechia, East Germany, Estonia, Georgia, Hungary, Idel Ural, Karatchays, Laos, Latvia, Lithuania, Mongolia, North Caucasus, North Korea, North Vietnam, Poland, Romania, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, South Vietnam, Tibet, Turkestan, Ukraine.

These nations must live . . . they have the right to live . . . to exist just as other nations to exist!!!

Until these nations are free again . . . let us all work and pray for them.

May God be with us!!●

A TENDENCY TO LEGISLATE

HON. JOHN B. ANDERSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a while back one of our colleagues sent out a "Dear Colleague" letter in which he referred to a bill which was coming up under the "suspense calendar." While in fact there is not even such a thing as the suspension calendar—the procedure is simply known as "suspension of the rules"—our colleague may have been closer to an accurate description of the process in referring to it as the "suspense calendar." Given the excessive use of this procedure, the perfunctory debates, the absence of amendments, and the delayed votes, most Members are left in suspense over what they are voting on.

An excellent article on the abuse of the suspension procedure appeared in the June 26, 1978, issue of the New Yorker magazine. Written by the Washingtonwise columnist, Elizabeth Drew, and entitled, "A Tendency To Legislate," the article describes the proceedings on a typical suspension day and the reactions of Members to the procedure. Most Members interviewed agreed that the procedure was being overused and abused.

The justification for the increased use of this legislative, short-circuit process is that there are just too many bills to pass nowadays and too little time to consider them under normal procedures. The irony in this, of course, is that the more bills we take up under the suspension procedure, the more we tend to extend and expand existing programs without adequate oversight or revision, and the more we make way for the creation of new programs to pile on top of the old.

Mr. Speaker, without getting partisan I would point out that we on this side of the aisle did warn about the inevitability of abuse of the suspension procedure and lackadasical legislating both when the days for suspensions were increased and when the provision for delayed voting was under consideration. I would hope that the increased bipartisan disquiet in the House over the excessive use of the suspension procedure would produce greater restraint in scheduling bills under suspension as well as some further guidelines or House rules changes which would relieve the Speaker of the constant pressure put on him to permit all manner of bills to be brought up under suspension. I, for instance, along with some 53 cosponsors, have introduced House Resolution 178–180, which would amend House rule XXVII to prohibit any bill from being brought up under suspension unless specifically authorized by majority, rollcall vote of the committee, or the written request of the chairman and ranking minority member of the committee of jurisdiction. I think we might also consider a dollar limit on bills which can be brought up under suspension.

At this point in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, I insert the article from the New Yorker by Elizabeth Drew to which I referred earlier in my remarks. The article follows:

A TENDENCY TO LEGISLATE

On Monday, May 22nd, the House of Representatives, in approximately one hour and forty-five minutes, passed six pieces of legislation. The debate on these bills took about forty minutes altogether, and the rest of the time was consumed by roll-call votes on them. When a bill is considered on the House floor under regular procedures, hours, or even days, can be required to complete work on it, but these six bills were considered under what is known as the suspension calendar—a process that has come into increasing use. About a fourth of all House legislation of any consequence—that is, excluding private bills and routine matters that carry by unanimous consent—is handled this way.

The normal rules of legislating are suspended, debate is limited to twenty minutes for each party, amendments from the floor are prohibited, and a bill needs the approval of two-thirds of those voting. The theory is that this is an efficient way of clearing noncontroversial proposals, but the suspension procedure is also used for other purposes: to slip bills through or to deny members an opportunity to amend them, under the pretense that if a bill is on the suspension calendar it is by definition noncontroversial.

The speed of the process causes members of the House to cast their votes in even more ignorance than usual of just what it is they are deciding. Of late, members of the House, their docility on this particular Monday notwithstanding, have been growing increasingly wary of the suspension process, and that wariness is a symptom of a deeper unease—an unease about the sheer amount of legislation that comes before them.

As government grows, so does the number of bills to reauthorize old programs, to change them, to tinker with them, to find flaws in the way the executive branch is administering them. A program, once enacted, rarely dies. And, at the same time, members of Congress keep coming up with new ideas for things for the government to do.

There being many more members of the House than of the Senate, many more bills get pushed onto the House calendar. At the end of each session, the congressional leaders put out a list of bills passed that year, and the presumption is that the more bills that have been passed the more has been accomplished.

As the volume of legislation rises, so does the pressure to get bills on the suspension calendar; otherwise, a bill's sponsors must take their place in the long line of those waiting to bring legislation to the House floor under the regular procedures, and, because of the limited time, many bills don't make it. (This year, because it is an election year, the House plans to adjourn by the first of October.) In late May, a staff member of one of the House leaders said to me, "Everybody and his dog are trying to get on the suspension calendar." Technically, the Speaker of the House decides what goes on the suspension calendar, but most of this work is done by members of his and the Majority Leader's staffs.

A committee chairman simply writes a letter to the Speaker asking that a bill be put on the suspension calendar, and, if possible, he is obliged. Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill has set "guidelines," which include stipulations that bills on the suspension calendar should be neither controversial nor expensive, but although the guidelines help to establish an appearance of orderliness, they are not necessarily followed.

In mid-May, for example, two of the bills on the suspension calendar were the Comprehensive Rehabilitation Services Amendments of 1978, a large piece of legislation authorizing at least seven billion dollars in spending over the next five years and initiating a number of new programs for assistance to the handicapped; and the Comprehensive Older Americans Act Amendments of 1978, authorizing more than four billion dollars over the next three years and also initiating a number of new programs.

Under the rules, members had little opportunity to study the bills and no opportunity to offer amendments, and were faced with the choice of voting for or against the aging and the handicapped. (They voted for them, by 361–6 and 382–12, respectively.) Earlier, the leadership brought up under the suspension rules an Administration proposal to increase federal assistance for college-tuition payments.

The idea was to ward off a proposal, popular in Congress but opposed by the Administration, for tuition tax credits, but House members saw through the stratagem and it flopped. Generally, the idea is to not bring up bills that might fail to get the necessary two-thirds vote, because, from the point of view of the chairman of the sponsoring committee, that prejudices a bill's chances if it is brought up again, under the regular rules, and, from the leadership's point of view, a defeat reflects on its expertise in reading the mood of the House.

At twelve-twenty-five on May 22nd, the first bill on the day's suspension calendar is brought up. Putting bills on a given day's suspension calendar is, of course, a way for the leadership to do favors for the members sponsoring them. Of the six bills to be considered under the suspension rules today, four, all having to do with the subject of timberlands, are sponsored by Representative Jim Weaver, Democrat of Oregon, who is facing a challenge in a primary tomorrow. Dan Rostenkowski, Democrat of Illinois and Chief Deputy Whip, is in the chair.

About forty of the four hundred and thirty-five House members are present, and of those a high percentage are reading their mail or the newspapers or chatting with each other as the "debate" proceeds. Only about a half-dozen members are listening to the first speaker—Representative Carl Perkins, Democrat of Kentucky, the chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee.

The press gallery is virtually empty. Perkins brings up a resolution blocking the consolidation of several advisory committees by the Office of Education. (Such consolidations can be blocked by a vote of either the Senate or the House.)

In recent years, Congress has got in the habit, when it establishes new programs, of requiring the creation of executive-branch advisory committees, particularly in the fields of health, education, and welfare.

The high-minded reason given is that the advisory committees bring independent judgment to the administration of the programs, but in reality the committees become creatures of the programs, of the bureaucracies that administer them, and of the client groups that benefit from them.

In any event, memberships on them are considered prestigious and useful, and they provide opportunities for members of Congress to push for appointments of their friends and benefactors. Jimmy Carter, as a Presidential candidate, it will be recalled, pledged again and again that he would reduce the number of government agencies from nineteen hundred to two hundred. Of the nineteen hundred or so, about twelve hundred turned out to be advisory committees, almost a third of them attached to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

The Department was directed by the new Administration to eliminate a hundred such committees, and so the Office of Education proposed to consolidate the National Advisory Council on Equality of Educational Opportunity with the National Advisory Council on the Education of Disadvantaged Children, and to consolidate the Community Education Advisory Council and the National Advisory Council on Adult Education with the National Advisory Council on Vocational Education. But these changes were opposed not only by some of the client groups, which lobbied against them, but also by members of some of the advisory committees that were to be merged and by members of their staffs, who stood to lose jobs.

The Education and Labor Committee, protective of legislation it has spawned and sympathetic with the programs' client groups, has unanimously approved a bill, which Perkins is now bringing up, to block the merging of the advisory committee.

He routinely reads a statement giving lofty reasons for the legislation. John Buchanan, Republican of Alabama, who is also a member of the Education and Labor Committee, speaks in behalf of the bill; there is no further discussion, and ten minutes after the "debate" on this issue begins, it is over. Harold Volkmer, a freshman Democrat from Missouri, who has made a habit of demanding roll-call votes on suspension bills, does so now; a sufficient number of members agree, and, in accordance with custom, the vote is postponed until all of the day's suspension bills have been considered.

Next, Jim Weaver brings up H.R. 11777, the first of his four bills—this one to consolidate and also to expand several programs that provide federal assistance to private owners of forestland (the coöperative tree seed-and-plant program, the coöperative forest-management program, the coöperative tree-improvement program, the forestry-incentives program, the urban forestry technical-assistance program, the insect-and-disease-control program, the rural-community fire program, the cooperative forest-fire program, and the white-pine blister-rust-protection program).

Weaver quickly and sketchily explains what the bill would do, and says that it represents the efforts of the United States Forest Service and the Extension Service of the Agriculture Department, and also of ten private organizations, including the American Forestry Association and the National Forest Products Association—that is, of the bureaucracies that administer the programs and the interest groups that benefit from them. William Wampler, of Virginia, the senior Republican on the Agriculture Committee, says he supports the bill, and three minutes after the debate on H.R. 11777 began, it is over.

Representative Ronald Mottl, a Democrat from Ohio who is in his second term, demands, as has become his practice, a roll-call vote. Weaver's next bill, also backed by the two federal agencies and the ten private organizations, would expand the Forest Service program of research into forest and rangeland "renewable resources." The existing limit on spending for the program—twenty million dollars a year—would be removed. In five minutes, the debate on the bill is concluded.

The debate on the next bill, which would authorize spending of up to fifteen million dollars a year for ten years to provide extension services to private owners of forestland, takes two minutes, and the debate on Weaver's fourth bill, which would expand a program that supports volunteer work on forestlands, takes seven minutes.

Then ten minutes is spent on a bill to extend and expand a program that provides special training and employment opportunities in the federal government for veterans of the Vietnam era and certain other disabled veterans. At five minutes past one, the debate on all six bills is concluded, and the voting begins.

Under the suspension system, the first vote is allotted fifteen minutes—giving members time to reach the House chamber from their offices and committee rooms in the adjacent House office buildings—and each one after that is given five minutes. (Under regular legislative procedures, every vote is allowed fifteen minutes.)

During roll-call votes, the names of members of the House appear in lights along the wall behind the press gallery; the members insert a card in one of a number of electronic machines scattered around the floor and push a button to indicate how they are voting, and a green light next to the name indicates a "yes" vote, a red light indicates a "no" vote.

On each side of the chamber is a scoreboard that gives a running tally of how the vote is going and how many minutes on that vote remain. What these pieces of machinery say is often more important in helping members make up their minds on how to vote than is the content of the proposal they are voting on.

The system that has evolved for voting on the suspension calendar contributes to the members' relative ignorance of what they are deciding, and is an example of the kind of logic that determines so much of what happens on Capitol Hill. Until not many years ago, the suspension process was used only every other Monday, and in 1973 Tuesdays were added.

Last year, the number of days was increased again, to Monday and Tuesday of each week. In earlier years, by and large the bills were approved simply by voice vote. Since many members do not make it back to Washington from their home states until late on Monday, in 1974 the practice of postponing any roll-call votes on the day's suspension calendar until all of the bills had been debated was instituted.

When legislation is being considered under the regular procedures, members might be inclined to hang around the House floor between votes on amendments, and therefore learn what the amendments—and the bills—are about, but there is little incentive to be present during the debate on the suspension bills. And, increasingly, roll-call votes, rather than just voice votes, are being demanded on suspension bills. (The rules stipulate that a roll-call vote must be taken if one-fifth of those present ask for it—a number that, given the attendance during consideration of bills on the suspension calendar, is not difficult to achieve.)

Some Republicans began demanding roll calls because they were angry over recent changes in the rules which prevent them from demanding quorum calls at will—both as a tactic for delay and as a means of harassing the Democratic majority. Most members are concerned, for fear of what election opponents might say, about keeping their roll-call voting records high, regardless of how unimportant some of the votes may be.

Therefore, some Democrats, annoyed because last year the House leadership began holding more frequent Friday sessions during which roll-call votes were taken, began (particularly if they had missed the Friday sessions) to demand roll-call votes on Mondays, so that they could improve their voting records.

And therefore the House leaders, for their part, in order to protect those members who do not return to Washington on Monday in time for the votes, if at all, this year limited to six the number of bills that could come up under suspension of the rules on any one day, with some exceptions. (As each session of Congress nears its end, all kinds of odd things happen in the final rush, and the number of bills brought up under suspension on any one day increases.) At one point, Rostenkowski proposed holding all suspension votes on Tuesday, but that was apparently going too far, and the idea failed.

The fact that there are more roll calls may inconvenience the members, but it does make them take more responsibility for bills passed under suspension; otherwise, just a few people could (and, in the past, often did) approve them. A high-minded reason given for limiting the number of suspension bills to six is to allow the members more opportunity to study them, but one learns to look beneath politicians' high-minded reasons.

In the Speaker's lobby, off the House floor, a member on his way to vote on the first of today's six bills says to me, "I'll be glad to tell you what I think about the suspension system after I vote. Of course, I don't know what I'm voting on." There are available weekly and daily notices from the Democratic Study Group, an organization of House liberals, explaining what is in each of the bills that will come up. There are also Democratic "Whip Advisory" sheets on each bill and similar information sheets for Republicans. But apparently few members have, or take, the time to read these.

When legislation is being considered under regular procedures, members with a particular interest in it station allies at the doors leading into the chamber to tell the incoming members what the question is and how they would like them to vote.

On suspension bills, generally nobody bothers. As the members stream in for the first vote, the official doorkeepers enlighten them only to the extent of saying, "First of six." In the Speaker's lobby, Representatives Edward (Ned) Pattison, of New York, and Christopher Dodd, of Connecticut, both Democrats in their second term and both among the more thoughtful members of the House, talk to me, after voting on the first bill, about the process I have been witnessing.

Says Pattison, "This is a symptom of the incredible overload that we deal with every day. There's no way that a member of this body can honestly say that he fully understands what he's voting on."

Says Dodd, "There's a bill up; there's a presumption it's noncontroversial."

Says Pattison, "If there's any place in this body where you almost completely rely on the system, it's this. As I stuck my card in, I asked the guy in front of me how he had just voted. He said, 'Yes.' I asked him, 'What's it about?' He said, 'Damned if I know.' "

Says Dodd, "I asked someone what it was about. He said, 'It's all right. They're all noncontroversial.' "

Pattison explains, "I go over the weekly D.S.G. report on Monday morning. That's one time when you have a chance to read those things. But if nobody's lobbying me on one of the bills or raising hell, then I tend to go along. The first thing people do is look at the tally board. If the vote is two hundred and seventy-five to one, they vote 'yes.' "

Dodd, who is a deputy whip, says he has raised objections in whip meetings that too many bills are brought up under the suspension system. "They just don't get scrutiny this way," he tells me. "Taking them up under the regular system would consume more time, but it would also give them more scrutiny. Clearly, we should have a suspension system, but there should be tighter constraints on how it's used."

In a few minutes, the resolution objecting to the consolidation of the advisory committees is approved. The next votes come quickly: the timberland bills are passed by votes of 373–2, 373–3, 377–7, and 378–5, and the veterans' bill passes 388–0.

A little later, in the House dining room, a member who does not wish to be quoted by name, a progressive Democrat, lists some of his complaints about the suspension system "I think it's being abused," he says. "Look at the consideration last week of the Rehabilitation Act amendments under the suspension rule. That's a program a lot of us support strongly in total, but it also has some very controversial aspects, and its has dozens of sections.

Among other things, it contains a formula that Perkins and some of its other sponsors did not want to see tampered with by an amendment on the floor. There is a special vice in using the suspension process on a bill like that—one that has strong general support. Members have a choice only of voting it up or down, and very few are going to vote against the handicapped."

He goes on, "The dynamics of a vote on suspension are not entirely complimentary to the House. If a bill is rolling up a substantial majority, they'll support it. On the other hand, if there starts to be a number of votes against it, then members will start to inquire around, or simply vote against it. They'll look at the board to see who's opposing the bill. If it's one of the more respected Democrats, they may wonder why, and they'll oppose it, too.

The process is like a teeter-totter, with everyone jumping on one end or the other. And it's not true that costly bills are kept off the suspension calendar. There has been too much of a tendency to use it to accommodate committee chairmen. The leadership ought to examine the bills more and see if they're being brought up under suspension simply to avoid amendments.

It's not unknown for the leadership itself to bring up a bill under suspension in order to avoid troublesome amendments. Some of us argue that we should be reexamining programs every few years. But when you bring up something like the Rehabilitation Act under suspension, you're boxed in.

There's an increasing feeling that we're just passing a lot of laws—that the machine grinds out some jerry-built proposals, that the committees are the sausage machines of legislation. Members feel that they're voting on too much, that there are too many bills. You hear more talk about how maybe it would be better if we just passed the annual appropriations bills and quit."

One of the results of the various ways in which the House has been "democratized" in recent years is that more legislation comes to the House floor. Committee chairmen used to exercise more control over their committees, and the House Rules Committee, which approves bills for floor debate under the regular rules, used to exercise independent authority, but all that has changed.

Moreover, the committees tend to be self-selecting, and are not as much divided along ideological lines as might be supposed. In large part, members go on committees because they favor the things that those committees can do. People representing rural areas go on the Agriculture Committee, and so forth.

Once they get on the committees, they pursue legislation to further the interests that they went on the committees to further. Interest groups suggest legislation—or sometimes a member even gets an idea on his own—and hearings are held, and then, the case for the legislation having been made, like as not there is a bill.

The Democrat I have been talking to says, "The subcommittees push out legislation, the full committees pass it on, and the Rules Committee sends it on to the floor. We're swimming weakly against a tide of legislation. Some of the younger members are so disturbed about the amount of legislation we're passing that they're starting to sound like old curmudgeons. You can sense a weakening of the old liberal faith.

More people are raising questions, asking, 'Are we really going to help matters if we pass that bill?' There is a growing resistance among Democrats to some of the programs the Administration and the committee leadership are pushing. Once in a while, it erupts. I have a feeling on bill after bill that if someone on the majority side would take up the cudgels the outcome would be different.

But there is still a tradition that you stay within your own garden. Your colleagues on other committees are not happy if you suddenly come out of nowhere and oppose their bills. If you really wanted to oppose a bill under suspension you'd have to organize people to work the doors, and it's a major project. Besides, it's part of the culture of this place that if you take that aggressive a role you have to have a better reason than that you just thing it's a bad idea.

They understand if it affects your district—that's OK. Otherwise, members say, 'What's Joe doing opposing this bill?' You risk being typed as a gadfly."

He continues, "Members are increasingly nervous about suspensions. They don't want to walk in and feel that they're being snowballed and the five-minute vote cuts short the consultative process—the time to ask their colleagues what they think. There are just too many votes, too many issues, too many meetings, too many attention-demanding situations.

We're going to committee meetings, subcommittee meetings, caucuses—a caucus of the class with which you were elected here, the rural caucus, the steel caucus, you name it—and we're seeing constituents and returning phone calls and trying to rush back and forth to the district, and then we're supposed to understand what we're voting on when we get to the House floor. It gets madcap from time to time."

Later in the afternoon, I talk with some other members, as they go back and forth to the House chamber to vote on other legislation. John Anderson, Republican of Illinois and chairman of the House Republican Conference, says when I ask him about the suspension process, "It's a terrible way to legislate. Last week, we took up a three-year authorization of the Older Americans Act, with a total authorization of over four billion dollars. We couldn't amend it.

The excuse was that we have so much to do that we can't handle the volume under the regular rules. Maybe that suggests we're overlegislating. The suspension process is totally bad, unless it's done under some very rigid rules, like allowing it only for proclaiming National Pickle Week and things like that."

Barber Conable, Republican of New York says, "One of the abuses is the system of taking the suspension bills up all at once and postponing the votes until the end. The theory of that is that it keeps us from having to run back and forth. But everyone knows that while the suspensions are being debated you can go to lunch or do an errand downtown.

Members cynically take advantage of the fact that they won't have to vote for a specified time. Chances are that those will be the least informed votes on the floor of the House. We tend to stay around and listen to the debate on amendments.

The assumption is that the bills on the suspension calendar are 'noncontroversial.' But the controversial part is the amendments the leadership is preventing debate on. I say that even if we have to run back and forth a lot, it would be preferable to do that, rather than vote on a laundry list in the most uninformed way. A lot of members would stay and hear the debate rather than do a lot of running. And toward the end of the year there's real abuse.

The Rules Committee, with great fanfare, announces that after a certain date it won't send any more bills to the House floor. At that point, the leadership will bring up all sorts of things under suspension, for resolution under pressure. That leads to all kinds of frustrations and resentments."

Another member, who is close to the House leadership, expresses apprehension over my questions about the suspension process. When I comment that I have the feeling that the day's bills had rather whizzed by me, he smiles and says, "That's the idea."

On the following day, some of the uneasiness about the nature and amount of legislation to be considered bursts through, and the House rejects two of the bills on the suspension calendar. The first is a bill entitled "Establishing the Aboriginal Hawaiian Claims Settlement Study Commission, and for Other Purposes."

Though the bill would only establish a commission, the end result could be paying descendants of the original natives of Hawaii the value of land including Honolulu, plus interest. (An official of the Office of Management and Budget has told me that the Hawaiian claims could end up costing the government thirty-five billion dollars.)

Moreover, there has been a growing rebellion against bills coming out of the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs—as this one did—that endorse Indian or other aboriginal claims to certain areas. When the roll is called on today's bill, it is clear at once that it is in trouble.

The lights next to the names indicate that such members as Robert Giaimo, Democrat of Connecticut and chairman of the House Budget Committee and Thomas Foley, Democrat of Washington and chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, along with a number of other progressive Democrats, are voting against it.

The tally boards on the sides of the House chamber show that the vote against the bill is strong, and as the members come into the chamber they look at the boards, sniff the breeze, and, seeing that the bill is going to fail to get the necessary two-thirds vote, eagerly join in the kill.

At the end of each roll call, members are given the opportunity to change their votes, and now a number of them, not wanting to pass up the chance to vote against something change their vote from yes to no. In the end, the bill fails by a wide margin to get a two-thirds vote. Bills considered under the suspension rules seldom fail by a narrow margin.

Next, the members, acting on similar group instincts, vote down a bill that would have established a new Office on Domestic Violence in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and authorized appropriations of a hundred and twenty-five million dollars over the next five years to make grants for local programs establishing shelters and services for victims of domestic violence. (The bill defined "domestic violence" as "any act or threatened act of violence, including any forceful detention of an individual, which results or threatens to result in physical injury, and is committed by a person against another person to whom such person is married or has been married or with whom such person is residing or has resided.")

The bill would also have established a new advisory committee—a Council on Domestic Violence. The early voting on this bill, too, shows that some certified liberals are going on record against it, and the herd follows. Whatever the merits of the bill, here is an excellent opportunity to cast a vote against a new federal program and additional federal spending. And, again, a number of members, when they see which way the vote has gone, change their votes from yes to no.

This bill not only fails to get a two-thirds vote but doesn't even get a majority. The four other bills on today's suspension calendar pass with no difficulty. One of them, backed by members from California, calls on the Administration to press the European Economic Community to ease import restrictions on dried prunes and certain processed fruits and vegetables—something that the Administration says it is already doing. Another would permit working parents to take a tax credit for grandparents who babysit with their children.

After the votes, one member says to me of the grandparent baby-sitting tax credit, "It's dumb. We shouldn't pay a relative to baby-sit and then take a tax credit for it. It's so easily abused. But we didn't think it was worth the fuss to try to beat it."

Representative Fortney Stark, a liberal Democrat from California and a member of the Ways and Means Committee, which reported this bill, had—as rarely happens on suspension bills—filed a statement in the committee's report giving his objections to the bill, but he did not bother to argue against it on the House floor. In a conversation later, I ask him why. He replies, "It would have been like trying to beat motherhood."

Today, following the votes, Ned Pattison, talking about the two bills that were voted down, says to me, "That's the psychology of it. If the vote starts to look close, people start questioning. You assume there's controversy, and if there's controversy it's not something you want to vote for."

Morris Udall comes off the House floor to the Speaker's lobby and explains to me, "There's no logic to why these votes go the way they do. There's a momentum that starts. Some bills will go roaring through, and on other days if some start to get in trouble they'll go down. Members are always looking for an excuse to vote no, and so if they see that one of these bills is going down, everybody jumps to join the pack."

Another member tells me, "I'm just so tired I could cry. The pace is so damn heavy around here. We waste so much of our time racing back and forth having roll calls on bills that pass three hundred and sixty-three to three."

Another member says of the bills that have been defeated, "You have just seen a good indicator of the mood of the House these days."

Says another, a liberal Democrat, "I just think we're passing too much damn legislation."●

LEGISLATION TO AMEND LONGSHOREMEN'S AND HARBOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION ACT

HON. PHILIP E. RUPPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing for discussion purposes, legislation which would make a number of significant amendments to the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. These proposed amendments to the act are intended to benefit both employer and employee. Their primary thrusts are:

To make the liability of the employer insurable, predictable, and affordable;

To expedite the payment of compensation to workers entitled to it by streamling the administrative processes and modernizing an act which has not been fully reviewed for over 50 years;

To assure fair and adequate compensation to workers who suffer from industrial injuries, but also to establish compensation payments at levels which will encourage the prompt return of an injured and able worker back to the work force;

To improve the medical treatment and diagnosis available to injured workers by restoring greater control to deputy commissioners over medical services; and

To reduce substantially the nonbenefit costs of the act caused by extensive litigation and uncertainty by clearly defining those who are eligible for benefits and levels of benefits to be paid and by expediting the fair administration of the act.

These amendments are the result of long and careful study of the entire Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act by affected employers and insurance companies, and represent a certain consensus of those parties.

I hope this leigslation receives prompt consideration.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, due to responsibilities in my district, I was absent on Friday, July 21, 1978.

Had I been present, I would have voted "aye" on rollcall No. 581 on agreeing to resolve into the Committee of the Whole House; "nay" on rollcall No. 582, an amendment to H.R. 12433, housing and community development amendments, that sought to prohibit the use of funds for the reorganization of HUD; "nay" on rollcall No. 583, an amendment to H.R. 12433 that sought to strike provisions requiring that FAIR insurance rates be no higher than those set by the principal State-licensed rating organization for essential property insurance on the private market; "aye" on rollcall No. 584, an amendment to H.R. 12433 that prohibits social security increases occurring after May 1978 from being considered as income for the purposes of determining eligibility or amount of assistance available to any recipient under public housing laws; "aye" on rollcall No. 585, final passage of H.R. 12433, housing and community development amendments; and "aye" on rollcall No. 586, final passage of H.R. 13468, fiscal year 1979 District of Columbia appropriations.●

JOHN D. WORTHINGTON III

HON. ROBERT E. BAUMAN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, Maryland lost one of her leading citizens last week with the death of John D. Worthington III, publisher of the Aegis weekly newspaper in Harford County. For those of us who knew and respected "Johnny" Worthington, his passing is an especially sad occasion because, as one of his newspaper competitors said last week in an editorial tribute, "this man knew only friends." He had no enemies because it was impossible not to like him.

He was a good and kind man. He was also one of the finest examples of a rapidly fading breed of journalist—the publisher of a locally owned country weekly newspaper. When John first took over the Aegis in 1964, Harford County was still very much a rural area. During the next decade, the county became suburbanized as thousands moved out from Baltimore. As the county changed, so did the Aegis. John was always particularly proud of the mechanical and technological changes he initiated for his newspaper. The Aegis is today one of the finest weekly newspaper published in America. Through all the changes, the improvements and the growth, John guided his newspaper and its staff just as he would a member of his family. It was my privilege on a number of occasions to sit with John in his office comparing notes about people and politics, gaining insight from a man who knew men and events.

Because he was personally and professionally such an outstanding man, John was also a well-know and respected community leader. He was on the boards of two schools, a hospital and, the job he most loved, board president of the State Fair of Maryland. People asked John to serve on their boards both because they knew he would rarely miss meetings and because they knew he always took such responsibilities seriously and contributed substantially to the progress of the organization involved.

We will all miss John Worthington. His colleagues in the press put our loss into words as well as anyone. I join them in expressing to the Worthington family my deepest sympathy.

I include with my remarks articles and columns from the Aegis of Bel Air, Md., the Baltimore Sun, the Baltimore News-American, the Harford Democrat of Aberdeen, and the Havre De Grace Record.

[From the Bel Air (Md.) Aegis, July 20, 1978]

SERVICES HELD FOR PUBLISHER JOHN DALLAM WORTHINGTON, III

John D. Worthington, III, died at 6 p.m. on Friday, July 14, at University Hospital, Baltimore, after a brief illness.

Mr. Worthington was stricken while driving from his farm in Aldino to The Aegis newspaper on Wednesday morning, July 12, and did not regain consciousness. He was taken to the Fallston General Hospital and then transferred to University Hospital for surgery for a cerebral hemorrhage.

A native of Harford County, Mr. Worthington, 57, was coowner and publisher of The Aegis.

He was also President and coowner of radio station WVOB in Bel Air.

Mr. Worthington is survived by his wife, Gray Norton Worthington of Aldino; a daughter, Elizabeth Gray Worthington Barnes of Bel Air; two sons, John D Worthington, IV, and Randall P. Worthington, both of Bel Air; one granddaughter; his mother, Mrs. Annie McC.Worthington of Bel Air; and two brothers, James McC. Worthington of near Darlington and Richard W. Worthington of Churchville.

He was a graduate of Bel Air H.S. and attended the University of Maryland.

Mr. Worthington had been a member and chairman of the Board of Directors of Harford Memorial Hospital; a member and former President of the Maryland-Delaware-D.C. Press Association; a member of the Board of Trustees of John Carroll School; a member of the Board of Trustees of Harford Day School; a member of the Advisory Board of the Equitable Trust Bank in Bel Air; a member of the Advisory Board of the Small Business Administration; a member of the Maryland Conference on Handicapped Individuals; and was the President of the Maryland State Fair and Agriculture Society, Inc.

Mr. Worthington had served as a Town Commissioner in Bel Air for two terms from 1954 to 1958, including a term as Mayor of the Town.

Funeral services were conducted Monday afternoon from the First Presbyterian Church in Bel Air, with Rev. Richard W. Shreffler and Father Charles K. Riepe officiating. Burial was held in the Darlington Cemetery.

Serving as pallbearers were: Charles H. Boarman, Judge Brodnax Cameron, Jr., Corey C. Gary, Jr., Harry E. Mitchell, Jr., Phillip St. C. Thompson and W. Robert Wallis.

Honorary pallbearers included: G. Herman Albright, Brodnax Cameron, Sr., William K. Connor, Charles C. Hudson, Jr., Edwin H. W. Harlan, Jr., Carroll G. Josselyn, Benjamin W. LeSueur, William M. Linton, Harry E. Mitchell, Sr., Robert L. Sarkisian, Theodore Sherbow, George W. Wills, Jr., Brig. Gen. (Ret.) George W. White and William O. Whiteford.

VARIOUS THOUGHTS BY OUR WRITERS

Advertising journals tell us that weekly newspapers in the U.S. are where it's at these days.

But the weekly newspaper of the Seventies is not what many people recall from an earlier era. Newcomers to Harford County frequently express amazement at The Aegis—its sheer size, its news coverage, and the like.

Publishers of weekly newspapers in America today are of two breeds, it seems. There are those young, affluent English and Journalism majors who take a fling at the glamorous life on a daily and then retire to put their views in print into their own publication. Along with them are the veteran owners of the small weeklies of often a dozen or so pages, which have hit boom days and are now ten times as large and much more sophisticated than they had ever dreamed.

We lost one of the latter people last week when death claimed John D. Worthington, III, who published this newspaper and who for many years was a successor to his father at the active news helm of The Aegis.

There is good to be said about both types of publishers, and their readers usually benefit from their products.

For John Worthington, III, there was some of both traits to be found. He was, to some extent, the latecomer into the weekly field, for he had not begun life breathing the aroma of printer's ink, but rather the smell of freshly cut hay. And yet, as a native of Harford County and one who had been familiar with the family's newspaper operations, his final twenty odd years with The Aegis were based with familiarity of the area and of the newspaper and the people involved on both ends of its production, the workers and the readers.

With each of them he displayed a consistent air of compassion. Workers here came to realize that few people are ever fired. The toughest part of his job was often to approve the printing of a story or an editorial which he knew might offend someone.

But we can never recall cancelling any editorial or story simply on the grounds of the damage it might do to an individual, no matter who they were. Truth, accuracy, fairness and the people's right to know were factors which dictated his decisions, no matter how unpleasant.

Because of this, he often had difficulity understanding how longtime friends and acquaintances would, not only be upset, but would hold a grudge. He would go out of his way to say or print something nice about them before or after the story had run, but he wouldn't back off from printing it if it should be published.

The smell of that freshly cut hay never left John Worthington, III. Only recently, he succumbed to the affection he had for dairy cattle and purchased a prize cow. He named it Petunia and told the readers of his "Sitting On The Sidelines" column about it. Many old-time and weekend farmers called to let him know they enjoyed sharing that experience with him.

He loved horses too, but could go to the track often without ever betting a dime. We travelled with him to Louisville two years ago to watch the Kentucky Derby and last year went to Belmont Park to see Seattle Slew wrap up the Triple Crown. He enjoyed those days, just as he did an afternoon at Delaware Park, particularly when the steeplechase events were held. A regular attendee at Fair Hill, he found his interests in racing and agriculture combined in recent years when he was called upon to serve as an official at Timonium, where he found pleasure in the track's beautification and expansion and the development of the State Fair.

But he would marvel more at the ability of one jockey or trainer or of the champion bull than he would over the size of a daily double payoff. In fact, he found it difficult to understand the psyche of the inveterate track-goer who spent his afternoon under the stands studying a Racing Form and then making his wager, seldom to glance at the horseflesh involved in what he always regarded as the Sport of Kings.

John Worthington, III, was a part of The Aegis and he was a part of this country. He shared with many of us the mixed emotions of seeing growth and good people moving into our county, while removing some of the area's heritage.

To compensate for his satisfaction over seeing landowners prosper and the area develop, he took an interest in the preservation of our beautiful countryside and some of the structures by which future generations will judge us. His own home was one of these historic places and, while grumbling about the work involved on occasion, was delighted with the efforts his wife, Gray, took to make it a showplace.

John Worthington, III, once actively covered news events for The Aegis. In fact, he came on board here as a cub reporter under his father, in the days when the Courthouse Crowd reverently referred to the much smaller publication as "The Gospel According to John D."

He grew to be a fixture at meetings of the old County Commissioners and, for a time, was regarded as "the fourth Commissioner" and later on, "the sixth Commissioner" because he was usually with them whenever they met or dined together.

But he fell seriously ill about the time Harford went through its transition to Charter Government and never again returned to those reportorial duties; in fact, his writing time was greatly diminished after that illness.

He spent the past half dozen years in some degree of pain which he seldom allowed his fellow workers or family to know about. But he shared with the staff the delight in putting out a good edition and despair over getting scooped or making mistakes.

Around our office, he will be sadly missed for a long time. Everyone here has an anecdote or two to tell about him. Many are about his irreverance for certain established customs and we shan't go into them.

He had difficulty in the pronunciation of long names and we chided him about that. Once, in presenting a trophy to a winning jocket at Timonium, he goofed. He knew the name Hinojosa was oriental sounding and it came out over the P.A. as "Hiroshima"—something we never let him forget.

We have a Christmas Party around here and one of the highlights was always the extemporaneous speech he would give. He wasn't above using the occasion to needle some of the gals who needed to lose a couple of pounds or those of us who didn't always make it into the office on time. But, he was one of those people who didn't have it in his heart to hurt anyone's feelings intentionally and he would go out of his way not to do that.

John Worthington, III, used to like to lift a glass or two at Christmas parties and other times, but after his brush with death a few years ago, he became a teetotaler. He often liked to talk about drinking in recent years and was quick to point out how alcohol could easily destroy someone's mind and abilities.

He would caution about the reliability of heavy drinkers; about the wisdom of attorneys in matters outside the law; about bureaucrats whose empires kept growing at the expense of the taxpayer; and about people who borrowed beyond their ability to repay.

He worried about government, about high taxes, about inflation, about declining morals, about judicial leniency, about the plight of the farmer, and the general direction being taken by this nation. He was like a lot of us.

But in many ways, John Worthington, III, was a shade apart. He had an inner contentment which most of us struggle so hard to achieve we never make it.

He enjoyed watching the world and the life in it. He enjoyed the outdoors and the freshly plowed field; he marvelled over the rapid advancements of science and was proud of the technical advances made in the publication of this newspaper; he was comfortable with old-timers and new faces in the community and always had a story to tell to let them know that he liked living in this world with people like them.

He liked to travel and visited many countries and usually came back more impressed with the people, the farms, and the industry than he did with the many rulers and officials whom he met along the way.

He felt compassion for the little guy if he was working hard to try to make a living. And he shared the worries which the governing officials and corporation presidents have in the never-met role of attempting to satisfy others.

John D. Worthington, III, enjoyed the world and the people in it. He took great pride in his column, which was aptly titled. Regular readers of it would note that he did not use it to criticize, but to comment favorably on what he could and to report on his observations of life.

In many ways, he gave of himself to the community, to the people who lived in the world with him. He took no bows for this, but regarded his actions as man's duty to his neighbor. He wasn't openly religious, I suppose, but what greater measure can there be of a man?

A Remembrance, With Affection

(By Peter Jay)

John Worthington was my first editor, and news of his death last week, at 57, hit me—and many others who knew him—very hard.

By anybody's standard, he was a kind and decent man, easily amused and gently tolerant. He was a newspaper editor neither by instinct nor by early training, but by circumstance, and he never seemed entirely comfortable in the role.

He had a problem shared by many sons of strong fathers: People often expected him to bo a chip off the old block, and he wasn't. His father edited the weekly Aegis in Bel Air for the better part of a half-century until his death, very much in harness, in 1964; he was the archetypical country editor of his generation—a generally benign autocrat who was always consulted and usually deferred to.

(A former Harford county legislator remembers that he once introduced a local bill in Annapolis without discussing it first with old Mr. Worthington. A friend, horrified, told him he'd better go and see the editor quickly before the measure was denounced in the paper. He did, and the bill was later pronounced, editorially, to be "good legislation, poorly presented.")

Young John, who was really John 3d but whom everyone called Johnny, wasn't like that at all. He was an easy-going, friendly country boy, who in his youth worked not for the family newspaper but breeding and milking pedigreed Guernseys on the family dairy farm. It wasn't until the farm was sold for a housing development that he picked up a pencil and went to work at The Aegis. He was 36 at the time.

When his father died seven years later, he and his brother Dick found themselves in charge, and right in the middle of fast-changing times. Bel Air turned almost overnight into a traffic-choked bedroom suburb. Harford county, between 1960 and 1970, grew by 50 per cent. Business boomed. The Aegis's circulation grew and grew, as did its size and its revenues. It was another town, another life, and another paper from the one old Mr. Worthington had known.

But Johnny Worthington coped. He could have retired and lived on the paper's earnings, but he didn't. He was in the office daily, Saturdays too, answering the telephones and patiently enduring the abuse that is any editor's lot in these querulous times.

He wasn't a writer, but he did some writing, because that was part of the job. And his writing, especially a column called "Sitting on the Sidelines" he did in later years, a column full of homely anecdotes and local history, had a large following; it became one of the nicest and most personal features of the newspaper.

He never mastered the typewriter, though, and did his writing in pencil on yellow legal pads, using every other line. His handwriting was very neat, and the typesetters never complained.

Once, I remember, he was writing a letter that had to be typed, and he came into the newsroom where I was working as a reporter to use a typewriter. He rolled his paper carefully in, stared at the machine thoughtfully for a long time, and then carefully raised one finger and hit one key. "Damn it!" he said in exasperation, and everyone watching howled with glee. I never saw him at a typewriter again.

In recent years, with newspapers of all sizes being gobbled up by chains, the brokers were beating a path to his door. But he and his family held out, and The Aegis continued to grow. As time went on, John learned much more about publishing, especially its new technology and its economics. He was active in the state press association, and served a term as its president.

He was a community kind of man. Both because he was John Worthington and because he was the local newspaper publisher, he was constantly asked to serve on this or that board—and he seldom refused. He was on the boards of two schools, the hospital, and (a job he loved) president of the Maryland state fair. He seldom missed a meeting, and in his amiable way helped resolve countless disputes.

A lot of people are going to miss Johnny Worthington, who made his own way as a man and a local newspaper publisher; hundreds of them, all sorts of people from all over the state, came to his funeral here on Monday. His son, John 4th, is working at The Aegis now. He probably isn't a chip off the old block either, but if he is, he can be proud of it.

[Editorial from the Baltimore News-American]

J. D. Worthington III

Harford County readers of The Aegis will miss John Dallam Worthington III and his weekly column, Sitting On The Sidelines."

Mr. Worthington's last column appeared Thursday in the editorial section of the newspaper he helped to become rated among the top five weekly newspapers in the Nation. He died Friday in University Hospital in Baltimore. He was 57.

A strong believer in the importance of maintaining traditions, loyalty, friendship and family ties, Mr. Worthington was a proud man without being obnoxious. And he was a listener. He believed it was better to spend some time to hear a person's problem—big or small—before offering his advice or solution.

Mr. Worthington was a gentle and open man who was willing to spend thousands of hours of his time attending meetings to make Harford County and the State of Maryland a better place in which to live.

It was during his tenure as president of the Maryland State Fair and Agriculture Society that many improvements were made at the fair and Timonium Racetrack.

He also served as president of the Maryland-Delaware-D.C. Press Association. In this position, he provided strong leadership to protect the rights of the public and media against those who would impose restrictions to the freedom of information.

But his first love was agriculture and his 155-acre home place, Aquila Hall, near Churchville in the heart of the county in which he was born. He majored in animal husbandry at the University of Maryland and was actively engaged in farming until the mid-1950's when circumstances dictated that he become part of the staff of The Aegis, which was then published by his father.

It was his interest in agriculture as well as his basic fondness of young people that made him a big booster of FFA and 4–H programs.

Mr. Worthington was a successful businessman and actively engaged in many civic endeavors. He was the confident of many people in all walks of life.

But we will remember John Dallam Worthington III as a man of grace and style who made difficult tasks look easy and a man a 4–H kid currying a sheep or tugging a cow could con out of his socks any time and any place

We will miss him.

[From the Harford Aberdeen, (Md.) Democrat]

John D. Worthington 3d.

(By William Cronin)

Harford has lost the services of a valuable citizen, whose friendship and advice were prized by the many who came in contact with him.

He was a member of a family, which for several generations has left an imprint on the affairs and programs of County and State.

A few citizens living today can recall his Grandfather who was not only "a respected editor", but was also, for some years, a Superintendent of Schools. In our boyhood, we can still remember the electrifying news in the classrooms, when the teacher announced that the Superintendent was coming in to visit. Later, it was a privilege, as a young man to talk with him on his experiences as a newspaper owner and editor, and particularly his earlier days when he and Joseph M. Streett, then editor of the Harford Democrat, would exchange some "verbal shots". I remember his chuckle when he was accosted by Mr. Streett one day with the salutation, "John, let's stop this shooting at each other"; then John replied "We can't do that, no one would read either of our newspapers".

When he passed on, his son, John D. Worthington, II, became the editor, and the friendship continued between the editors of the two papers, both published only in Bel Air. "Young John" as he was called by those who had known his father, was an aggressive editor, deeply interested in the politics and affairs of his County, frequently consulted on matters of government and selection of the best candidates for County offices and appointments.

While John, the second, never sought public office, he filled many important positions, such as a director and officer of the new Harford Hospital, a leader in local farm organizations. His editorials urged the accomplishment of things that would improve the community and make it a better place in which to live.

During his day, a new editor appeared, John A. Robinson, a practicing attorney and later a Judge of the Circuit Court, who edited a third newspaper in the Bel Air area. It was largely devoted to promoting the growth of the Republican Party (needed perhaps, because both of his competitors leaned toward the Democratic Party). He also departed leaving an imprint on the affairs and history of the County.

And now, John the third has left, much too early in his useful life, and a living senior editor can look back over their accomplishments with a high degree of appreciation that he was permitted to know these three Johns; and with the hope there may be a fourth and fifth to carry on the programs of their ancestors.

[From the Havre de Grace (Md.) Record]

JOHN WORTHINGTON

We've had our squabbles over the years, both neighborly and not-so-neighborly ones, with The Aegis over in Bel Air. But we never had a squabble with John D. Worthington III. Nobody did.

Mr. Worthington, who died last week, quite literally hadn't an enemy. His newspaper, like most papers, made plenty of people furious, and he was usually the one who took the angry telephone calls or received the apoplectic visitors. He didn't enjoy the abuse, but from a public-relations standpoint there couldn't have been a better person to represent the newspaper under such circumstances because nobody could be mad at him very long.

In fact, it seems strained to write of him as Mr. Worthington. His father, who preceded him as editor and publisher of The Aegis, was Mr. Worthington; but John, who ran the paper with his brother Richard after his father died in 1964, was John or Johnny to almost everyone who knew him.

Newspaper people, especially those who work on larger papers, ofter have the idea nowadays that their lives ought to be almost monkishly removed from the life of their community. To serve on a board, or belong to a civic organization, they often say would compromise their independence.

But John Worthington was the product of a different school. He saw community service as community service, whether performed through the newspaper or through more direct, personal participation. As a result, he served willingly in numerous capacities outside of The Aegis. He was on the board of Harford Memorial Hospital, the Harford Day School, John Carroll School, and the Timonium Fair, and his work for these organizations, rather than reducing his effectiveness as a publisher, probably increased it.

Any newspaperman meets a lot of people, and is likely to be sought out by those whose interest in him is really nothing more than a desire for access to his newspaper. But John Worthington was liked more for his personality—friendly, helpful, low-key—than for his position.

At his memorial service in Bel Air on Monday, all sorts of people came together to remember him. There were farmers (he had been one himself, before he became an editor) and politicians and lawyers and laborers and military people; horsemen and real estate brokers; journalists and pharmacists and surgeons; small businessmen and government officials. They weren't there because they had to be, or because they thought attending might be in some way advantageous; they were there because they had known John Worthington and liked him as a man.

We'll miss him a lot. He brought a kindness and humanity to our sometimes cold-hearted business, and showed that local journalism can be successfully practiced by nice guys as well as tough ones. Our sympathies are extended to his famly, his employees, and his many friends.●

GOLDEN AND SILVER JUBILARIANS OF MISSIONARY ORDER

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to inform my colleagues in the House that on this coming Saturday, July 29, a truly inspiring event will take place in Northeast Philadelphia.

Seven Sisters of the Order of the Missionary Servants of the Most Blessed Trinity will commemorate their 50th anniversary in the Order, and 12 Sisters will celebrate their 25th year in the Order.

I find it heartening that in a world sometimes characterized as cynical, these remarkable women have devoted their lifetimes to the service of their fellow human beings.

Mr. Speaker, the Missionary Servants of the Most Blessed Trinity are an American congregation founded by an American Vincentian priest. The Motherhouse of the Order is located in Philadelphia, and serves as the headquarters for an order whose services encompass a variety of fields—from social services to religious education.

The Sisters carry out their mission in every type of areas, from rural counties to the inner city, in the United States and Puerto Rico.

The Sisters who are celebrating special anniversaries this week have been involved—and for the most part, still are—in the fields of education, social services, parish ministry, youth work, health services, ecumenical projects, retreat work and community research.

Celebrating their 50th year in the Order are Sr. Mary McGeady, Sr. Mary Ruth McPhilliamy, Sr. Anne Marie Minken, Sr. Agnes Mary Comer, Sr. Maria Antonia Alicea, Sr. Maria Teresita Gonzalez, and Sr. Mary Rosalia Grommes.

Celebrating their 25th year of service are Sr. Catherine Francis Lamb, Sr. Elizabeth M. O'Brien, Sr. Michael Mary Sullivan, Sr. Mary of the Holy Spirit O'Halloran, Sr. Carmen Teresa Rivas, Sr. Ann William Publicover, Sr. Rose Philip Mercurio, Sr. Marilyn Salamone, Sr. Patricia Cronin, Sr. Catherine McCarthy, Sr. Grace McGuire, and Sr. Mary Ignatius Kerrigan.

I am proud to count the Sisters as members of my constituency, and I extend to them my congratulations on this occasion and my deep thanks for the invaluable contributions they have made to the needy of our Nation.●

SOME SECURITY PLEASE?

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, some of the information that comes to our attention staggers the mind. We recover and try to maintain our balance. But it takes a long time for the initial shock to wear off.

Mr. Jack Anderson of the Washington Post has brought to our attention something that the folks back home will have a terribly difficult time absorbing: We have no strict security regulation guarding the transshipment of defense-related materiel to our NATO allies. Mr. Anderson reports that F–16 Falcon jet aircraft parts destined for our NATO partners may have already been transported in Soviet ships, stopping along the way at Cuba, a regular port of call for Soviet merchant ships in the Western Hemisphere. Our newest top secret fighter aircraft. How did this happen? The almighty buck. Soviet merchant shipping is cheaper.

Mr. Speaker, the officials of General Dynamics deny this charge. I sincerely hope that they are sincere. And I know that Mr. Jack Anderson hopes that this "startling story * * * told in hushed tones on the docks and inside maritime union halls * * *" is pure nonsense.

Mr. Speaker, I insert this item from the July 24, 1978, Washington Post into the RECORD:

SOVIET SHIPS MAY CARRY F–16 PARTS

(By Jack Anderson)

Lurking in the dockyards of America's port cities may be a spy story, with a James Bond twist. Out of pure greed, American defense contractors may be exposing the Air Force's most secret fighter plane, the celebrated F16, to Soviet scrutiny.

The startling story is told in hushed tones on the docks and inside maritime union halls, but word of the disturbing allegations has leaked to congressional investigators. They have been quietly tracking down reports that that F16 parts may have been shipped to our NATO allies in Soviet ships.

The preliminary findings are found in a confidential memo prepared for House Merchant Marine Chairman John Murphy (D–N.Y.). The memo states ominously that "U.S. maritime unions and rank-and-file dock workers in Houston, Texas, . . . have knowledge that the classified F16 parts are already being shipped on Soviet or bloc-country merchant ships."

Industry sources, the investigators add, are also "convinced" that classified parts for the F16 are being transported on Soviet ships. These ships allegedly stop in Cuba, where the hot cargo could be examined. "It's most certainly known to the government," the memo suggests, "that Soviet ships arriving or leaving the U.S. East Coast make a port of call in Cuba."

The F16 shipments are supposed to comply with stringent secrecy requirements of the Air Force and North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Among the four NATO allies helping produce the U.S. fighter planes for mutual defense, an "eyes only" agreement strictly forbids the "release of information to non-participating states."

But the Soviets have lured American businessmen to use their merchant ships by offering drastically cut rates. Huge Russian cargo ships roam the western shipping lanes and take shipments out from under the hobbled US maritime fleet.

By slashing rates up to 40 percent, the Soviet cargo hunters have been able to make phenomenal inroads on American shipping.

At least 37 percent of all cargo coming to the United States from West Germany, for example, is first hauled eastward 6,000 miles across Russia where it is "picked up by Soviet merchant carriers at inferior rates and shipped to the US."

Most scotch whiskey, distilled in Scotland, also "takes a 6,000-mile ride across Russia," the memo reports, before it "tickles the American palate." The Soviet merchant fleet obviously is losing money on these shipments, but the Kremlin makes up the difference in order to strengthen the fleet.

The major F16 contractor, General Dynamics, vigorously denies that any Soviet ships have been used to transport F16 parts. "It hasn't happened. There's no chance," a spokesman told our associate Jack Mitchell.

But behind closed doors, General Dynamics officials conceded to congressional investigators that "there is nothing in the contract that . . . precludes shipping by the U.S.S.R."

Top Commerce Department experts have also acknowledged in secret testimony that Russian carriers could be transporting "completely classified equipment" for the F16.

Footnote: The alarmed Murphy is preparing legislation to prohibit the transport of F16 parts aboard Soviet ships.

Forgotten Fuel—The use of "gasohol"—gasoline mixed with alcohol made from garbage and other waste matter—has met with opposition from the giant oil companies, whose enthusiasm for solving the energy crisis sometimes takes second place to their thirst for profits.

Despite proof that gasohol works, federal energy czar James Schlesinger and his aides have pooh-poohed the use of waste to ease the oil shortage, denouncing it as a "myth."

It's a pleasure, therefore, to find support from a scientist of unchallenged authority: Alexander Graham Bell. The remarkable Bell, whose genius was not limited to invention of the telephone, had this to say to a high school graduate class here in Washington, according to the February 1917 issue of National Geographic Magazine:

"Alcohol makes a beautiful, clean and efficient fuel, and . . . can be manufactured very cheaply . . . Wood alcohol, for an example, can be employed as a fuel, and we can make alcohol from sawdust, a waste product of our mills.

"Alcohol can also be manufactured from corn stalks, and in fact from almost any vegetable matter capable of fermentation . . . growing crops . . . weeds . . . even the garbage from our cities. We need never fear the exhaustion of our present fuel supplies so long as we can produce an annual crop of alcohol."●

PUERTO RICAN DAY PARADE

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I want to call my colleagues' attention to a very special event that will be held in my home city of Newark this Sunday, July 30. It is the statewide Puerto Rican Day parade, which tops a week of activities recognizing the proud heritage of Americans of Puerto Rican descent.

I am fortunate to count among my circle of friends many of the Puerto Rican families residing in New Jersey's 10th Congressional District, and it gives me a great deal of satisfaction and pleasure to participate in this celebration with them.

The Puerto Rican Day parade, now in its 16th year, is the result of the combined efforts of many hard-working leaders of the Puerto Rican community. The parade's proceeds will go toward a college scholarship fund. This year's queen, Lorraine Alemany, is an example of the beauty and charm of Puerto Rico. The president of the parade committee is Luz Miriam Hernandez, the grand marshal is Jack Horta, and the general coordinator is Miguel Sanabria. They have done an excellent job in preparing for the event, and they have received outstanding support from Jose A. Lugo, who is the parade's first vice president, and Dimas Montalvo, the second vice president.

Since the first Puerto Rican Day parade, my good friend Marie Gonzalez has been on the scene as an integral part of the event. Marie is a member of the Newark Human Rights Commission, and she is serving as the liaison between the commission and the parade.

The work of these people and many others, and also the events leading up to the parade, are very important reminders of the contributions of Puerto Rican Americans. This week in New Jersey is Puerto Rican Heritage Week, and on Monday, Newark Mayor Kenneth A. Gibson signed a special proclamation designating Puerto Rican Week in the city of Newark. The Spanish Repertoire Co. will perform at Essex County College in Newark on Friday night, and on Saturday, the parade committee will hold a banquet with the keynote speaker being Maurice Ferre, the mayor of Miami, Fla.

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the city of Newark is carrying on the important tradition of the Puerto Rican Day parade because I believe it will heighten the appreciation for Puerto Rican culture in America. These citizens are mindful of the value of their heritage and I am very proud to represent them in Congress. I am sure that the 16th annual Puerto Rican Day parade will be another memorable event in the celebration of the resplendent tapestry of America's ethnic heritage.●

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE

HON. ROBERT McCLORY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Speaker, among the other commentaries regarding the deficiencies of the administration's proposed foreign intelligence electronic surveillance bill is an article from the May 3, 1978, issue of the Knoxville, Tenn., Journal entitled, "Excess Power for Judiciary." The article calls attention to the folly of delegating to a special district court composed of seven judges (now 11), decisionmaking authority to engage in electronic surveillance of foreign powers and foreign agents. The article from the editorial page of the Knoxville, Tenn., Journal follows:

EXCESS POWER FOR JUDICIARY

On Feb. 8, 1978, a statement on electronic surveillance for national security purposes was made before the U.S. House of Representatives Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence by Laurence H. Silberman, senior fellow of the American Enterprise Institute who has been undersecretary of labor, deputy attorney general of the United States and ambassador to Yugoslavia. His testimony was of striking interest because of his concern about the constantly tightening hold our federal courts have on America.

The question then before the committee was a choice between a Carter administration bill which would require obtaining judicial warrants before electronic surveillance could be carried out and proposed legislation by Rep. Robert McClory, R.-Ill., which would leave the matter in the hands of the executive branch, reporting regularly to Congress. Silberman favored the latter method.

There is not space here to go into the merits of that issue at length. What may be of most interest to the general public is Silberman's anxiety about legislating more power to the federal courts. Here are some excerpts from his testimony on that score:

"Much of the discussion about this kind of electronic surveillance has assumed that the interests at stake are only the privacy of individuals on the one hand, and the protection of national security on the other. The question of the appropriate distribution of power and authority within our government . . . has not been given the explicit attention it deserves. . .

"Since I believe the judiciary's role in national security electronic surevillance should be circumscribed, I strongly support the thrust of Congressman McClory's bill. . .

"If one believes, as I do, that the so-called imperial presidency was actually in decline almost from the time it was discovered (in some respects, the most recent executive abuses were actually precipitated by that decline), and that today the chief threat to American democracy is the imperial judiciary, one views any new delegation to the judiciary with apprehension. . .

"Courts do, in truth, deal regularly with many of the most difficult issues in our society—but they should not. They are . . . not responsive to the democratic political processes, and the most difficult issues are political. . . And since judges are not politically responsible, there is no self-correcting mechanism to remedy their abuses of power.

"The administration's bill would limit jurisdiction to seven 'superjudges' appointed by the chief justice. This interesting device was chosen, I assume, to counter concerns for maintaining security as well as to develop judicial expertise in foreign affairs. But I find it troubling. Is the chief justice to appoint only those judges he believes to be 'sound' on national security matters? . . . The need for this special device suggests the impropriety of the entire delegation to the judiciary; when matters cannot be entrusted to any federal judge they should be entrusted to no federal judge.

"Even more troubling is the secrecy with which judicial deliberations are to be encased. As I have emphasized, (federal) judges are not elected; the legitimacy of their actions depends—even more than do actions taken by either the executive or the legislative branches—on PUBLIC decision making. . . Here virtually an entire phase of judicial activity will go underground. Those of us not in government will never know how the judiciary exercises the supervisory authority over national intelligence gathering which the administration bill grants it."

The principal thrust of Silberman's objections, we think, may be paraphrased thus: The federal judiciary already has too much to say about our lives. Let us not now allow it to acquire authority in foreign affairs.●

FOOD PRICE ISSUE

HON. CHARLES E. GRASSLEY

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. Speaker, today the Subcommittee on Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations, and Nutrition of the House Agriculture Committee is holding hearings on food prices. Price increases in food during the first half of this year have been dramatic and are a concern to all of us who have to go to the grocery store each week. The food price issue is complex, and it is very difficult to place the blame on anyone. Everyone has arguments as to why he should not be blamed for the price increases.

I would like to point out to my colleagues that consumers spend only about 16.8 percent of their disposable income for food, and based on 1974 spending it can be shown that the United States and Canada allocated the lowest proportion of private consumption expenditures to food, beverages, and tobacco. I feel that consumers are getting a good buy at the grocery store, especially when you consider that they spend a smaller percentage of income for food than consumers in any other country. Farmers play a vital role in providing the citizens of this country a food supply at what I consider a bargain price. The text of my statement regarding this issue follows:

Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that food prices are important to everyone. Food is a necessity and is purchased often. Consequently, when the price of food increases, it is noticeable. Since we are having these hearings today, it will provide those of us who represent the agriculture community an opportunity to place things in perspective as far as food prices are concerned. Farmers are helping the American consumer get a "good buy" in food. The American farmer, who represents the last bastian of free enterprise in this country, cannot legitimately be blamed for the current or anticipated rise in food prices.

Several statistics illustrate that consumers are better off than ever before. First, food expenditure as a percentage of disposable income has been on a steady decrease. As recently as 1947 the percentage of disposable income spent on food was nearly 26 percent whereas in 1976 it was 16.8 percent, a drop of nearly 10 percentage points in the last 30 years. During this same time period food expenditures as a percentage of total consumption expenditures decreased from around 27 percent to approximately 18.2 percent in 1976.

Another very important point to keep in mind is how much of their income consumers are having to pay for food items in this country compared to other countries. For example, based on 1974 spending, economists have found that the U.S. and Canada allocated the lowest proportion of private consumption expenditures to food, beverages, and tobacco. In Western Europe spending for nondurable goods ranged from 26 percent in France to 47 percent in Portugal. Experts estimate that individuals in the Soviet Union spend 35 percent of their income on food alone. Although data are not available to permit an accurate evaluation, it is estimated that most developing countries probably spend 60 to 70 percent of their income for food, beverages, and tobacco. Another example, in 1976, the U.S. spent 15.0 percent of the national income for food. This compares to 16.7 percent in Australia, 19.2 percent in Denmark, 26.5 percent in Italy, 21.5 percent in the United Kingdom. Recent figures indicate that of the 15 major countries surveyed by USDA's Foreign Agriculture Service, food prices in the United States have risen less since the beginning of this decade, except for West Germany, the Netherlands, and Belgium.

Inflation is a constant source of worry for all of us, and farmers are no exception. In May 1978, wage rates paid by farmers was up 2.46 times what they were in 1967. For livestock producers, the cost of feed had increased 1.88 times during this time period. Interest payable per acre on real estate debt increased an astronomical 3.84 times what it was in 1967. Overall prices paid by farmers have increased 7.44 times what they were during the period of 1910–1914. Prices received by farmers since the period 1910–1914 to May 1978 had increased 5.38 times. Obviously, prices paid have increased much more than the prices received by farmers.

Over the last several decades farmers have found it more and more difficult to make a living on the farm. Farmers have had to turn to second jobs or their spouses have had to start work in order to keep the family income high enough for the family to maintain an adequate standard of living or a standard of living comparable to their urban neighbors. In 1955 personal income of the farm population from nonfarm sources was about 35 percent. In 1965 this had increased to about 47 percent, and 1976 it had reached an astounding 57 percent. This in effect reflects the difficult time farmers are having in making a living solely from farm income, and I can assure you that most of them would prefer to be able to just farm.

As is the case for all Americans, farmers have seen the federal government continually become more involved in their lives and farming operation. One estimate places the cost of government regulations at about $102.7 billion for FY 79, of which $4.8 billion are direct expenses by the federal regulatory agencies and $97.9 billion are the costs of compliance with federal regulations.

There has been changing conditions on the demand side of food purchases. In more families, there is a greater incidence of more than one person working. This has resulted in both a higher family income and a demand for food in a "ready to eat" form to be eaten at home or for food to be eaten away from home in restaurants, etc. Families are eating more of their meals away from home than ever before. All of these additional services must be paid for.

Most of you here today will probably agree that farmers are not the major cause of higher food prices, and, more importantly, have the least control of their situation than any other of the factors or element of food costs. Consequently, we must look again to the "middleman" or to those factors involved in the processing and distribution of food—the farm-retail spread. The spread between the retail cost and the farm value represents an accumulation of costs involved in moving the products from the farmer to the consumer, such as labor, transportation, costs of other intermediate goods and services, and corporate profits. We must lock to the factors and try to assess their effects on food prices.

One matter which concerns me when there is a lot of public discussion about food prices is the possibility that the government will attempt to keep prices down through controls. I see that Mr. Bosworth, Director of the Council on Wage and Price Stability will be testifying later and I look forward to what he has to say. I feel that price controls never works and only serve to distort the market. There is ample evidence that the price freeze on meat in the early 70's resulted in higher meat prices instead of steady or lower prices.

Although we may think food prices are high, in my opinion consumers are getting a "pretty good deal" when they buy food. They have to spend less of their income for food than ever before and they spend a smaller percentage of their income for food than consumers in most other countries.●

AMENDMENT TO DEEP SEABED MINING BILL

HON. MILLICENT FENWICK

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Speaker, I plan to offer the following amendment to title II of the deep seabed mining bill:

AMENDMENT TO H.R. 12988

On page 36, at line 7, delete "recognize the rights of" and insert in lieu thereof, "allow".

On page 36, at lines 12 and 13, delete "substantially the same" and insert in lieu thereof, "similar".

On page 36, at line 17, delete "materially" and insert in lieu thereof, "unreasonably".

On page 37, at line 23, after the word "extent" add the word "reasonably".

On page 38, at line 15, delete "substantially the same" and insert in lieu thereof "similar".

On page 38, at line 17, after the word "been" add the word "unreasonably".●

CAPITAL GAINS TAX CUT AND THE FARM SECTOR

HON. RICHARD NOLAN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, according to a recent CRS study, the Steiger and Jones amendments to reduce the maximum capital gains tax will not provide family farmers and the rest of the agricultural economy with the increased incentives for capital investment needed to create jobs and sustain growth. The Steiger and Jones proposals will further threaten the family farm system by accelerating the spiral in farmland prices currently plaguing this country.

Since farmland has been an attractive investment during the last 10 years, because of the high rate of appreciation and the high rental value, a capital gains tax cut would further inflate farmland prices. The Steiger and Jones plans would provide increased incentives for nonfarm investors to purchase farmland, thereby creating unnecessary competition for beginning and existing family farmers in obtaining needed acreage. The current farmland market is already being pushed past its productive value without aggravating the situation by reducing capital gains tax.

If a reduction in the capital gains tax resulted in an increased value of land holdings and stimulated nonfarm investment in farmland, the inflationary pressures would affect the land already in use. The CRS study states that no new jobs would be created from the tax cut, nor would any additional farm acreage be cultivated or farm productivity advances realized. Furthermore, the study suggests that instead of the Steiger and Jones proposals, capital investments in agriculture might better be stimulated with increased depreciation or investment credit allowances.

The CRS study also reveals that increased farmland values would "translate into increased production costs through higher real estate taxes, rental rates or interest charges." A rise in production costs, therefore, would be traded for higher consumer food prices or would be made up for out of taxpayer's pockets.

In addition, the Treasury Department estimates that "80 percent of the benefits of the Steiger plan would go to only 1 percent of the taxpayers," according to the CRS study. Other sources predict about $17 million would be reduced from the farmer's taxes, but when considering that most of the 1 million farmers sell some capital assets during the year, $17 million is quite small.

The CRS study follows:

CAPITAL GAINS TAX REVISIONS: THE IMPLICATIONS FOR THE STRUCTURE OF THE FARM SECTOR

(By A. Barry Carr, specialist, Food and Agriculture Section, Environment and Natural Resources Policy Division)

For many years Federal tax legislation has granted preferential status to income from capital gains—the profit from the sale of capital assets such as stocks, bonds, or real estate. Prior to 1969 only 50 percent of the gains from assets held for 6 months or longer were included in a taxpayer's gross income. In addition pre-1969 law provided for a maximum tax rate of 25 percent on the net capital gain and allowed full deduction of any long term capital loss.

Legislation since 1969 has gradually increased the taxation of capital gains. The qualifying period has been increased to one year. The 25 percent tax ceiling now applies only to the first $50,000 of net gain with the taxpayer's regular rate applying to the remainder. A 15 percent tax is levied against the excluded 50 percent of the capital gain which exceeds $10,000. Only one-half of any long term capital loss can be deducted from capital gains in computing net capital income.

During his election campaign, President Carter pledged to seek an end to all special treatment of capital gains, thereby proposing to tax capital gains in the same manner as ordinary income. However another school of economic thought contends that capital gains taxes should be reduced. Advocates of capital gains tax cuts believe that these cuts would provide increased incentives for capital investment needed to create new jobs and keep the economy growing.

The Administration's tax reduction package, as presented to the Congress this spring, contained no capital gains revisions. Representative William Steiger has proposed an amendment which would, in effect, reduce the maximum tax rate on capital gains to 25 percent, compared to the 49 percent now in effect. A second proposal, sometimes referred to as a compromise, has been put forth by Representative James Jones. The Jones proposal would establish a maximum tax rate of 35 percent on capital gains.

Critics of the Steiger and Jones proposals have called them tax cuts for the wealthy. The Treasury Department has estimated that 80 percent of the benefits of the Steiger plan would go to one percent of the taxpayers. Some economists have argued that capital gains tax cuts are an inefficient tool to spur business investment when compared with other fiscal tools such as accelerated depreciation allowances or investment tax credits. Representative Henry Reuss, Chairman of the House Banking Committee, has said the Steiger plan would be inflationary and would drive up the prices of homes and farmland.

In evaluating the possible effects of capital gains tax reductions on farmland prices and the ownership of farmland, it is important to consider both the sellers and the buyers of farmland.

The sellers of farmland determine the supply of land coming onto the market. According to U.S. Department of Agriculture surveys in recent years, active farmers sold 39 percent of the farmland acreage, retired farmers 16 percent, estates 19 percent, and nonfarmers sold 26 percent. In some cases the potential capital gains tax on farmland with large capital appreciation could be a powerful disincentive against the voluntary sale of farmland. This disincentive might be especially relevant in the active and retired farmer class—about 55 percent of the supply of farmland. Estate sales and sales by nonfarmers, a group largely made up of investors who expect capital gains, are less likely to be influenced by capital gains taxes. However on balance it can be reasonably postulated that a lowering of the capital gains tax rate might encourage more owners of farmland to place their acreage on the market.

The buyers of farmland determine the demand for farmland in the real estate market. According to USDA surveys active farmers purchase 63 percent of the farmland acreage sold. In general these purchases are for enlargement of existing farms, although in some cases these purchases may include a farmer converting from renter to owner status. Retired farmers, nonfarmers and other categories of investors purchased the remaining 37 percent of the acreage. In most cases these purchases can be assumed to be for investment, rather than farming, purposes.

The value of farmland as an investment is due to several factors. Rental fees and farm program benefits provide a modest return in terms of current income. Farm real estate has offered a consistently high rate of capital appreciation averaging 10.4 percent per year over the past 10 years; this return will be taxed as capital gains rather than as regular income. With skillful accounting certain operating expenses can be charged as an operating loss against regular income and at the same time increase the capital value of the farm. Under some conditions farmland may receive preferential treatment with respect to death taxes and therefore may be a desirable asset to transfer wealth from one generation to another. Nonfarm investors may obtain some recreational use or other psychological benefits through farm or ranch land ownership. On balance it can be reasonably postulated that a lowering of the capital gains tax rate might encourge more interest in farmland as an investment, particularly an investment for nonfarm capital.

Should the increased demand for farmland, resulting from a reduction in capital gains tax rates, exceed the increased supply of farmland in the market place, the impact on farmland prices would be inflationary. Higher farmland prices would be the likely result of lower capital gains tax rates.

Increasing farmland prices affect different groups in different ways. Retiring farmers and beneficiaries of farm estates would be enriched. Nonfarm owners of farmland would find the value of their investment increased. On the other hand those who are beginning a farm career would find the capital requirements increased and the entrance hurdle made more difficult. Those farmers who are already established and own part or all of their farms would see the value of their holdings increased. However, these increased land values also translate into increased production costs through higher real estate taxes, rental rates or interest charges. Eventually these increased production costs would be passed on to consumers in the form of higher food prices or on to the government in terms of higher farm program outlays benefits.

There is disagreement as to whether a capital gains tax cut would benefit the general economy. However, it is difficult to see how a capital gains tax decrease, and the resultant increase in farmland prices would produce any benefits in the farm economy, such as the creation of new jobs. More farm production would not result and additional acres would not be farmed. In short the additional value of farm assets would be inflationary, not real. As such the increased capital appreciation which might take place would largely represent a transfer of wealth from one holder to another and not the creation of new wealth per se.●

UKRAINIAN HELSINKI MONITOR LUKYANENKO SENTENCED

HON. JONATHAN B. BINGHAM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, the recent crackdown on Soviet Helsinki monitors has struck Ukraine with ruthless severity. The new sentence of Levko

Lukyanenko follows those of his fellow Ukrainian group members, Tykhy, Rudenko, Marynovych, Matusevych and Vins. Fifteen years of Mr. Lukyanenko's life—10 in hard labor camps and 5 in internal exile—have been extracted as punishment for his activities to promote the implementation of the Helskinki Final Act in his native Ukraine.

Lukyanenko has spent much of his life suffering for the attempts he has undertaken to qualitatively improve the lives of his fellow citizens in Ukraine. The resulting persecution at the hands of authorities moved him to renounce his Soviet citizenship in August of 1977, an act he thought would facilitate his emigration from the Soviet Union. Instead, many more years of forced detention face him now. I firmly protest the unjust harassment of this Ukrainian Helsinki group member who was found guilty for monitoring his country's compliance with the humanitarian provisions of the Helsinki Final Act.●

MICHAEL A. POLLACK

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to an individual who lives and works in my congressional district, and whose business, civic, and community achievements deserve special recognition.

Mr. Michael A. Pollack has been awarded the "Outstanding Young Man of America" for 1978 for Santa Clara County from Fuller & Dees in Washington, D.C., an independent marketing firm. The award was based on outstanding professional achievements, superior leadership ability, and exceptional service to the community.

A resident of San Jose for 23 years, Mr. Pollack has contributed to developments which have benefited the Santa Clara business community with several million square feet of industrial and commercial complexes, as well as multiple dwellings and single family residences throughout Santa Clara County.

He has been instrumental in bringing San Jose an attractive, richly landscaped garden apartment community known as Shadowbrook Garden Apartments, that was awarded "Apartment of the Year" for 1978 in northern California. The award was based on professional supervision of construction, details, location and design, and presented by the Construction Council of California.

Mr. Pollack has been active in civic and community affairs including contributions and time devoted to the Crippled Children's Society and the Heart Fund Association of Santa Clara County.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and all of our colleagues to join me in commending Mr. Michael A. Pollack, who has done much to improve the overall quality of life, as well as providing hundreds of employment opportunities for the people in Santa Clara County.●

CONSEQUENCES OF A THOUGHTLESS CHINA POLICY

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, there are many in this Congress and in the country at large who argue that the United States should sever its ties with one of its oldest and firmest allies, the Republic of China on Taiwan. They claim that this action is necessary if we would "normalize" our relations with the Communist regime in Peking, since, they say, it will not accept our recognition on any other terms.

The advocates of this policy argue that such a step would be in the interests of the United States itself, and that it would promote stability in the Western Pacific.

However, before we take such a drastic—and in my view, utterly mistaken—step, we should seriously consider what the possible results of such a policy shift would be. In June Senator BARRY GOLDWATER delivered a speech in the Senate in which he conjectured that the Republic of China on Taiwan, once abandoned by the United States, might reach a limited agreement with the Soviet Union which would provide the Soviets a hold in the Western Pacific which they do not now have. This certainly would not encourage stability in the relations between Communist China and the Soviet Union, and it most definitely would not be in the interests of the United States. What would it benefit us if we gained an Embassy compound in Peking in compensation for the possible loss of our naval supremacy in the Pacific?

However, Mr. Speaker, the scenario which Senator GOLDWATER envisions is not the only possible one. The Chinese on Taiwan have learned much more from their experience with communism than we have, and it may be that they will wish to make no accommodation whatever with the Communists, whether of the Russian or Chinese variety. Under such circumstances, what options would the leaders of the Republic of China feel were available to them?

First, they face what is in effect a declaration of war from the Communist regime in Peking: The Communists have announced their intention to "liberate" Taiwan by force, and although they are not yet able to carry out that intention, the Chinese on Taiwan have every reason to believe them. Second, after their abandonment by the United States, the Republic of China faces the prospect of economic and military decline, so that they are unlikely to be stronger in the future than they are now. If there then should occur a period of instability in mainland China, it might be entirely rational for the leaders of the ROC to launch a military invasion of the mainland, since this offers them their best hope of long-term survival.

Mr. Speaker, I do not assert that such a thing will happen, but I do believe that it is a possible scenario for the future if the United States should abandon its faithful ally. It is one that we should consider carefully before we decide upon an unfortunate course of action. And it is for that reason that I bring to my colleagues' attention an editorial published in the English-language China News for June 27 as reproduced in The Free China Weekly for July 2, 1978. I hope we will give sober consideration to the thoughts set forth in it:

The Chinese ambassador to the United States, James Shen, remarked last week that U.S. 'normalization of relations' with the Chinese Communists on Peiping's terms could lead to war in East Asia. This is a warning we have sounded off and on ever since the Shanghai communique.

Understandably, it is not a danger that we like to stress in our relations with the United States. Some Americans think we are exaggerating. Others find it unpleasant to be reminded of Asian wars after the Vietnam experience. At least a few would prefer not to have any obligations in the Taiwan Straits.

But this country has to be honest and realistic. If the U.S. relationship with the Chinese Communists were 'normalized' in accordance with the demands of Peiping, there would be no Mutual Defense Treaty. The American military presence would be removed from this island. The United States and the Republic of China would have no official relationship.

The Americans who are here to trade and operate industries have told the U.S. government that the maintenance of a commercial office in Taiwan would afford them no protection. They want security, not an unofficial consulate. That security is provided by the Defense Treaty and the U.S. Taiwan Defense Command stationed here to implement military cooperation in the event of Communist aggression.

The American Chamber of Commerce in the Republic of China has implied that many of its members would terminate their Taiwan operations if their government decided to break with this country. How can we blame them? The Chinese Communists have made no bones about their intention to attack Taiwan in the wake of 'normalization.' It might take them a while to get ready but their intention is unmistakable.

To invade is the only way they could get their hands on this island province—and this is a goal they cannot renounce or, once the United States were out of the way, postpone indefinitely.

Because of this inevitability, the Republic of China would not be disposed to wait for Communist attack. Why should it? If the United States were to desert a friend and ally, this country would no longer be under any obligation to keep the peace in the Taiwan Straits.

Counterattack is sometimes the best defense. In our case, millions of people on the Chinese mainland are awaiting the chance to strike at their oppressors. Our chances of victory would be enhanced by opening up the strategic and tactical opportunities inherent in returning the struggle to the Chinese subcontinent.

This is not a war we would welcome at this particular moment. We are aware that the United States wants peace in the Taiwan

Straits and hopes for the eventuality of a peaceful settlement. But if war is inescapable, it might as well be fought on the best terms we can get. If the United States leaves us on our own, war is inevitable. The American people ought to know that. It is right that Ambassador Shen should give them the facts, however unpalatable these may be to some Americans.●

JUDGE LOUIS HOFFMAN

HON. RON DE LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago one of the most respected members of the Virgin Islands legal community, Judge Louis Hoffman, passed away while visiting friends in Iran.

For many years, Judge Hoffman served as the backbone of our local court system. He had the vision to realize that our courts must grow in both size and sophistication as the population grew and the practical knowledge to accomplish it. This rare combination, combined with his compassion, made him an invaluable asset to our community.

Judge Hoffman's goodness is stated very well in the accompanying editorial from the June 28 Virgin Islands Daily News. I commend it to my colleagues.

LOUIS HOFFMAN

Louis Hoffman was buried Tuesday afternoon in a ceremony that had as little pomp and ceremony as the man himself.

Hoffman died June 20 while visiting a friend in Tehran, Iran. As usual, he was on the move, living an active life. Retirement did not mean just sitting around for Louis Hoffman, he was on an around the world trip when he died.

Death, according to the friend, came suddenly and painlessly for him. It would have had to because, if he saw it coming, he would have fought it.

For many years, Hoffman was one of the best known members of the Virgin Islands legal community, both as a distinguished attorney and as a judge of the Municipal Court until it underwent the changeover to the Territorial Court.

As both attorney and judge, Hoffman was never known to shrink from controversy. While he could be a cheerful and entertaining conversationalist and raconteur, he could also be a tenacious and vigorous foe.

Two things stood out about Louis Hoffman as a public figure. His deep and abiding interest in court reform and his awareness of the juvenile problem in the islands.

On the former subject, he was always ready to talk. He fought long and hard in favor of upgrading a court system that, in its structure, had failed to keep up with the growth and increasing complexity of the community.

He was fully aware of the need to enlarge the local court system, provide it with better resources and to see that it focused special attention on particular problem areas, such as juvenile and family law.

On the subject of juveniles, Hoffman was seeing a problem emerging before almost anybody else. After all, he saw them daily from the bench—the youngsters who had been picked up by the police a dozen times by age 15, the ones who were bounced from foster home to foster home, the ones who were skilled burglars at 12.

He understood the complexity of the problem. He knew that most youngsters that came before him only needed a decent environment but he also knew that some were no longer children but veteran criminals. He saw the threat to the community if proper facilities and rehabilitative resources were not provided.

To the end of his days, Louis Hoffman, though "retired" kept abreast on what was going on in these fields and was a perceptive commentator on them. He maintained his interest and his vigor because he cared for this, his adopted home, where he was buried.

We need more like him.●

A TRIBUTE TO NOISE REDUCTION EFFORTS

HON. JOHN B. ANDERSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, nationwide concern over environmental issues has grown considerably in recent years. Positive and decisive measures have been commenced in our efforts to combat air and water pollution, erosion, and wasteful or harmful use of this Nation's dwindling resources. However, there is a more subtle pollutant which has been all too often ignored by Government and citizens alike.

Noise indeed has been labeled an invisible enemy. Unlike other pollutants, it usually leaves no lasting physical manifestations. Nevertheless, it poses a significant hazard to our Nation's health. According to the Environmental Protection Agency, 10 million Americans suffer from hearing loss due to excessive noise. Approximately 14.7 million more are exposed to levels of sound while on the job which present serious threats to their hearing. Another 40 million people are susceptible to harmful noise levels without their knowledge from airplanes, trucks, lawnmowers, hi-fi's, kitchen appliances, and motorcycles.

Unfortunately, the effects of this pollutant are not limited to these statistics. Evidence also exists suggesting a link between noise and increased cholesterol levels with accompanying high blood pressure. In the brain's arteries, veins and capillaries, noise has the opposite effect, causing enlargement which can lead to headaches. Scientists believe that it may change the secretion of acid by the stomach, the secretion of endocrine hormones, affect the functioning of the kidneys, and increase susceptibility to viral infection. Noise obviously takes its toll on the nerves and emotions as well, intruding on periods of rest, recreation, reading, and relaxation.

Presently emission limits do exist for motor vehicles and other sources of excessive noise. However, many vehicle owners associate noise with power and performance (assertions which have been proved untrue). As a result, a California study indicates that 78 percent of all motorcycles and cars have been modified and over 10 percent of each are being operated with defective exhaust systems. Some modified motorcycles generate 100 to 110 decibels, not much below a jet plane takeoff.

Mr. Speaker, in light of the preceding, I believe that we should recognize the individuals and organizations who are working to diminish the level of noise Americans are subjected to. At this time I would especially commend Frank L. Einsweiler, mayor of scenic and historic Galena, Ill.

Mayor Einsweiler has long been concerned about noise pollution and its impact. This concern has been expressed to me through our correspondence and has been demonstrated by his actions. After studying various types of community noise control regulations and observing some existing programs, Mayor Einsweiler determined that local regulations were unenforceable in Galena and that he needed an ordinance to suit the conditions of his town. As a result of his efforts, such an ordinance was passed unanimously by the city council on October 10, 1977, which limits the noise emission of light motor vehicles to 80 decibels in any area within the corporate limits of Galena.

A crucial role in the shaping of this ordinance was played by the Environmental Protection Agency's region V office located in Chicago, Ill. This office has assisted Galena and other communities in developing noise programs by providing technical assistance in ordinance development, noise measurement and enforcement training, and the loaning of equipment for measuring noise levels. Of additional note, the region V noise program sponsors environmental noise workshops for public officials involved with starting community noise control programs.

Mr. Speaker, noise, as a pollutant, needs to be taken seriously and dealt with accordingly. The actions of the Environmental Protection Agency, Mayor Einsweiler, and the Galena City Council should serve as positive examples of noise control and reduction to other communities and government agencies.●

EPA REGULATIONS AND BUSINESS INVESTMENT

HON. RICHARD KELLY

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, Government regulation costs industry an estimated $96.7 billion a year. But these direct costs, in paperwork and nonproductive capital investment, are only one part of the problem. The second part is the uncertainty created by constant revisions in environmental laws and regulations.

This growing problem was the subject of a July 22 New York Times op-ed column written by environmental consultant Robert N. Rickles. I commend it for your careful consideration.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, July 22, 1978]

ENVIRONMENTAL RULES MESS

(By Robert N. Rickles)

Debate has raged over the economic impact of our national environmental improvement program. But the debate has failed to deal with the real and unspoken fears of the private sector concerning the Environmental Protection Agency's regulatory programs. And the problems associated with its approach to cleaning up the environment are more likely to prevent environmental clean-up and cause economic decline than any of the scare stories one hears about factory shutdowns and job loss.

As a former control official and environmental consultant to both industry and government, I hear these private doubts whispered by many industrialists and Government officials. Ignored, they mean continued warfare between environmental control officials and industry. Applied soundly, they could mean rapid improvement in the environment with the minimum of economic disruption.

Privately, many industrial leaders will tell you that they will meet environmental standards without fuss and fury, if only three conditions are met by E.P.A. and Congress.

The first is fairness. Most businesses are competitive. They cannot spend large sums of money to construct and operate pollution control facilities, if their competitors are not forced to adhere to the same standards. Too often, the E.P.A. and Congress have set standards that vary from state to state. These differences, that frequently penalize plants in areas of high industrial activity, are worrisome to industrial managers who must watch the profit line as well as the sewer line.

The second concern is time. Most industries can meet tough environmental standards if they are given enough time to plan and finance them. However, financing can be of considerable concern to small, undercapitalized concerns. There is a substantial likelihood that environmental laws will lead to further industrial concentration as smaller firms sell out because they lack the capital to finance environmental facilities.

However, the key complaint that industrialists make about the E.P.A. and the environmental laws that it administers is the agency's lack of consistency. We have witnessed an unending crescendo of new Federal laws. It seems as though Congress feels obligated to pass either a new air or water-pollution control law each year. If these regulations simply expanded the areas of pollution control, congressional action would be understandable. But each set of rules has generally dealt with new regulatory approaches, standards and timetables for problems already handled by previous legislation. That means that, just as an industry moves to solve its pollution problems, it must meet new guidelines. Municipalities have had the same uncertain present with which to deal.

Many cities and industries have simply given up trying, certain that, before long, the E.P.A. approach will change. Furthermore, those companies that procrastinate have generally been able to save money and avoid penalties. Retaining current legislation for a decade or so would permit local governments and industry to plan abatement programs with the assurance that pollution control systems will be measured by the same standards when they begin operation as when they are planned. That will remove an important barrier to municipal and industrial action.

Congress is not alone to blame for the environmental regulation mess. With each new law, the E.P.A. has produced a barrage of new regulations, most unintelligible to ordinary minds, some contradictory and others unreasonable. And with each new regulation—the requirements for public comment, for agency review and for litigation—comes more delay in cleaning the environment. There is no question that some environmental regulations—not all designed by the E.P.A.—are so complex and burdened with paperwork that they totally preclude the activities that they are meant simply to regulate. The conflict between state and local environmental control agencies and their Federal counterparts—often more concerned with their own turf than with environmental improvement—causes industry to bounce from agency to agency in order to gain construction and operational permits, without any clear direction about the appropriate pathway to approval.

We have now gotten to the point where there is general agreement about the need to clean up the environment and even about the specifics of a program to do so. But the bureaucratic mess that exists threatens the environmental movement. It is time for the E.P.A. and Congress to clean up their acts so that we can clean up the country.●

THE VANISHING SPECIES

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post on July 23. The article examines in a most articulate manner an oftentimes-overlooked aspect of the vital importance of fully protecting the genetic diversity of plant and animal species.

I wholeheartedly urge my colleagues to seriously consider the long-term consequences to the evolution of all living species if we allow the extinction of particular animal and plant types in order to facilitate successful project development. The Endangered Species Act is designed to serve as a protective mechanism for those endangered or threatened species that would otherwise be rendered extinct.

The article follows:

THE VANISHING SPECIES

(By Erik Eckholm)

To most people, talk of "endangered species" evokes images of tigers under siege in Asia and cheetahs losing ground in Africa, of whales hunted to scarcity in the Antarctic and whooping cranes clinging to life in North America. For those who follow such matters, it may also bring to mind recent positive preservation development: whaling quotas, restrictions on trade in rare-animal pelts, DDT bans and international save-the-tiger campaigns, among others.

Even as such salvaging operations finally get under way, however, many leading biologists have begun sounding the alarm about an unsolved, unsung species problem of vaster proportions and wider implications. At risk, the scientists say, are not just hundreds of familiar and appealing birds and mammals. Examination of the survival prospects of all forms of plant and animal life—including obscure ferns, shrubs, insects and mollusks as well as elephants and wolves—indicates that huge numbers of them have little future. Not hundreds, but hundreds of thousands of unique, irreplaceable life forms may vanish by the century's end.

Should this biological massacre take place, evolution will no doubt continue, but in a grossly distorted manner. Such a multitude of species losses would constitute a basic and irreversible alteration in the nature of the biosphere even before we understand its workings—an evolutionary Rubicon whose crossing Homo Sapiens would do well to avoid.

Estimates of the number of plant and animal species living on earth range from 3 million to more than 10 million, with recent findings on the diversity of insects in particular supporting the higher approximation. Yet to date only about 1.5 million species—about 15 to 50 percent of the presumed total—have been recorded in the scientific literature. It is likely that several million insects and plants—along with far fewer members of other animal classes—await discovery, mainly in the tropics. If current patterns of human activity continue, a good share of the unrecorded majority of species will vanish before their existence, much less their biological importance or economic utility, is established.

Currently, estimates the International Union for the Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources (IUCN), an average of one animal species or subspecies is lost each year. However, although endangered animals receive the greatest public attention, plant extinctions are often more significant ecologically; according to Peter Raven, director of the Missouri Botanical Garden, a disappearing plant can take with it 10 to 30 dependent species such as insects, higher animals and even other plants. Estimates of the past and current rates of plant extinctions are not available, but the IUCN's Threatened Plants Committee finds about 10 percent (20,000 to 30,000) of the world's flowering plants to be "dangerously rare or under threat."

These estimates of species at risk greatly understate the true problem, for they deal only with known life forms. All evidence indicates that sizable, if unknown, numbers of unnamed species are disappearing in scientifically uncharted areas in the tropics. In his forthcoming book, "The Sinking Ark," wildlife specialist Norman Myers concludes that, right now, probably at least one species is disappearing each day in tropical forests alone—and that in a few more years there may well be a species lost each hour.

Biologist Thomas Lovejoy of the World Wildlife Fund, extrapolating current trends in population, land use and the pollution of air and water, finds plausible a reduction in global diversity of at least one-sixth by the year 2000, which would mean the obliteration of 500,000 species based on the lowest estimates of total species numbers. If this projection is even remotely close to correct, then no one can accuse the many alarmed scientists of crying wolf. The fabric of life will not just suffer a minor rip; sections of it will be torn to shreds.

THE THREATENED TROPICS

Humans destroy fellow species in numerous ways, including excessive hunting and collection and the release of toxic chemicals into the air and water. Over the next few decades, however, by far the biggest single cause of extinctions will be the destruction of habitats. As both populations and economies grow and human settlements sprawl, undisturbed natural areas shrink. Essential wildlife breeding zones, migration routes and browsing and hunting domains are paved, inundated with water, grazed or plowed. Forest lands are denuded by farmers, timber companies and firewood gatherers and then are given over to cattle, crops or non-native tree species.

The problem of habitat destruction exists on every continent, but it is particularly serious in the humid tropics, which is where the major species losses are predicted. Suffused with exceptional amounts of light, warmth and moisture, the tropical rain forests house a remarkable variety of ecosystems and species—and large areas, particularly in the Amazon Basin, remain terra incognita to scientists.

But the blunt truth is that huge, perhaps inexorable pressures to exploit the remaining virgin territories of the tropics are building. Many tropical forests lie within poor countries whose governments are not inclined to value abstract, long-term ecological goals above immediate economic gains. Unequal land tenure and rapid population growth cause additional encroachments into the forests even in more prosperous tropical countries. Affluent people in faraway lands, who demand wood and agricultural products, add to the pressures on tropical ecosystems, and international corporations are well equipped to facilitate the extraction and international transfer of tropical goods.

Because of this combination of powerful social forces contributing to the settlement or disruption of hitherto unexploited tropical lands, many scientists fear that little untouched rain forest will be left by the year 2000. Certainly not all the forest lands will be inhabited or treeless—and some remote regions may remain pristine. But, once disturbed, the original balance of rain-forest species in a given area may be forever lost. Large tropical areas must be set aside as biological reserves if massive extinctions are to be avoided.

THE HUMAN COSTS

Do the projected species losses matter? For a wide range of reasons, a decline in the diversity of life forms should be of concern to everyone. The biological impoverishment of the earth will certainly contribute to the economic, let alone the esthetic, impoverishment of humans.

Probably the most immediate threat posed by the loss of biological diversity arises from the shrinkage of the plant gene pools available to agricultural and forestry breeders. While crop genetic diversity can be largely preserved through seed collection and storage, wild relatives of crops may have properties of enormous potential value and are less apt than domestic strains to be collected. Moreover, despite recent international initiatives, existing seed banks are still badly incomplete.

In an age of plastics and moonshots, few people appreciate the extent to which humans remain dependent on natural products. Wild plants and animals provide the basis for life of many traditional peoples in Africa, Asia and Latin America—reason enough for their preservation. But in even the most technologically advanced societies, products derived from plants and animals serve a variety of crucial industrial, medical and other purposes.

Perhaps the greatest social costs of species destruction will stem from future opportunities unknowingly lost. Forty percent of the modern pharmacopoeia has originated in nature, yet only a small fraction of the earth's plant species have been screened for medically useful ingredients. Nearly all the food humans eat comes from only about 20 crops, but thousands of plants are edible and some will undoubtedly prove useful in meeting human food needs. It is certain that socially significant uses will be discovered for many tropical plants as more are studied.

No one can confidently say that products of comparable significance to rubber or quinine remain to be discovered. But no one can confidently say they don't, either.

AN "EVOLUTIONARY ETHIC"

Beyond particular economic or scientific losses caused by species destruction lies a more basic threat: the disruption of ecosystems on which human well-being depends. No matter how sophisticated modern technologies may seem, human livelihoods are ultimately grounded in biological processes, enmeshed in ecological webs so intricate that the consequences of destabilization cannot often be foreseen. Crushed by the march of civilization, one species can take many others with it, and the ecological repercussions and rearrangements that follow may well endanger people.

One common result of environmental degradation, for example, is an increase in the prevalence of small, hardy, fast-reproducing plants and animals of the sorts usually considered pests. Events such as the overrunning of crops by pests or the sudden spread of a disease may easily be perceived as matters of chance when in fact they are the direct result of ecosystem degradation.

No one could claim that all existing species are ecologically essential to the viability of human culture. But scientists cannot yet say where the critical thresholds lie, at what level of species extermination the web of life will be seriously disrupted. Identifying and protecting those species whose ecological functions are especially important to human society are crucial tasks facing both scientists and governments. In the meantime, prudence dictates giving existing organisms as much benefit of the doubt as possible.

In the long run, philosophical considerations may prove as potent as economic considerations as a force for species preservation. Australian geneticist Otto Frankel has urged the worldwide adoption of an "evolutionary ethic"—a determination to "try to keep evolutionary options open so far as we can" without forcing "undue deprivations on those least able to bear them." The alternative to living by such a creed is destroying many of those habitats and species that do not seem immediately useful; humans would appoint themselves as the ultimate arbiters of evolution and determine its future course on the basis of short-term considerations and a great deal of ignorance.

CONSERVATION NEEDS DEVELOPMENT

The descent from the airy summit of evolutionary ethics to the everyday human landscape of the tropical world is a jarring one. To be rich in birds, insects, trees and fungi is not necessarily to be rich in food and consumer goods. Far from it: Many of the countries in which the great species wipeout will soon unfold are burgeoning with the destitute.

When nations are poor, the temptation to choose short-term material benefits regardless of future ecological costs often proves irresistible. Besieged by restless legions of the jobless and the landless, governments are naturally inclined to transform remaining pristine areas into agricultural settlements—and, in fact, often lack the ability to prevent such transformations even when they want to.

Despite the countervailing pressures, a few tropical countries, including Colombia, Costa Rica, Peru, Thailand and Venezuela, have already established sizable, if not yet adequate, natural reserves. Leaders in wildlife-rich Kenya and Tanzania have also initiated far-sighted conservation policies; Kenya has gone so far as to ban all sales of animal-derived souvenirs. Encouraged and assisted by private international conservation organizations and United Nations agencies, other Third World countries have taken first steps toward the preservation of their biological heritages by designating limited areas for protection.

Yet even in countries with excellent conservation laws and ample nature reserves—let alone in countries where political leaders lack enough appreciation of biological diversity to act on its behalf—the permanent protection of large natural areas will be feasible only if the deeper socioeconomic forces that imperil them are dispelled. Whatever the proclamations from national capitals, and whatever the economic progress registered in aggregate GNP accounts, as long as large numbers are denied the means to make a decent living the nature reserves will be in jeopardy.

Beyond hand-wringing about the population explosion, many conservationists distraught over Third World species losses have paid little attention to the socioeconomic structures and human plights underlying these losses.

Accustomed to perceiving species-protection battles in North America and Europe as battles against mindless development, many may find it hard to devote attention and energy to the Third World battle for rapid economic development—albeit development of an ecologically sustainable, socially sensitive sort. However, the ultimate fates of thousands of plant and animal species will turn not only on what happens in the comparatively tidy worlds of scientific research and presidential decrees, but also on what happens in the confused, conflict-ridden arenas of social and economic change.

Unless national and international economic systems provide many more people with land or jobs, the dispossessed will naturally covet and molest "legally protected" lands, trees and animals. Similarly, if rapid population growth in tropical countries is not soon slowed, human pressure to exploit virgin territories will overwhelm even the most stalwart conservation efforts.

Success in bringing down birth rates, however, is also at least partly dependent on more general social progress. Immediate human survival needs will always take precedence over long-term environmental goals. Clearly, the struggle to save species and unique ecosystems cannot be divorced from the broader struggle to achieve a social order in which the basic needs of all are met.

"In wildness is the preservation of the world," sermonized Henry David Thoreau in 1851, encapsulating a philosophy that has suffused western nature-conservation efforts since then. Reflecting on the psychic anomie of an acquisitive society estranged from its natural roots, he observed that "the mass of men lead lives of quiet desperation."

Today's Third World, of course, bears little resemblance to booming 19th-century America; the quiet desperation suffered by hundreds of millions is of a more basic sort, one not much salved by the contemplation of turtles and ants. Even so devout a nature disciple as Aldo Leopold—a patron saint of modern wildlife conservation—admitted that "wild things had little value until mechanization assured us of a good breakfast." Present circumstances necessitate a complement to Thoreau's dictum: In broadly shared economic progress is the preservation of the wilderness.●

A CHILD'S JOURNEY

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I bring to the attention of my colleagues a new book—"A Child's Journey"—a definitive work about children. One of the authors, Herbert C. Yahraes, Jr., of Stanfordville, N.Y., lives in the 25th Congressional District, which I am privileged to represent. This book is receiving acclaim on all sides and is already into its second printing. According to several reviewers, "Segal and Yahraes have produced a monumental book about Americans' children. This book must be recommended to everyone in the field as well as to all informed laypersons. An enormous work."

At this time, I would like to insert a review of "A Child's Journey" that appeared in the Barrytown Explorer in Barrytown, N.Y. I commend it to your reading.

The review follows:

[From the Barrytown Explorer]

A CHILD'S JOURNEY

(By Jules Archer)

The definitive work about children, and what makes them the way they are, has been written. A Child's Journey makes most previous books on child development superfluous for parents, teachers and child psychologists. A product of three intensive years of research, encompassing almost every important study in the field, old and new, the book offers an easily read, fascinating yet scholarly blueprint for producing happy, secure and fulfilled children, and rescuing those who have been damaged by mishandling.

Without so much as a footnote, the authors have managed to pack their book full of important, documented information that is totally persuasive. I have never read a work so helpful to parents in answering the problems and difficulties and frustrations common in all families. Parents doing a good job will learn how they can do an even better one. In the hands of neurotic or troubled parents, the book may prove the equivalent of a year of counselling.

A Child's Journey provides a clear picture of how childrearing theories have changed from earliest times, and why. Fascinating case histories offer important clues to parents and teachers for mistakes to avoid in handling children. The reader will learn much that is new and mind-jolting.

Segal, a psychologist and writer, is director of the public and scientific information programs of the National Institute of Mental Health. Yahraes is a distinguished author noted for thirty years of writing in the field of mental health research and other scientific subjects. As a team they have produced a work which is bound to become a classic, as popular with parents and teachers as respected by scholars. It was no mean trick to present so valid a work in so readable a form.

I, for one, learned many facts and concepts which were new to me. Segal and Yahraes, for example, reveal that over-protection of a child can be as bad as rejection, making the child feel inadequate and worthless. Their insights into the role of genetic influence will relieve parents who blame themselves for mistakes in training for everything that happens to their children. At the same time the authors encourage parents by showing that environmental factors can work toward influencing the behavior and achievements of "difficult" children.

Segal and Yahraes stress the importance of understanding children's temperamental differences in preventing behavioral problems. Such understanding offers the clue to fine-tuning stresses placed on children to help them reach their potential, while at the same time not causing discouragement, depression and rebelliousness.

A Child's Journey also examines the mental health aspects of children with physical disabilities in a chapter which is indispensable for any parents or teachers of handicapped children. Another vital chapter examines the importance of the earliest hours after birth to the future development of the child and to parent-child relationships.

Working mothers will find a wealth of guidance in the chapter which points out that the absence of the working mother from the home is not nearly as important as the question of family stability in influencing child behavior. A mother satisfied by her work, and who provides adequate alternative care for her children, need have no guilt feelings. New studies show that children thrive well in good day-care centers.

One eye-opening disclosure for mothers may influence how they regard their new babies—the finding that their own concept of the newborn child has much to do with the likelihood that it will or will not develop an emotional disorder.

Writing of the effect of violence on TV on children, Segal and Yahraes reveal that this issue is largely a cop-out on the real problem—which is violence in the home. They present astonishing evidence of widespread brutality toward children in the United States, brutality which is the source of much child pathology as well as of violent crime in our streets. The book also documents beyond question the fact that the children beaten in their homes today will beat their own children tomorrow.

They quote a father in suburban Washington who declared confidently, "I don't believe in injuring a child or doing him permanent harm, but I know that when I beat the hell out of my kid, it sure clears the air." That same parent, undoubtedly, was part of the chorus of protest against showing violence on TV as a bad influence on his child.

Segal and Yahraes point out that abusive parents often fall into a rage of disappointment because of unrealistic expectations of their children. The authors also found a surprising correlation between the low birth weight of an infant and its likelihood of being beaten.

Abusive parents will find help with their problem in the list of resources given by Segal and Yahraes, who point out, however, the danger to children when clinicians who are too trusting of abusive parents before they are really helped.

One important field of research documented by A Child's Journey is the role of the teacher's expectations of a child. Recent studies have proved that children tend to live up—or down—to such expectations. The teacher who feels she's wasting her time with a ghetto child will find her attitude reinforced by the child's failures. But the teacher who makes such a child feel that he can do the work, and has what it takes to succeed, can create dramatic miracles. All too many teachers, Segal and Yahraes reveal, believe in the necessity of corporal punishment, which only teaches kids the value of violence.

The book also warns against pinning labels on youngsters—anything which marks them as deviant from the norm, physically or intellectually. The label tends to become a self-fulfilling handicap, with tragic results in maturity. By the same token, children who are helped to become competent in school-related skills enjoy a better self-concept and are much more likely to escape damage to their mental health.

One of the most valuable chapters of A Child's Journey deals with the importance and impact of a child's peers. It reports studies showing that as early as the first year of school, a child who has difficulty establishing good peer relationships may have serious mental health problems later unless his difficulty is recognized and he is given early assistance.

Parents, teachers, child psychologists and social workers have reason to be grateful to Segal and Yahraes for the brilliant research and analysis that went into the making of A Child's Journey, which I predict will now become the standard work in its field. But even more grateful should be the children, who will benefit immeasurably from this spread of knowledge that will take the guesswork out of how to help open the world to them and rejoice in the results.●

YOUNG: A RESIGNATION IS IN ORDER

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, in my continuing effort to point out that the 82 votes my resolution of impeachment against Andrew Young received are not indicative of its real popular support, I would like to include in the RECORD, at this time, a very fine editorial from the Marietta Daily Journal of Sunday July 16, 1978, on this topic. The editorial follows:

[From the Marietta Daily Journal, July 16, 1978]

YOUNG: A RESIGNATION IS IN ORDER

For someone who says, "I'm trying to help, not to hurt," U.N. Ambassador Andrew Young certainly seems to have his priorities misplaced.

In fact, he "helped" so much last week that Tass, the official Soviet news agency, released the following statement about one of Young's replies to a French reporter: "These words are noteworthy, since they come from a member of the cabinet and therefore signify an official admission that political persecution is widespread in the United States."

The words referred to by Tass came from Young as a reply to the question. "How do you explain the opening of the trials of Shcharansky and Ginsburg on the eve of a Vance-Gromyko meeting?"

Since the ambassador has complained that his reply was taken out of context, we hereby quote the entire answer as printed by the Paris Socialist daily, Le Matin.

Young said, "Oh, it's certainly a challenge, a gesture of independence on their part. But that will not prevent them from pursuing the SALT negotiations.

"And then, one doesn't know, what can happen to the dissidents. After all, in our prisons too there are hundreds, perhaps even thousands of people whom I could call political prisoners. Ten years ago I myself was tried in Atlanta for having organized a protest movement. And three years later I was a Georgia representative.

"It's true that things do not change that quickly in the Soviet Union, but they do change," Young's comments concluded.

According to one U.S. official, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance's reaction to Young's statement was understandably "unprintable." Vance has already called Young on the carpet for the remarks, and as usual Young blamed the press for "distorting" his answer to the questions.

If Andrew Young has been really misrepresented in the press as often as he claims, it seems to us he would begin to stop and think before he makes a comment on anything. But the ambassador continues to speak off the top of his head without thinking through the consequences of his words.

We do not think Young's latest statements—even added to his breaches of administration policy in the past—are "high crimes and misdemeanors" deserving of impeachment.

But we do agree with Seventh District Rep. Larry McDonald who said, "U.N. Ambassador Andrew Young in no way represents the people of the United States."

And, on a more practical level, Young's outspoken manner is not doing Jimmy Carter a bit of good. If Carter thought Bert Lance was a political headache, he must be finding Young to be a continuing migraine.

Sen. Barry Goldwater in effect, has told Young to "put up or shut up" when he demanded that Young either provide a detailed list of America's so-called "political prisoners" or be discharged from his office.

We would hope that Andrew Young will soon realize that he is an albatross around the neck of Jimmy Carter and that his continuing mistakes are costing not only the administration but the entire country loss of esteem in the eyes of the world. We would like to see his resignation.●

NIE DIRECTOR VIEWS TITLE I AND HEAD START IN ACTION

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, last May the new director of the National Institute of Education, Patricia Albjerg Graham, visited a Head Start program and a program funded under title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act in the Wayne-Westland and Westwood Community School Districts of the 15th Congressional District of Michigan, which I am privileged to represent.

Both programs are models of the manner in which dedicated local educators can use Federal assistance to improve the quality of schooling for low-income children.

During her visit to the Westwood Community School District, Pat Graham talked to Nolan Finley of the Detroit News about the need for educational researchers to stay in touch with the real world of schools, teachers, and children. And, she spoke also of the NIE's new research emphases on examining student achievement, teaching, urban schools and high school students.

I am delighted that Dr. Graham, who is a distinguished historian of education, took time from her busy schedule to visit these programs and the Wayne County Intermediate School District in my congressional district. Because I know her views on research at the NIE will be of interest to my colleagues, I ask unanimous consent to insert Nolan Finley's story from the Detroit News at this point in the RECORD:

EDUCATOR "GETS IN TOUCH" WITH PUPILS

(By Nolan Finley)

Patricia Graham, director of the National Institute of Education, got in some pupil-level research during a visit to Inkster's Westwood Community School District.

Bending to her knees, Mrs. Graham chatted with 6-year-old twins Lori and Lisa Petrimoulx, kindergartners, who attended the district's Head Start program.

"What did you like best about Head Start?" she asked the girls.

The youngsters, who were more interested in showing Mrs. Graham their purses, giggled and replied that they liked the toys.

"It's refreshing to talk with children," she said later. "Too often education researchers lose touch with the students."

The education specialist stopped briefly at the Westwood and Wayne-Westland district offices en route to Boston from her Marquette home. While waiting for a flight from Detroit Metropolitan Airport, she said, she wanted to review Head Start classes in the nearby districts.

Head Start is a federally funded program designed to prepare pre-schoolers in low-income and minority areas and help minimize disadvantages.

While touring Westwood, she discussed the national institute she has headed for one year and expressed pleasure over Congress' latest allocation.

"Last year we received $70 million," she said. "This year we will get $90 million. I think that's a good indication of the importance the administration and Congress places on education research."

The institute, based in Washington, was formed in 1972 under the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to study education questions.

"I feel that we can take on crucial educational issues," said Mrs. Graham. "And we are able to address those issues more clearly."

She outlined four areas of focus for next year's research. The first project will examine achievement-testing methods, which have drawn heavy criticism.

"No matter how dissatisfied we are with achievement tests, we appear to be stuck with them," Mrs. Graham said. "We have to realize the limits of the tests, and use them to improve the student's potential."

Researchers also will tackle the problem of revitalizing teachers.

"How do you intervene with a 40-year-old teacher, who has been teaching for 20 years and will teach for another 20 years, but who has lost some of her enthusiasm?" she said. "We have to find a way to give her a shot in the arm. It is a messy question. but it's important."

The third research area will involve urban education. Mrs. Graham said the institute will study successful urban schools and try to spread their gains to other inner-city schools.

Finally, the institute will attempt to help low-achieving high school students. She said those youths have been neglected by past programs, which emphasized reaching pre-schoolers and elementary pupils.

Mrs. Graham said she is optimistic about the outcome of her staff's research, and predicted the educational system faces "great changes." But she cautioned that results will come slowly.

"The research will take a long time," she said. "We expect the results to come in dribbles, but we will try to build on those bits of information and new discoveries."

She said the institute already has made great strides in researching school violence. Eliminating attacks in schools, she said, depends on a strong administration.

"The principal does make a difference," she said. "We found that if the principal is firm, fair and consistent, he could control the students. And it didn't matter if he was a white in a black school, a black in a white school, young, old or female.

"He could be a friend or a tough guy, but he had to treat the students equally and stand by his policies. We also found that security guards and physical punishment were not significant factors in controlling disruptive behavior."

Mrs. Graham said violence occurs mostly in urban schools, while vandalism is a greater problem in suburban districts.●

INTERRUPTION OF MAIL TO THE SOVIET UNION

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. Speaker, political dissidents within the Soviet Union have consistently been subjected to social, economic, physical, and psychological harassment. In its campaign to suppress criticism of the Soviet political system within its borders, the Soviet Union has violated the Helsinki Agreement by denying political dissidents, refuseniks, and prisoners of conscience, the basic human right of freedom of communication. The Soviets have attempted to isolate the dissident community by interrupting and intercepting the flow of mail between the United States and the U.S.S.R. The Subcommittee on Postal Operations and Services, under the chairmanship of the distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. HANLEY) today held hearings to discuss the Soviet Union's failure to abide by international postal agreements through the nondelivery of mail in the Soviet Union.

I would like to share with my colleagues the text of my statement to the Subcommittee on Postal Operations and Services:

STATEMENT OF HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the members of the Subcommittee on Postal Operations and Services, and its chairman, the distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. Hanley, for holding these hearings to discuss the problem of Soviet interference with the delivery of mail between the United States and the U.S.S.R.

The interruption and interception of mail is part of the Soviet campaign to suppress political dissent within the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union's failure to abide by international postal regulations constitutes a violation of international postal agreements and a blatant contravention of the 1975 Helsinki Agreement which guarantees freedom of communication between citizens of Western countries and the Soviet Union.

Despite the vigilance of Soviet officials, the Soviets have not been foolproof in their methods of totally isolating activists and refuseniks from critical Western eyes. Several of my South Florida constituents have brought to my attention individual cases of Soviets' consistently thwarting attempts to communicate with Soviet dissidents. The case of Dr. Seymon Gluzman, a prisoner of conscience, illustrates the extent to which the Soviets have gone to seal off leaks of truth. The Soviet psychiatrist was imprisoned six years ago for defying KGB orders to certify critics of the Soviet government as mentally ill. Dr. Harry Graff, a South Florida psychiatrist, has on many occasions tried to contact Dr. Gluzman in prison. After each attempt the registered letter was returned with the usual "retour inconnu" stamped on the letter. I have also tried to communicate with Dr. Gluzman to assure him that many concerned individuals are actively working for his release and an exit visa to emigrate from the Soviet Union to Israel. More than five months had passed before the undelivered letter was returned to my office. I have since learned that Dr. Gluzman was transferred from Perm 36 prison camp to an unknown destination.

Our attempts to contact other refuseniks have met with similar results. The South Florida Conference on Soviet Jewry sponsors a program in which Americans can adopt a Soviet Jewish family wishing to emigrate to Israel, and has kept me informed of its experience with the non-delivery of mail to the Soviet Union.

Judith Matz, Chairwoman of the Adopt-A-Family Program, explains the nature of the problem:

"The Soviets appear to have successfully developed a means of withholding mail while preventing documentation of this interference . . . All correspondents participating in our Adopt-A-Family Program are advised to send their letters registered with a return receipt requested. The 'pink card,' Form Number 2865, is then attached to the letter to be signed by the recipient and returned to the sender . . . The Soviet Union apparently has no provisions for sending mail with a restricted signature on the receipt. Thus, any postal clerk in the U.S.S.R. may scrawl an unreadable mark on the pink card. When such a card is returned to the sender, there is no further avenue for obtaining proof that the letter was undelivered."

The Soviet scheme has effectively blocked most correspondence between refuseniks and their American sponsors. Soviet Jews who have been allowed to emigrate have verified claims of Soviet impropriety in postal operations, for both incoming and outgoing mail. When Soviet Jews do receive mail from sponsors in the United States, they will often sign the cards in Hebrew. The returned cards and letters I am submitting with my testimony today clearly do not have any Hebrew markings, indicating that the letters were never received by the addressee.

Deliberate disregard of international postal standards is not an internal matter of the Soviet Union. I urge that Congress adopt H. Con. Res. 579 calling for Soviet compliance with prescribed international postal standards.●

"REPUBLICAN EAGLE" OPPOSES RESTRICTIONS ON AID TO WORLD BANK

HON. MATTHEW F. McHUGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, the foreign assistance appropriations bill will soon come before the House for consideration. As every Member is aware by now, numerous amendments will be offered to reduce funding and to restrict how our assistance may be used in a variety of ways.

I am opposed to these amendments, Mr. Speaker, and I have been encouraged by the fact that so many thoughtful and responsible newspapers across the Nation have indicated their opposition to them as well. For example, the Republican Eagle of Red Wing, Minn., in a recent editorial suggested that congressional threats to restrict World Bank funding would be unwise. The Republican Eagle pointed out that the United States should work to keep the World Bank nonpolitical and immune from pressures seeking to divert it from its primary goals.

For the benefit of those Members who may not have seen this editorial, I am including it in the RECORD at this time.

DON'T CHOP THE WORLD BANK

Both morality and enlightened self-interest argue that the United States should do its full share for the World Bank, says a Washington Post editorial here today.

That's a view the R–E, too, would heartily urge on Congress. The threats to be resisted there are several.

One comes from domestic economic interests which want to knife any potential competitor. Last year an amendment was offered that would require U.S. representatives at the World Bank to oppose financing any poor people's project abroad which might subsequently compete with U.S. citrus or sugar producers.

Earlier, U.S. soybean interests mounted the same kind of assault on World Bank palm oil financing.

Another Congressional threat has a different motivation: to require that the World Bank attach human rights strings to its loans.

This is high-minded but unwise. Definitions of human rights vary around the world. It's better if the World Bank concentrates on helping poor nations raise living standards without getting into political matters. The U.S. may attach human rights conditions to its own direct aid.

Still another Congressional threat is a hangover from America's unhappy Vietnam war. Some congressmen would like to subvert any World Bank loan to Communist-run Vietnam.

Again, the enlightened U.S. self-interest is to keep the World Bank nonpolitical. That's the best defense against any would-be political interference with the World Bank by communist countries or others unfriendly to America.

But the greatest threat to the World Bank as Congress comes to appropriate this month is pure and simple economy, born out of the Proposition 13 bandwagon.

But, as the Post put it in a follow-up editorial, this Prop–13 budget-cutting passion "does not extend to dams and highways . . . or the multibillion-dollar schemes roaring around Congress to help middle-class parents pay college tuition.

"Instead, the new thrift is focused with dreadful intensity on foreign aid . . . (It) recalls the story about the family that responded to a sermon on the virtue of thrift by cutting off its contributions to the church."●

BARLOW GHOST STILL HAUNTS OSHA

HON. GEORGE HANSEN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) has again been dealt a devastating blow in a Federal court—this time in a July 3, 1978, decision in the U.S. District Court of Eastern Wisconsin.

OSHA had forced an inspection of a Weyerhaeuser facility with only an administrative warrant which came under legal challenge. The resulting decision bolstered in a big way the fact established by the recent landmark Barlow case in the Supreme Court that a businessman does not have to settle for anything less than a warrant based on probable or reasonable cause.

Thus the Barlow decision continues to assume an increasing importance in American history because it sets a constructive precedent for necessary protective guidelines for citizen rights in the face of Government activities. Heretofore, the businessman and farmer have been the victims of a recent trend in reverse justice where the citizen is assumed guilty until he can prove his innocence.

The Barlow court ruling places the burden of proof back on the Government where it belongs. OSHA can now come to inspect as before but the businessman can demand that they have a search warrant properly obtained from a magistrate, and the warrant itself can be challenged by the citizen if he wishes to question the grounds upon which the warrant was issued and the scope of the proposed search—thus the burden of proof rests on the Government as was previously stated.

All citizens and especially those vulnerable to Government inspections should know their rights and not allow themselves to be improperly victimized by an overly aggressive bureaucracy no matter how well meaning its intentions.

A small businessman, Bill Barlow, blazed the way with his landmark case and now the giant Weyerhaeuser Co. has successfully challenged the Department of Labor's contention that a magistrate must have only the Labor Secretary's claim—through a compliance officer—that probable cause exists before issuing a search warrant.

The Weyerhaeuser decision has upheld my hopes and contentions and significantly reinforced the Barlow ruling. For the benefit of my colleagues and many interested citizens across the land, I insert for the RECORD the opinion of the court in this latest victory over the still defiant bureaucrats of OSHA:

[U.S. District Court, Eastern District of Wisconsin, No. 77–C–781]

WEYERHAEUSER COMPANY, A CORPORATION, v. PLAINTIFF, RAY MARSHALL, SECRETARY OF LABOR, ET AL., DEFENDANTS

DECISION AND ORDER

This action is before me on the plaintiff's motions for a preliminary injunction and for an order quashing an administrative inspection warrant and suppressing evidence obtained thereunder. The defendants have filed a motion to dismiss or alternatively for summary judgment.

In this action, the plaintiff seeks declaratory and injunctive relief because of an allegedly improper administrative inspection conducted by the defendants under section 8(a) of the Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSHA), 29 U.S.C. § 657(a). The defendants are the Secretary of Labor, an Assistant Secretary of Labor responsible for enforcement of OSHA, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration and three of its compliance officers, an OSHA area director, and the Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission.

According to the complaint, on June 30, 1977, the defendant compliance officers appeared at the plaintiff's corrugated box manufacturing plant in Manitowoc, Wisconsin, to conduct a safety and health inspection of the premises. They were refused entry. On July 7, 1977, one of the compliance officers returned with a warrant issued by a United States magistrate, and the plaintiff "under protest" allowed the officer to enter and inspect the entire premises. Under the same warrant, the compliance officers continued to inspect the premises on July 8, 11, and 12, 1977. On July 25, 1977, and August 5, 1977, citations were issued to the plaintiff for conditions discovered during the inspections. The plaintiff is presently pursuing administrative review of these citations before the defendant Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission.

The plaintiff claims that the warrant issued by the magistrate was invalid under the Fourth Amendment because there was no probable cause for its issuance. Furthermore, it is alleged that the prosecution of the plaintiff over the citations in question constitutes harassment in violation of the due process and equal protection guarantees of the Fifth Amendment. Accordingly, the plaintiff seeks, inter alia, (1) a declaration that its Fourth and Fifth Amendment rights have been violated; (2) a preliminary injunction enjoining any further actions or proceedings by the defendants against the plaintiff regarding the citations in question and staying further administrative proceedings pending this court's determination whether the evidence obtained by the defendants during the inspections should be suppressed; (3) an order quashing the inspection warrant and suppressing the evidence obtained thereunder; (4) an order quashing the citations and penalty notices; (5) a permanent injunction enjoining any further actions with respect to the subject citations; (6) a declaration that section 8 (a) of OSHA, 29 U.S.C. § 657(a) is unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment; and (7) an order directing the defendants to return all evidence obtained through the search of the plaintiff's premises.

THE DEFENDANTS' MOTION TO DISMISS

The defendants' claim that this action must be dismissed for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. Such claim is based on the plaintiff's alleged failure to have exhausted its administrative remedies. Much authority is cited by the defendants for the general proposition that administrative remedies must be exhausted. However, in the context of OSHA warrant cases, courts have held that the propriety of an administrative inspection warrant may be challenged in district court without first exhausting administrative remedies. Hayes-Albion Corporation v. Marshall, case no. C 77–205 (N.D. Ohio memorandum and order dated October 14, 1977); Morris v. United States Department of Labor, case no. 77–5068 (S.D. Ill. memorandum and order dated September 20, 1977; Barlow's, Inc. v. Usery, 424 F. Supp. 437 (D. Idaho 1977), reversed on other grounds sub nom. Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc., 46 U.S. L.W. 4483 (May 23, 1978). I agree with these decisions that no significant interest would be furthered by requiring the plaintiff to present the issue of the warrant's validity at the administrative level.

In its reply brief, the defendant Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission urges that it must be dismissed because the complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted against it and because the venue is improper in this district. Since the plaintiff has had no opportunity to respond to these arguments, I decline to rule on these contentions.

The defendants also argue that an injunction may not be granted enjoining inspections at the plaintiff's other plants throughout the country since there is no actual case or controversy concerning the other plants. Although the complaint does make reference to irreparable harm allegedly suffered by the plaintiff in its business operations throughout the United States, the complaint's demand for relief makes no request for injunctive relief directed at any facility other than that in Manitowoc, Wisconsin.

I find no persuasive basis for dismissing this action for any of the reasons advanced above. I have examined the defendants' other arguments and find none of them amenable to resolution without reference to matters outside of the complaint. Accordingly, the motion to dismiss will be denied and the remainder of the defendants' arguments will be treated as supportive of the defendants' alternative motion for summary judgment and considered together with the plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction.

THE PLAINTIFF'S MOTION FOR A PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION AND THE DEFENDANTS' MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

The defendants argue that summary judgment must be granted in their favor because the plaintiff consented to the inspection in question. The plaintiff disagrees, explaining that when the defendant compliance officers exhibited the inspection warrant, the plaintiff allowed the inspection only "under protest." The defendants' affidavits, including the notes of the compliance officers, show beyond doubt that the plaintiff's version of the facts is correct. Thus, it appears that the defendants' consent argument is legal rather than factual in nature.

I find that the defendants' argument is contrary to well established precedent. In Bumper v. North Carolina, 391 U.S. 543 (1968), the Court faced the issue "whether a search can be justified as lawful on the basis of consent when that 'consent' has been given only after the official conducting the search has asserted that he possesses a warrant." 391 U.S. at 548. The Court held that "there could be no consent under such circumstances" and further that "[a] search conducted in reliance upon a warrant cannot later be justified on the basis of consent if it turns out that the warrant was invalid." Id. at 549. Thus, as a matter of fact and law, it is clear that the plaintiff did not consent to the inspection in question.

In its motion for a preliminary injunction, the plaintiff argues that section 8(a) of OSHA is violative of the Fourth Amendment because it purports to authorize warrantless inspections of business establishments. Although a warrant was applied for and obtained before the defendants conducted the inspection of the plaintiff's plant, the plaintiff urges that the constitutional infirmity of section 8(a) cannot be cured by implying a warrant procedure into the act. The plaintiff contends that only Congress may cure section 8(a) by supplying a warrant procedure.

The parties submitted their briefs prior to the Supreme Courts' decision in Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc., 46 U.S.L.W. 4483 (May 23, 1978), which speaks to several of the disputed issues in this case. In Barlow's, the Court held that insofar as section 8(a) permits warrantless inspection of employment facilities, it is unconstitutional under the Fourth Amendment. However, the Court noted that inspections under section 8(a) would not be unconstitutional if performed "pursuant to regulations and judicial process that satisfy the Fourth Amendment." 46 U.S.L.W. at 4487, n.23 Thus, the Court foreclosed the plaintiff's argument that a section 8(a) inspection conducted with a proper warrant is impermissible

The second ground advanced in support of the plaintiff's motion is that the search warrant obtained by the defendants failed to comply with the Fourth Amendment because there was no probable cause for its issuance and because the scope of the warrant left to the unfettered discretion of the OSHA inspectors the places in the plaintiff's plant that could be searched and the things therein which could be seized. The defendants' motion for summary judgment asserts that the warrant was based on probable cause and complies in all respects with the Fourth Amendment.

The warrant was obtained from the magistrate on the basis of an "application for inspection warrant" supplied by Everett W. Shisler, one of the defendant compliance officers. The application stated, in part:

"On June 24, 1977, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration ("OSHA") received a written complaint from an employee of Weyerhaeuser Company, a corporation. The complaint alleged, in pertinent part, that violations of the Act exist which threaten physical harm or injury to the employees, and an inspection by OSHA was requested. Based on the information in the complaint, OSHA has determined that there are reasonable grounds to believe that such violations exist, and desires to make the inspection required by section 8(f)(1) of the Act."

The application further stated:

"The desired inspection is also part of an inspection and investigation program designed to assure compliance with the Act and is authorized by section 8(a) of the Act."

Judge Warren has found that language nearly identical to this was insufficient to provide a basis from which a magistrate could determine whether a search would be reasonable. In the Matter of Establishment Inspection of Northwest Airlines, Inc., 437 F. Supp. 533 (E.D. Wis. 1977) The defendants counter with several unpublished decisions in which similar language has been found sufficient.

I turn first to the guidance provided by Barlow's:

"Whether the Secretary proceeds to secure a warrant or other process, with or without prior notice, his entitlement to inspect will not depend on his demonstrating probable cause to believe that conditions in violation of OSHA exist on the premises. Probable cause in the criminal law sense is not required. For purposes of an administrative search such as this, probable cause justifying the issuance of a warrant may be based not only on specific evidence of an existing violation but also on a showing that 'reasonable legislative or administrative standards for conducting an . . . inspection are satisfied with respect to a particular [establishment].' Camara v. Municipal Court, supra, at 538. A warrant showing that a specific business has been chosen for an OSHA search on the basis of a general administrative plan for the enforcement of the Act derived from neutral sources such as, for example, dispersion of employees in various types of industries across a given area, and the desired frequency of searches in any of the lesser divisions of the area, would protect an employer's Fourth Amendment rights." 46 U.S.L.W. at 4486 (footnotes omitted).

The warrant application in this case sought to demonstrate probable cause on the basis of an existing violation on the premises (as evidenced by the employee complaint) and on the basis of an "inspection program designed to assure compliance with the Act."

In my judgment, the second basis does not provide probable cause under the guidelines set forth in Barlow's. Neither the application nor the warrant show that the defendants' inspection program is derived from neutral criteria of the type specified in the Court's decision. Accordingly, there was no basis from which the magistrate could determine whether "reasonable legislative or administrative standards for conducting an . . . inspection are satisfied with respect to" the plaintiff's premises. 46 U.S.L.W. at 4486, quoting Camara v. Municipal Court, 387 U.S. 523, 538 (1967).

The first basis—the employee complaint of violations of OSHA standards on the premises—is also insufficient. Under section 8(f)(1) of OSHA, 29 U.S.C. § 657(f)(1), upon receipt of an employee complaint requesting an inspection because of a violation the employee believes exists on the employer's premises, the Secretary of Labor is required to make an inspection if he finds reasonable grounds to believe that a violation exists. It is not enough, however, that the Secretary of Labor be satisfied that grounds for an inspection exist. Under Barlow's, a magistrate must also be so satisfied The question is whether the reporting by the defendant compliance officer to the magistrate that an employee had made a complaint is sufficient to establish probable cause for the magistrate's issuance of the inspection warrant.

In my opinion, the answer must be in the negative. I am mindful that "probable cause in the criminal law sense is not required." Barlow's, supra, at 4486. Nevertheless, if the warrant procedure is to be anything more than a rubber stamp proceeding, the defendants must be required to do more than read the statute to the magistrate. Yet, the defendant compliance officer's application did little more here. The application stated that an employee complaint was received which alleged, paraphrasing the words of section 8(f)(1), "that violations of the Act exist which threaten physical harm or injury to the employees." The application also expressed the agency's belief that there are reasonable grounds to believe that violations exist. The actual employee complaint was not presented to the magistrate, and the nature of the alleged violation was not described in any form.

The defendants urge that the magistrate should not second guess the agency's determination that a particular condition on the premises "threatens physical harm, or that an imminent danger exists" within the meaning of section 8(f)(1). However, this does not relieve the defendants from showing probable cause to believe that the condition exists. Thus, I agree with Judge Warren's conclusion in Northwest Airlines, Inc. that language such as that found in the warrant application in this case does not establish probable cause.

Although the plaintiff's motion is for preliminary injunctive relief, I am convinced that no triable issue remains with respect to the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim. The parties agree that the question of probable cause is to be determined solely on the basis of the application presented to the magistrate. Since I find that the application fails to establish probable cause for the warrant which issued, there is no issue of material fact as to the impropriety of the warrant. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to partial summary judgment: (1) quashing the search warrant and suppressing the evidence obtained thereunder and quashing the citations and penalty notices arising from the inspections conducted under the unlawful warrant; (2) declaring that its Fourth Amendment rights were violated; and (3) enjoining any further actions or proceedings by the defendants against the plaintiff regarding the citations in questions. It also follows that the defendants' summary judgment motion should be denied.

Since the plaintiff's request for injunctive relief has been granted on Fourth Amendment grounds, the plaintiff's Fifth Amendment argument in support of its claim for injunctive relief need not be considered. However, such claim remains viable as to the plaintiff's claim for declaratory relief.

Therefore, it is ordered that the defendants' motion to dismiss or, alternatively, for summary judgment be and hereby is denied.

It is also ordered that the plaintiff's motion to quash the inspection warrant and to suppress all evidence obtained thereunder be and hereby is granted.

It is further ordered that the citations and penalty notices issued as a result of the inspections of the plaintiff's premises under the warrant be and hereby are quashed.

It is further ordered that the plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction, treated as a motion for partial summary judgment, be and hereby is granted. The defendants are permanently enjoined from conducting any further proceedings to enforce the citations issued as a result of the inspection conducted under the inspection warrant issued on July 7, 1978, In the Matter of Establishment Inspection of Weyerhaeuser Company, case no. 77-15M, and the defendants are ordered to return to the plaintiff all evidence obtained through the search conducted at the plaintiff's premises under the warrant dated July 7, 1978.

It is further ordered that the plaintiff is entitled to a declaration that the warrant application and warrant for inspection dated July 7, 1978, are null and void under the Fourth Amendment.

Dated at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, the 3d day of July, 1978.

EQUALIZING ELECTRIC RATES IN NEW YORK STATE IS NONSENSE

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, last year an obscure, two-sentence provision entitled "Prohibition Against Special Nonaggregate Inclusions" was added to the national energy bill during subcommittee consideration. Neither the existence of the provision nor its implications were brought to the attention of the House before the entire 500-page bill was passed.

When it did become known, it was learned that this section might have required the New York State Power Authority to radically change its rate structure. And those changes would have resulted in a serious threat to thousands of jobs in western New York and other parts of the upstate area.

We organized a coalition to fight against this shortsighted and parochial measure, and to keep decisionmaking on this issue where it belongs: on the State level. That coalition succeeded in convincing all three of the State's top elected officials—both U.S. Senators and the Governor—that the interests of the State as a whole required killing this section. Pennies a month downstate were simply not worth the risk to thousands of jobs in other regions of the State.

Today a hearing was held in Niagara Falls, in my congressional district, by a State legislative subcommittee which is reviewing a number of proposals at the State level to accomplish the same or very similar ends. I applaud the State legislators who are holding the hearings, not because I agree with them, but because they at least have the courage to bring their ideas into the light of day where they can be debated thoroughly.

I feel that this issue is so important that I prepared and submitted a statement on it at today's hearing. I would like to share that statement with my colleagues, so I ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT OF HONORABLE JOHN J. LAFALCE

Mr. Chairman, the beauty of Niagara Falls has been a source of wonder to mankind ever since, eons ago, human eyes first saw this marvel of nature.

The bounty of the Falls came initially from its draw as a tourist attraction. The United States, the State of New York, and the Western New York region all derive benefits from tourism at Niagara, an industry that will remain in this region, no doubt, for centuries to come.

Yet the Falls are bountiful in other ways, too, the most significant of which is their capacity to provide energy. The waters of Niagara constitute one of the greatest natural sources of hydro-electric power in the world. And we all know how important energy has become in today's world.

Today's hearing centers on how best to allocate the bounty of Niagara's energy—or, put another way, how to allocate the major cost savings which result from natural hydro-electric power as opposed to other means of generating electricity. I fully understand the reasons why questions like these are raised periodically, and I do not question the motives of those who believe the present situation should be changed.

With all due respect, however, I believe they are wrong.

I believe that spreading Niagara's cost savings to all customers of the State Power Authority, whatever the specific source of those customers' power, would hurt the United States of America.

I believe that doing this would hurt the State of New York.

Lastly, I know it would seriously hurt the Western New York region.

But my purpose today is not to be narrow and parochial. Rather, I want to devote this statement to the broader issues—to those longer-term questions that sometimes get overlooked—and to appeal to you to join me in assessing the real impact of these proposals on the State as a whole, as well as the nation, rather than on particular regions within the state.

We New Yorkers are famous for our downstate-upstate quarrels. Such quarrels hurt us; they should stop.

We New Yorkers are perceived as being selfish and parochial—we're not, and we must quash this perception.

As one who has been deeply involved in Congress helping assure the continued financial health of New York City, I've faced the questions I'm asking today. And the answers were obvious. I knew I had to put aside short-term political considerations and act, instead, as I best saw the long-term interests of the State of New York and the United States.

My purpose today, Mr. Chairman, is to welcome those of you who hail from other regions to the Niagara Frontier. As the representative from the 36th Congressional District, which includes Niagara Falls, I am, to a degree at least, your host. I try not to be an ungracious host.

So I do welcome you here. I hope you have enjoyed your stay thus far, and that you had an opportunity to tour the magnificent plant the legendary Robert Moses built when the old generating plant fell into the gorge in the 1950's.

But my role as a host would be far from fulfilled if I left you with that alone. Mr. Moses built a powerful machine, to be sure, but you must look not only at the machine but also at what it produces.

To do that, you have to move away from the mists of Niagara; you have to tour the industrial might of the Niagara Frontier. You have to stand at plant gates at 7 o'clock in the morning and watch the shifts change at the chemical plants in this region. There, and only there will you see the real product of Mr. Moses' accomplishment. And that product is jobs. Jobs for Americans and for New Yorkers.

It is that central fact that tends all too often to be overlooked in this debate. We are talking about jobs, and I submit that the one single most significant impact of the cost sharing proposals before you today is the fact that jobs—thousands of them—would be lost forever to the State of New York.

In one stroke such an action could wipe away all the gains of the last few years.

I'm not new to this debate. I dealt with this issue when I served in the Assembly and in the State Senate. And it has even come up in the U.S. Congress. The battle there last year is worth remembering and retelling, for it contains elements of both views: the narrow and short-sighted approach, against which I caution you today; and the statewide and nationwide perspective, which I urge you to adopt. I'll try to be brief in relating the 1977 story.

During consideration of the 500-page national energy bill at the Subcommittee stage in Congress two sentences of obscure legislative language were proposed and inserted into the bill. Only one member of the Subcommittee, I am convinced, knew what far-reaching consequences those two sentences might have had if they had become law. Unfortunately, however, this Congressman chose not to make known what he had done.

So this time bomb, under the innocuous title: "Prohibition Against Special Non-Aggregate Inclusions," ticked away and was not discovered until the bill reached the U.S. Senate. Upon discovery of the infamous Section 515, I helped organize and coordinate a bi-partisan coalition of Congressmen to bring out the facts about this provision, analyze its impact, and fight to eliminate it.

The facts, concisely put, were these: enactment of the provision might have required PASNY to equalize its rates, rather than base rates on the source of the power used, as it does now. Such equalization of rates would have meant pennies a month—usually less than a dime—of savings to consumers downstate. Few of those benefited would even have noticed; none, I venture, would have even considered relocating from the State for lack of a dime saved on a monthly electric bill.

But look at the effects in this region. Here many prime consumers of PASNY power are industries—firms that provide employment for hundreds of thousands of New York State citizens. Enactment of Section 515 would have meant higher utility bills for these major employers. And their bills wouldn't increase by pennies—they would have gone up by thousands of dollars a month.

Many economists predicted that if Section 515 were enacted a good number of industries would relocate from the Niagara Frontier. Estimates ranged as high as 10,000 jobs jeopardized by this provision. Let's look at what such a loss would mean to the State and to the nation.

First, the nation suffers because existing investments—both private and public—would be left idle or underutilized. This is an efficient use of resources, drawing capital away from opportunities for real growth. And to the extent the nation suffers from such inefficiencies, the State would suffer even more.

Second, workers do not follow jobs as readily as some theoretical economic models might pretend. Workers are people—people with problems, with ties, families, roots. Relocation is never easy, even when job opportunities are better in other places.

So, many families remain. Unemployment goes higher, meaning loss of revenue (the unemployed don't pay taxes) and costs to the federal government for unemployment benefit programs, job training and re-training programs, welfare, health costs, etc.

And again, these burdens do not fall exclusively on the nation—they fall at least equally, and usually more, on the State as a whole.

Third, energy efficiency alone was the major consideration. The most efficient—the least costly—way to use energy is to use it as close as possible to the source; it takes energy to transmit it from one place to another. Niagara Falls, the source of the bountiful energy, can't be moved. Therefore, having higher than average energy consumers in close proximity to this major source is efficient. Just as logically, adopting policies which might drive such users away is inefficient, for should that happen Niagara's energy would have to be transmitted greater distances to the remaining users.

All these reasons led us to conclude that Section 515 pennies in savings downstate would cost far more, over time, to the State and its taxpayers as a whole. And we presented our findings to all who would listen.

We told Senator Moynihan, who agreed that the State's overall interests required the elimination of Section 515.

We told Senator Javits; he joined those of us fighting the provision.

And we told Governor Carey, who also concluded that the State's overall interests required elimination of this section of the bill.

All three of the State's top elected officials agreed.

And Section 515 was ultimately dropped in the House/Senate Conference Committee as a result.

The facts today are the same as they were then. The pennies to be saved are the same; so are the jobs. The impact of any action, at either the federal or the state level, to equalize PASNY's rates will be exactly the same. The reasons that led all of our State's top elected officials to oppose such a move last year remain just as valid today as they were then.

I have concentrated my remarks, Mr. Chairman, on the economic ramifications of the proposed actions before you today, because I find the arguments that I have presented to be extremely compelling, and I hope you and your colleagues concur by the end of this hearing.

But I would be lax in my duty if I did not raise another point which warrants your attention. That is the strong probability that measures designed to require equalization of PASNY's rate structure would be found to be unconstitutional.

As you know, the U.S. Constitution specifically bars states from enacting laws which "impair the obligations of contracts." This very sensible provision is intended to assure certainty in the marketplace and, therefore, permit commerce to flourish. Without so basic a protection anarchy would reign.

Are not PASNY's contracts with its bondholders entitled to this protection?

Are not PASNY's contracts with private utilities entitled to this protection?

Are not the long-term contracts with major industrial users of PASNY's hydro power entitled to this protection?

In my judgment, all these contracts and others threatened by these proposals are indeed entitled to such protection.

To summarize, then, I urge you to complete your tour of this part of New York. Look at the factories; look into the faces of those who work in them. Consider, please, the economic impact on the State as a whole, and on the nation. Finally, review the Constitution of the United States as it applies to these proposals.

Having done all that, I hope and trust you will join with me in concluding that these proposals, while undoubtedly well-intentioned, would be counter-productive to those goals we all share: the enhancement of the United States and of the State of New York.●

THERE IS NO NATIONAL COMMITMENT TO CONVERT TO METRIC, BUT——

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, there is no national commitment to convert to the metric system, but as evidenced by the debate on my amendment to strike appropriations for the metric board (see pages 21862–21866), there are Members of Congress who believe the Metric Conversion Act of 1975 provides for "the orderly conversion of this country to the metric system."

Section 3 of the Metric Conversion Act of 1975 states:

It is therefore declared that the policy of the United States shall be to coordinate and plan the increasing use of the metric system in the United States and to establish a United States Metric Board to coordinate the voluntary conversion to the metric system.

Some Members are carried away with the word "plan" and it was obvious that others who opposed my amendment were somewhat nervous with that aspect of the debate and kept emphasizing the word "voluntary." To eliminate any confusion in this regard, I have introduced H.R. 13451 to amend the Metric Conversion Act.

My bill eliminates the costly and unnecessary Metric Board and permits the Department of Commerce to continue the coordination of the metric program. In my bill I describe the "plan" as a broad program of coordination and public education.

That program shall be initially submitted by the Secretary to the President and the Congress no later than 1 year after the date of the enactment of my bill. That program will not become effective or be carried out by the Secretary unless incorporated in or approved by a law enacted within 60 legislative days.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I include the text of H.R. 13451:

A bill to amend the Metric Conversion Act of 1975 to provide that the functions of the Federal Government with respect to the metric system shall be limited to coordinating the conversion to such system in areas or industries which desire it, and keeping the public informed thereon, without encouraging in any way the adoption or use of such system.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3 of the Metric Conversion Act of 1975 is amended by striking out "to coordinate and plan" and all that follows and inserting in lieu thereof "to coordinate the increasing use of the metric system in the United States and to publicize the effects and ramifications of such use.".

SEC. 2. Section 4 of the Metric Conversion Act of 1975 is amended by striking out paragraphs (1), (2), and (3).

SEC. 3. The Metric Conversion Act of 1975 is further amended by striking out sections 5 through 11, by redesignating section 12 as section 7, and by inserting after section 4 the following new sections:

"SEC. 5. In support of the policy set forth in section 2—

"(1) the Secretary of Commerce shall devise and carry out (subject to section 6) a broad program of coordination and public education with respect to the metric system and its adoption or use, and shall collect, analyze, and publish information about the extent of usage of metric measurement; and

"(2) the Comptroller General shall analyze the costs and benefits of metric usage, and publish reports on any adverse effects resulting from increasing metric usage.

"SEC. 6. The program described in paragraph (1) of section 5 shall be initially submitted by the Secretary of Commerce to the President and the Congress no later than one year after the date of the enactment of this section, and subsequent revisions of or changes in such program may be submitted by the Secretary to the President and the Congress at any time; but no such program, revision, or change shall become effective or be carried out by the Secretary unless incorporated in or approved by a law enacted within 60 days after its submission (excluding in the computation of such 60 days any day on which either House of Congress is not in session because of an adjournment of more than 3 days to a day certain).".

Mr. Speaker, I now have nine cosponsors and suggest to my colleagues that those interested in being added to the list need only contact my office. The present cosponsors are: Hon. ROBERT BADHAM, Hon. THAD COCHRAN, Hon. TENNYSON GUYER, Hon. SAM HALL, Jr., Hon. THOMAS KINDNESS, Hon. LARRY MCDONALD, Hon. ED MADIGAN, Hon. DAN MARRIOTT, and Hon. CHARLES THONE.

Mr. Speaker, much more attention and concern is being focused on the creation of the Metric Board whose new executive director was recently the chief lobbyist for metric conversion. I can assure you that a lot more surprises are in store for the Members when the 2-year, self-initiated GAO study is released this fall.

As an example of the growing concern, at this point I include an editorial by John Smoot appearing in the July 10 issue of the Washington Star, "Today Celsius, Tomorrow—What? The editorial follows:

TODAY CELSIUS, TOMORROW—WHAT?

Just what we needed: another plot. And this one, probably international in scope, is surfacing in time to keep the mind off-balance through what otherwise might have been the leisurely days of summer.

It's based on the simple principle: There's money in metric.

The first warning signs appeared some time ago when television weathermen began saying things like, ". . . 54 degrees, 12 Celsius." It was casual, but persistent. "Celsius" was being presented in what appeared to be the broadcasting industry's usual pattern—it seemed to be innovative without really informing or educating.

The success of the move to include temperature measurement in the talk of conversion to the metric system depends on the public's neglect of one fact: There is no direct connection. While the Celsius scale is a decimal system based on the freezing and boiling points of water, it is not related at all to weights and measures, which is what the metric system is supposed to be about.

Obviously, this whole matter is linked to a late-blooming public relations effort on behalf of Mr. Celsius. In high school and college physics classes, the centrigrade scale was good enough for me, and it's good enough for my children; but suddenly, after 235 years, we must learn to refer to it by its developer's name. Certainly, Celsius' descendants, jealous of the continued recognition of his predecessor, Fahrenheit, and envious of the Hertz clan who succeeded in replacing kilocycles with kilohertz, have launched a campaign to uplift the family name and wipe out any trace of competition.

But, while it's conceivable that the Celsius involvement in the conspiracy is a simple matter of family pride, television has much more at stake and its aim will become evident as soon as we see the first commercial for the new Celsi-Therm indoor-outdoor thermometers: "Only $5.95. Call right now. Operators are standing by. Call 555–H-E-A-T. Or to save COD charges, send check or money order to Temp . . . T-E-M-P . . . Temp, Box 212, Cold Harbor, Va."

This will be followed by the Wel-Dun Meat Thermometer (which I had expected to be ". . . the perfect Mother's Day gift." Presumably it is being held back for Thanksgiving marketing).

Supermarkets will be able to offer the new C-Method Cooking Library: "Volume one . . . only 39 cents this week at A&P."

Power companies, of course, will launch revised conservation-oriented ad campaigns instructing you to set thermostats at 20 degrees in the daytime, 18.3 degrees at night. Those thermostats, incidentally, will be installed by your friendly neighborhood heating contractor so that you can "bring your home environmental system up to date."

The frightening fact is that these stomach-churning probabilities will be only the beginning: As the Titanic's passengers learned, there is much below the surface.

At this point, broadcasters in particular will claim that what I envision is paranoid nonsense; that their only purpose is a gradual phasing-in of the metric system. Balderdash!

To give credence to their argument is to ignore a glaring inconsistency and, obviously, television is counting on a public nurtured on inconsistency to do just that: To overlook the fact that up to this point only temperature readings have been affected. Never is there a mention of wind velocity in kilometers per hour or barometric pressure in meters or centimeters.

To view this as an oversight, to accept the argument of "Golly, we just plumb forgot all about using those," is to fall into the trap, for conversion in those cases shapes up as phases two and three of the scheme. What we face is planned obsolesence on a massive, dollar-gobbling scale.

We have seen the circle of conspirators widen to include the advertising media and their associated leeches, scientific instrument manufacturers and publishers, and the ripples are still spreading. One German newspaper has said of the move to metric, "The suspicion that the pocket calculator industry lies behind the changeover has yet to be finally proven." It is small comfort to know the jury is still out on that one. And what is the involvement of the U.S. Weather Service? Or the entire scientific community?

To ask Ralph Nader to probe the issue would be unfair to the consumer, diverting the attention of the Raiders from the vital and, I assume, continuing examination of professional sports.

What is required is a long and thorough investigation; the type that can be launched only by Congress. Reaffirming their dedication to the American public, the men on Capitol Hill must for the moment, put aside their consideration of inconsequential matters. Energy, the economy, and other such affairs must wait their turn. The fate of generations yet unborn may rest on their determination to do what must be done. Today, Celsius. Tomorrow, what?

Some, conspirators and sketpics alike, will class me as an irrational alarmist. But I say to you, as would those who stand on the shores of Loch Ness, "There's something out there."●

MONDALE EXPRESSES U.S. SUPPORT FOR ISRAEL

---

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an excellent speech that Vice President WALTER MONDALE gave in Israel on July 2, 1978, during his recent trip to the Middle East.

This speech is a moving an eloquent reaffirmation of the American commitment to Israel, not only fitting within the traditional ambit of American foreign policy, but going much further to equisitely detail why Israel is important to the United States and why Israel's continued well-being is the cornerstone of our interests in the Middle East.

Mr. Speaker, in my view, Vice President MONDALE is one of Israel's best friends in the United States. He is deeply committed to the establishment of peace in the Middle East and to developing a set of arrangements for a Mideast peace that will allow Israel to look after its own interests. In this regard, I believe that the Vice President's statements indicating that the Arab States must "be prepared to accept carefully constructed security arrangements" and that the United States will "not fail to provide Israel with essential and crucial military assistance, nor will we use that assistance as a form of pressure," are particularly meaningful.

Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to insert the Vice President's speech at this point in the RECORD:

SPEECH BY VICE PRESIDENT WALTER F. MONDALE

JERUSALEM, July 2.—Here is the transcript of the speech delivered by Vice President Walter F. Mondale at a State Dinner at the Knesset here:

Mr. Prime Minister, Mrs. Begin, Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Shamir, honored guests and friends. There was one part of public life that I always feared the most in America, and that was on those rare occasions when I was directed to follow Hubert Humphrey. Tonight I found another orator that I very much find it difficult to follow. I know I speak for everyone here, for all the people of my country when I say your words are words that we endorse fully and your plea for peace is as eloquent as any of us have ever heard. Thank you so much.

I bring to the people of Israel the best wishes, the affection, and the congratulations of the President and the people of my country.

It is a special joy to me to return to Israel, and it is a special joy for my wife and for my daughter to visit Israel for the first time, to represent the President and to have the honor to speak in this historic hall of democracy, the Knesset.

Thirty of my fellow citizens and I have come to Israel as representatives of a young nation, to join an ancient people in the celebration of a common dream. In your 30th anniversary year, we rejoice with you. We share your pride. We honor your achievements and on behalf of the American people we say to the people of Israel: Congratulations, Mazel Tov.

Mr. Prime Minister and Mr. Speaker: We are especially grateful to you for your warmth and your gracious hospitality. My consultations with the Prime Minister have been warm, helpful, and have strengthened our friendship even more, and I look forward to our meeting tomorrow.

In my office in the White House, in an honored place, is a gift presented to me by the Prime Minister on his first visit to the White House: an oil lamp and clay pitcher from the period of the Patriarchs.

I thought about that gift this morning when I visited Beersheba where Abraham lived. One cannot visit Israel; one cannot walk these hills; or stand in the city of David, Jerusalem, without a profound sense of the history that echoes from this land.

Israel is a new nation but it's the fulfillment of an age-old dream. On Israel's independence day this year Americans celebrated in the streets of New York with banners that said, "It is great to be thirty after 5,000 years."

Franklin Roosevelt once said that:

"Lives of nations are determined, not by the count of years, but the lifetime of the human spirit. The life of a man is three-score years and ten, a little more, a little less. But the life of a nation is the fullness of its will to live."

No one who was witness to the struggle to found this nation; no one who has seen your courage through four bitter wars; no one who has visited a kibbutz such as I did this morning, and feels the deep commitment within the hearts of the Israeli people to this land, can ever doubt that Israel will live forever.

In our lifetime there has been no more profound symbol of man's commitment to freedom, to dignity and to justice than the history of the Jewish state. For thirty years, Israel has kept alive an ideal—first proclaimed by the prophets—which remains the most revolutionary belief today of our time: that the right of human beings to be free is not a privilege granted by a state, but is a gift from the hand of God.

From the moment of your founding, Israel has never known a day of genuine peace. If there ever was a nation that could have rationalized suspending civil liberties because of an external threat; if there ever was a government that could have justified suppressing dissent—and I must say Mr. Prime Minister you do not suppress dissent—in the name of the national security, it was this embattled nation. Yet this very building in which we meet, your free press, your open debate, and the elections held last year, all proclaim that Israel is a flourishing democracy today.

People talk about the miracle of the Jewish State. They cite deserts transformed into forests and farms. They point to the cities, carved out of bedrock and swamp. They speak of a nation, thirty years old, but already a world leader in the sciences, and the arts, and technology. And all those accomplishments are wonderful and all are reasons for pride.

But the true miracle of the Jewish State is the unyielding determination of the people—no matter what the threat, or the burden—to live as free men and women in a free and independent State.

For two billion people in other developing nations who are struggling to break the bonds of mass misery, Israel is proof that a free society can best meet human needs. In thirty years, a nation of refugees has built a civilization. Israel's example shows that freedom is not an abstract theory, but the most effective instrument ever devised for advancing the welfare of man.

It is especially fitting that in this very week Americans are preparing to commemorate our own Independence Day. For we are the heirs to a common tradition of freedom and our two nations are joined by a unique historic bond.

The early Puritans, who came to America in the 1600's seeking religious freedom, viewed themselves as the ancient Israelites in search of the promised land. They called their new country, "Canaan," and spoke of the covenant that they had made with God. In 1776, when Thomas Jefferson, and John Adams and Benjamin Franklin were asked by the new Congress to design a seal for our country, they suggested the Hebrew people crossing the Red Sea, with Moses standing on the other side.

My country was founded nearly two hundred years before the modern Jewish State. But the people of America owe Israel an ancient debt. As one historian put it, "The Hebraic mortar cemented the foundation of American democracy."

As Americans watched the struggle for Israeli independence, we saw our own history as a people unfolding again. For Jew and non-Jew alike, the creation of the Jewish State was a victory in our lives as well. And for all Americans it was a moment of pride when President Truman recognized the new state of Israel just eleven minutes after its birth. It was my privilege to bring with me from the people of America the original, handwritten statement of recognition drafted by President Truman which will remain on display in Israel for the next year.

I told the Prime Minister today I did it for two reasons; first because of its historic significance, and secondly, Harry did it in three simple declarative sentences. And somehow diplomacy has lost the ability to just state things directly, and it's a good example for the future if we would follow it.

We stood together and we stand together today. Our support for Israel carries on a fifty-six year commitment by our Congress to the justice of a Jewish homeland; sustained by the deeds and pledges of seven Presidents; and ratified in the hearts of American people. No other cause, no other concern can sever the special bond that unites Israel and America today.

There have been moments during this relationship when we have disagreed over how to achieve the objectives we share. But every time, we have emerged from these times of testing with our friendship even stronger, firmer, and more secure. The special relationship between Israel and my country will always endure.

For thirty years Israel has been a stronghold of democracy; and an unshakeable friend and ally. The United States is stronger today because of the existence of the Jewish State.

And I would like to repeat to you the words President Carter spoke to Prime Minister Begin and nearly a thousand Americans at the White House celebration of your Independence Day. He said this:

"For thirty years we have stood at the side of the proud and independent nation of Israel. I can say without reservation, as the President of the United States, that we will continue to do so, not just for another thirty years, but forever."

Ours is not just a friendship between two governments, but between two peoples; two democracies; two cultures; learning from each other with mutual respect.

We are joined by the ties of history, of kinship, and love that touch millions of citizens in both our nations and most of us in this hall.

Our common values and common ideals unite us in their defense today.

We are nations of refugees. We are the children of the disposed. And we do not forget our past. No two nations in the history of the world have welcomed more immigrants to their shores than our two countries. And in Israel we cannot forget that so many of them are survivors of the Holocaust.

"Only the Jewish people," Golda Meir once said, "have had so much intimate knowledge of boxcars, and of deportation to unknown destinations." That memory keeps us from ever being indifferent to the plight of the exiled, and the refugee, today. We are not neutrals in the struggle for human rights.

After 2,000 years of exile, there is no more compelling claim on the conscience of the world than that of Jews in other nations denied their right to emigrate to Israel today. This is not only a Jewish issue. It is a moral issue as old as the Scriptures; and it is a legal issue as clear as the Helsinki Accords. Together with the people of Israel, we call on all nations in the world which deny Jews and others the right to emigrate and other basic human rights, to "unloose the heavy burdens and let the oppressed go free."

And no people who believe in human rights and the dignity of man can stand silent in the face of terrorism. We condemn the atrocities we saw in this city four days ago. This morning I visited the victims of last week's bombing. They are innocent people, but it does not tell the story. Older ladies, many of them burned mercilessly, will bear those scars for life. Young men in their prime, one badly shattered with his brother dead. An eleven-year-old Arab boy, fighting to save one of his legs, totally innocent, punished apparently for playing in the street. No purpose or goal can justify their suffering. Nothing can justify the loss of those who loved ones were killed. Those who make war on innocents commit a crime—not just against their victims—but against decency itself. There is only one possible response by civilized people to terrorism, and we condemn PLO terrorism totally and absolutely. We also condemn those responsible for these acts of terror and those who claim credit for them.

Of all the values and the commitments we share, none unite us more today than the hope for a lasting peace in the Middle East. No people in the world yearn for peace more than you do.

I know from my hours with the Prime Minister that no leader will work more tirelessly to seize this moment when it may be possible to bring peace to the people of the Middle East than your Prime Minister. On November 20, he spoke to the world from this building and said:

"We have one aspiration at heart, one desire in our souls, to bring peace; peace to our nation, which has not known it for even one day since the beginning of the return to Zion; and peace to our neighbors, to whom we wish all the best."

No theme runs through Jewish teaching more than a hatred of war. I had the privilege of joining in a Seder this year. And I was struck that even in the middle of a celebration of Israel's freedom ten drops of wine were spilled, for as the Haggadah said: "How can we fully rejoice as we celebrate Israel's freedom, when we know that our redemption involved the suffering of the Egyptians?"

And I thought of an interview I had with an Israeli soldier following the Six Day War, surely one of the most remarkable passages ever written about a war. The Israeli soldier said:

"When the fighting began and the mountains around Ein Gev began to spit fire, a group of our reconnaissance troops on one of the hills next to the Syrian border was busy putting out a fire in a little field belonging to an Arab farmer. 'A field is a field,' said one of the boys."

In that story is expressed the tragedy, and the hope of the Middle East. For Israeli and Arab alike, too many sons and daughters have been lost in too many wars. For Israeli and Arab alike, peace in the Middle East, as the Prime Minister observed can bring a joyous harvest of enrichment and advancement.

We are at an historic turning point today in the search for peace in the Middle East. Never have the prospects for peace been so favorable. Never have the dangers of failure been so great. But time is not on our side. We cannot afford to delay. We must not minimize the urgency of the moment. For as President Carter said: "The opportunity for peace may be slipping away. Statesmanship and courage will be required on the part of all of us who seek peace. The moment cannot be lost without the greatest risks for the future."

If we do not move forward with courage; if all sides simply advance maximum positions; if this opportunity slips from our hands; who can say that it can ever be reclaimed? Who can accept the terrible price of failure?

Time and events have brought peace in the Middle East within our reach for the first time in 30 years.

First, because Israel, by its own fortitude, has proven that as a nation it is here to stay.

Second, the interim security arrangements negotiated after the 1973 war have proved workable; they remain intact today; and they've helped to keep the peace.

Third, the United States has built new relationships in the Middle East that allow us to better bring the weight of our influence to bear on behalf of moderation and peace. Those relationships are in the interest of all our friends in the Middle East.

Fourth, seven months ago, the leader of the largest Arab nation came to this city at your invitation. He was warmly received by your President, your Prime Minister, and your people. He spoke, in this very building of acceptance, recognition, and security for Israel; of a Middle East in which Jews and Arabs would co-exist as neighbors, instead of enemies. And after the talks between the Prime Minister and the President, the world heard the historic promise from both these great leaders of "no more war."

Direct negotiations have begun. Yes, they've been tentative, and they've been full of ups-and-downs. But the peace process is underway. And it must continue. The "Spirit of Jerusalem" must prevail. Negotiations must assure that the promise of "no more war" will be fulfilled.

We believe that the best way to make peace is through direct negotiations, as the Prime Minister has said this evening, between the parties to the conflict. We are bending all our efforts to resume negotiations between Egypt and Israel.

When necessary, the United States is willing to be a helpful, mediating party.

We have made, and will continue to make, constructive suggestions where they may be helpful in bridging a gap between the negotiators, themselves. As we have agreed, any suggestions will only be made after consulting with you and with the other parties.

Negotiating is a difficult, challenging, frustrating process. It can only succeed with a spirit of give and take, and compromise.

Israel put its proposals on the table several months ago. Detailed talks have taken place between Egypt and Israel. When Israel presented its views, the Israeli government made clear its readiness to consider counterproposals and to negotiate with an open mind. We hope and expect the government of Egypt will soon offer further proposals. And we hope that Egypt will continue the negotiations in this same constructive spirit. It is essential that each side seek in the other's proposals common elements from which agreement can be built. I am confident that the negotiations can be resumed in an atmosphere of mutual respects.

Fortunately, we have a powerful advantage in this process. For the essential basis for agreement has already been achieved. And that is UN Resolution 242 which was unanimously adopted by the Security Council, and agreed to by all nations in this conflict. It provides a common touchstone to guide the nations.

Resolution 242 is an equation. On the one hand, it recognizes the right of every state in the area to live in peace within secure and recognized borders free from threats or acts of force. We believe such a peace must include binding commitments to normal relations. In return, Israel would withdraw from territories occupied in the 1967 war. We believe the exact boundaries must be determined through negotiations by the parties themselves. They are not determined by Resolution 242.

But these principles of 242 cannot be viewed in isolation, or applied selectively. Together, they form a fair and balanced formula and still the best basis for negotiating a peace between Israel and her neighbors.

We understand the difficulties these issues pose for Israel. And I am reminded of a story by Martin Buber in which the Maggid of Mezritch described how he learned the secret of love by overhearing the conversation of two peasants. One turned to the other and said, "Do you love me?" And the second replied, "Of course I do. We have been friends for years."

"Tell me then," the first peasant asked, "What is it that is hurting me now?"

"The second replied, "How can I know, if you don't tell me?" And the first answered, "How can you say you love me if you don't know what causes me pain?"

The people of Israel confront painful decisions in this process. They involve negotiating the future of territories which have been occupied for a decade and which, in the absence of peace have provided a sense of security. But no one of us can forget the history of the Middle East. For six years after the 1967 war, there was no progress towards peace. And another tragic war followed in 1973.

As we have often said, we are convinced that without eventual withdrawal on all fronts, to boundaries agreed upon in negotiations and safeguarded by effective security arrangements, there can be no lasting peace. Only Israel can be the final judge of its security needs. Only the parties can draw the final boundary lines. But if there is to be peace, the implicit bargain of UN Resolution 242 must be fulfilled.

In the Sinai, Israel has proposed a peace treaty in which there would be negotiated withdrawal and security would be achieved while relinquishing claims to territory. This approach can be applied in the West Bank and Gaza as well.

The Arabs also face difficult and painful decisions. They must be prepared to accept carefully constructed security arrangements. There should be strong links between the West Bank and Gaza, and Jordan. They must accept permanent peace and Israel's right to exist in peace within secure and recognized borders. We believe that a solution based on this approach—not an independent Palestinian State—will provide the stability and security essential for peace. Such an agreement will take time to negotiate and to test. And that's why we believe a period of transition is needed.

Real peace will clearly serve Israel's security interests. But both during the transition period, and after a peace settlement, Israel's need for concrete security arrangements must be met. Any peace settlement must include continued, assured, permanent protection for Israel. The United States and Israel are completely united on this point.

The agreements of the past four years in the Middle East have demonstrated that difficult security problems can be resolved. We can draw on this experience in future agreements. Demilitarization and limited force zones have helped to keep the peace in the Sinai and on the Golan Heights; they can help keep the peace in other strategic areas as well. The possibility of surprise attacks can be reduced by early warning systems and surveillance.

International forces and observers can help maintain integrity of peace agreements and ensure stability. Technology may help solve some problems. A continuing military presence in strategic areas might solve others. The United States has helped with these arrangements in the past. We are prepared to assist again. Agreements between our countries could ensure Israel's security, and we're prepared to explore all the possibilities.

To achieve and guarantee lasting peace, Israel's strength must never be in doubt. Israel's ability to defend itself must be clear. Israel must be so strong that no nation will ever be tempted to test its strength. And America is committed to a strong Israel.

Since the war in 1973, the United States has agreed to over $10 billion in military and economic support for Israel. Under the Carter Administration, one fifth of all our economic and military assistance around the world has come to this nation. In next year's budget, nearly half of all our sales credits and grants for military equipment will go to Israel. This is an unprecedented amount, but we have no regrets.

On behalf of the President, I pledge to you tonight that aid from the United States will continue. I pledge to the people of Israel that the United States will not permit your security to be compromised in the search for peace. And I pledge to you that my country will not fail to provide Israel with essential and crucial military assistance, nor will we use that assistance as a form of pressure.

In the final analysis, "Peace," as Albert Einstein once said, "cannot come through force, it can only come through understanding." That is a profound challenge for all peoples in the Middle East.

Ancient rivalries must be overcome. Fears and suspicions on all sides, bred from the hostilities of the past, must be transformed into new visions of understanding and sympathy. And the long-standing problems of the Palestinian people must be resolved.

We have no illusions about the difficulty of that challenge. We have no smugness about the problems it entails.

But more than 5,000 years of history have shown that the Jewish people are a people of understanding and vision and sensitivity. Through exile, and persecution, and even genocide, you have never abandoned your commitment to justice and the dignity of all mankind.

And I am confident that a people of those traditions understands and accepts that the Palestinians—like all people—have the right to participate in the determination of their own destiny. We are convinced that a solution can be found which will provide stability and security for everyone in the Middle East.

The peace we seek is not a mere absence of war, or simply the end of belligerency. True peace must transform, not just the nations, but the peoples of the Middle East. It cannot be written in documents alone. It must be woven into the fabric of everyday life.

President Carter has stated that such a peace must include: open borders; diplomatic relations; normal trade, and commerce and tourism; free navigation; and an end of all boycotts. The cornerstone of normal relations must be a formal recognition by the neighboring Arab states of Israel's nationhood.

For 30 years peace has eluded the nations of the Middle East. Some say it's beyond our reach.

There are those who say no formula can be found. Others say the problems of the Palestinians are intractable. Some say that the Middle East is destined by its history to know only war, and the threat of war, for generations. Real peace they say, is nothing but a dream.

But to all the peoples of the Middle East, in the 30th year of Israel's independence, the words of Theodore Herzl still ring true today: "If you will it, it is not a dream."

For 30 years, the peoples of the Middle East have had to bear the crushing burden of ever more costly military needs. War has robbed this region, not only of its sons and its daughters, but of too much of its future. True peace can unlock the resources, the talents and the imaginations of two ancient peoples.

No nation has more to gain from peace than Israel. When I visited your country in 1973, I was moved by the fact that every leader I talked to spoke in terms of meeting the real needs, the human needs of (Israel's) people.

This morning I presented to President Navon a gift from the American people in honor of your 30th anniversary: it was a copy of the first Bible ever printed in Hebrew in the United States. It is a symbol of the friendship, respect and love we feel for the people of Israel today.

But the gift we hope for Israel most in this anniversary year is the gift for which you have prayed for 30 years—the gift of peace.

For 30 years, we have shared in the joys of this great nation; we have taken pride in your achievements; and we have felt your losses and your pain. Now, more than anything else, we hope to share with Israel in the fulfillment of a lasting peace.

America will stand with you in the search for peace and we will rejoice when peace is won. And when that day comes, in the words of Isaiah, "The work of righteousness shall be peace . . . and the effects of righteousness, quietness and assurance forever."

Shalom.●

YOU CANNOT GET EVEN

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, contrary to their commonsense instincts, many persons are talked into supporting various Government programs on the basis that they ought to get their fair share since they pay taxes. This motive of "getting what is rightfully ours" leads to some dire consequences, because, as an extension of the idea of private ownership, it becomes bizarre in the context of big government reaching out to supposedly confer benefits on more and more groups. Dr. Hans Sennholz of the Department of Economics at Grove City College, wrote a short article in the Freeman for June 1978, which I feel ought to be required reading in that regard. The article follows:

YOU CANNOT GET EVEN

(By Hans F. Sennholz)

Government affects individual incomes by virtually every decision it makes. Agricultural programs, veterans' benefits, health and labor and welfare expenditures, housing and community development, federal expenditures on education, social insurance, medicare and medicaid programs, and last but not least, numerous regulations and controls affect the economic conditions of every citizen. In fact, modern government has become a universal transfer agency that utilizes the political process for distributing vast measures of economic income and wealth. It preys on millions of victims in order to allocate valuable goods and services to its beneficiaries. With the latter, transfer programs are so popular that few public officials and politicians dare oppose them.

The motive powers that drive the transfer order are as varied as human design itself. Surely, the true motives are often concealed, and a hollow pretext is pompously placed in the front for show. And yet, man is more accountable for his motives than for anything else. A good motive may exculpate a poor action, but a bad motive vitiates even the finest action. Conscience is merely our own judgment of the right and wrong of our action, and therefore can never be a safe guide unless it is enlightened by a thorough understanding of the implications and consequences of our actions. Without an enlightened conscience we may do evil thoroughly and heartily.

An important spring of action for the transfer society is the desire by most people to get even in the redistribution struggle. "I have been victimized in the past by taxation, inflation, regulation, or other devices," so the argument goes, "therefore I am entitled to partake in this particular benefit." Or the time sequence may be reversed: "I'll be victimized later in life," pleads the college student, "and therefore I want state aid and subsidy now."

This argument is probably the most powerful pacifier of conscience. It dulls our perception and discernment of what is evil and makes us slow to shun it. After all, we are merely getting back "what is rightfully our own." With a curious twist of specious deduction the modern welfare state, which continually seizes and redistributes private property by force, is defended by the friends of individual liberty and private property. "Man is entitled to the fruits of his labor," they argue, "we are merely getting back that which is rightfully and morally our own." They borrow the arguments for the private property order to sustain the political transfer order.

Surely getting back that which is rightfully and morally our own is a principle that is rooted in our inalienable right to our lives. It is a property right that springs from our human rights and from the right to life itself. It is the right to restoration of the fruits of our efforts and labors of which we are deprived by deceit, force, or any other immoral practice. It is a specific right to recovery or compensation from those who are wronging us or have injured us in the past.

This right to restoration does not beget the right to commit the very immoral act from which we seek restoration to imitate others in acting immorally, or to seek revenge against the trespassers or innocent bystanders. But this is precisely what the "get-even" advisors urge us to do.

In an unfortunate automobile accident we are hurt or injured, or our vehicle may be damaged, because of the negligence of another driver. This gives us the right to demand restoration and compensation from the guilty party. But it does not give us the right to seize another car parked in the neighborhood, or return to the road and injure another driver. Or, our home is burglarized and we suffer deplorable losses in personal wealth and memorabilia. This does not bestow upon us the right to do likewise to others. But the "get-even" advocates are drawing this very conclusion.

He who is desirous of "getting even" in the politics of redistribution longs to join the army of beneficiaries who are presently preying on their victims. They would like to get their "money back" from whomever they can find and victimize now. Like the victim of a burglary who becomes a burglar himself, they are searching for other victims. But in contrast to the new burglar who may be aware of the immorality of his actions, the "get-even" advocate openly defends his motives while he is pursuing his political craft.

We cannot get even with those individuals who deprived us of our property in the past. They may have long departed this life or may have fallen among the victims themselves. We cannot get even with them by enlisting in the standing army of redistributors. We merely perpetuate the evil by joining their forces. So we must stand immune to the temptations of evil, regardless of what others are doing to us. The redistribution must stop with us.
